No congregation, nor set of congregations, can realise the sublime conception of the Church that rises before our vision in Ephesians. It is as if the Apostle had been able to anticipate the glorious spectacle which John beheld in apocalyptic vision. Though he had founded more churches in the great cities of the Empire than any man of the Apostolic band, yet none of these alone, nor all of them together, could realise his fair ideal of that one mystical body, the Church, the Bride, the Lamb's wife.

This Epistle is pre-eminently the Epistle of the Church, and the view held by men of the conception of it here presented, will largely indicate their mental and spiritual attitude towards their fellow Christians. There is no test equal to this. The sacramentarian who believes that only those who have passed through certain rites are members of the Church, finds himself at a loss to explain the sweep and breadth of the Apostle's words. They refuse to adapt themselves into his narrow measure. But he who is in sympathy with the Apostle's mind, and with the thought of the Holy Ghost conveyed by it, realises that the Church is greater than all churches, and comprehends within its precincts those who are not numbered amongst the adherents of any ecclesiastical system. We must enter into God's thought when we speak about the Church; not as she now is, in broken bits, like a number of squares of painted glass lying in heaps at the foot of what is to be a window of marvellous beauty, but as she is to be when the mystery of God is finished, and she is presented to his Son, worthy to "answer to" Him, according to the ancient word of the Creator, when seeking a bride for Adam.

Eph. i. 22. The Church is a Body of which Christ is Head. We repeat the words without emotion now, but there was a time when they could not be uttered save at the cost of much that men hold dear. It is as if we were passing over a battle-field, once raked with shell and soaked with gore; or were handling a banner torn and ragged, around which the conflicting foemen fought for half a day. Let us not forget the brave hearts that were hurried to death amid the heather and gorse of Scotland, rather than confess that any but Christ might assume this august title.

The Church, as a whole, must take its commands for suffering or warfare from no other lips than Christ's. Whatever course may be dictated by expediency, policy, or human leadership, she dare not move until Christ gives the signal; whereas if He bids her advance, protest, or suffer, she has no option but to obey; though every voice that can reach her may be raised in expostulation and warning, but in vain.

This position of our Lord is as much for each member of the Church as for the whole Body. Because as in the natural body each several muscle, nerve, and vein, as well as the more prominent members, have direct double communication with the head, from which are derived their unity, direction, and energy; so in the spiritual Body of which Christ is head, there is not one single redeemed spirit that does not have personal oneness with its Lord. It would not be in the Church at all if that relationship had not first been formed. We are related to one another, only because we are related to Him. We are first members of Christ, then members of each other in Him. First Christ, then the Church.

Each member is united to the head by the afferent nerves that carry impressions from the surface of the body to the head, and there is nothing which happens to any one of us which is not instantly communicated to our Saviour. In all our affliction He is afflicted; He bears our griefs and carries our sorrows; He is touched with the feeling of our infirmity. The glory with which He is surrounded does not act like an insulating obstacle to intercept the thrill of pain or joy which passes instantly from the weakest and meanest of his members to Himself.

Each member is united to the head by the efferent nerves, that carry volitions from the imperial court of the brain to the extremities of the body, withdrawing the foot from the thorn, or compelling the hand to plunge into the flame; so should we receive the impulses of our life from Jesus Christ, not acting on our self-prompted energy, or following our own plans, thinking our own thoughts, or doing our own works, but ever subordinated to his will.

In ch. v. 23 the headship of Christ to his Church is compared to that between husband and wife; and we are reminded of one of those deep verses that reveal the unities of creation as they were present to the Apostle's thought. As God is the head of Christ, as the glorified Man, and as man is meant to be the head of woman, so is Christ head of each redeemed man, as an individual, and of all such together, in the Church. So amid the discord and anarchy of creation we are learning the divine concords, and shall yet find harmony emanating from the Church to soothe, and still, and unify creation.

Eph. ii. 21. The Church is also a Building.—Deep in the weltering floods that surged around the Cross, God laid the foundation stone which none but He could lay, which is Jesus Christ. He had laid it in purpose before He laid the foundations of the hills, but He laid it then actually. On Him souls have been built through the ages, one by one. They were lifeless indeed when they first touched Him, but coming in contact with the Living Stone, though dead they began to live, and thus the building grew.

A building is for an inmate, and the Church is for God. Without Him it has no reason to exist. The universe itself cannot contain Him, but the house whose stones are redeemed souls is his pavilion, his habitation, his home. Here again we meet the truth so often in the Apostle's thought, that the Lord has need of us, that He is homeless and a stranger in the midst of his own creation, until He finds a lodging in the hearts of those that love Him.

Eph. iii. 10. It is through the Church that God's Wisdom is made known. Men learn God's manifold wisdom in creation; in the limpet whose fragile shell may be pierced by a tiny insect, yet it resists the blow of the mightiest wave; in the eye that is able to adjust itself immediately to the waxing or waning light; in the hand which is so marvellously adapted to its myriad purposes, that the study of its manipulating dexterity has before now convinced infidelity of the being of God. But angels learn the manifold wisdom of God by studying the adaptation of his grace to the varied needs of his saints.

As students discover the wonderful resources of the surgeon, as he passes through the wards adapting himself to the need of each sufferer, so do angels and the lofty spirits of heaven learn secrets they had never known, but for the infinite variety of sin and need and sorrow, with which God has to deal, and which become so many prisms to break up the white ray of his being into its varied constituent hues.

Eph. iii. 21. The Church's end is the Glory of God. At the close of this sublime doxology, in which the burning heart of the Apostle rises to an almost unparalleled ecstasy of thought and expression, he seeks for voices that shall give utterance to the glory which is the due of such a God. And, according to the Revised Version, which accurately renders the best reading of the original Greek, he finds them in the Church and in Christ Jesus. "Unto Him be glory in the Church and in Christ Jesus."

The juxtaposition of these two is very wonderful and suggestive. The thought seems to be passing from the comparison between the Church and a building or body, to that between it and the Bride, lifted by the love of the Bridegroom to stand beside Him, on the same level with Himself. We know, of course, that glory must accrue to the Father, for ever and ever, from the work of the Lord Jesus. A revenue of glory will ever ascend from the cradle, the cross, the grave. The ages are to see repeated harvests accruing from the sowing of his tears and blood. But we had not realised, but for these words, that a similar wealth of glory was to accrue from the Church of the Firstborn.

Nevertheless, though our thought staggers with the conception, let us accept with reverent joy the assurance that in that great life which is opening before us the Church of the redeemed shall stand beside Christ, and raise her voice, as the voice of one in unison with his, ascribing glory to the Father. And as the generations come and go, they shall not diminish, but increase, the sweetness of her song and the volume of her voice.

Eph. iv. 4. The Church is One.—A sevenfold bond of unity makes her so. One Head: one indwelling Spirit; one blessed Hope; one Lord; one Faith; one Baptism; one God and Father. She is therefore one. Her members are scattered through heaven and earth. They are to be found in many different Christian communities and sects, or belonging to none. They may ignore one another, or even refuse fellowship, because blinded to their true kindred, as two brothers may meet in a mist and not know each other. But they are one, and in the light of eternity they shall recognise the unity, or it shall be patent to all the universe of God.

Eph. v. 32. The love of Christ to His Church is inexpressible save by the tenderest human relationship.—Here is a mystery indeed. That scene in Eden is also a parable. It was not good for Christ to be alone. He needed one to love and to give love. But there was none among unfallen angels that could answer to Him. And therefore God the Father sought a Bride for his Son from among the children of men; yea, He took the second Eve from the wounded side of the Second Man, as He lay asleep in the garden-grave.

Redeemed men compose that Bride. The Saviour loves them, as a true man who for the first time loves a pure and noble woman. He does not love them because they are fair, but to make them so. He has approved his love by becoming man, and giving Himself to death. By his blood, and Word, and Spirit, He is sanctifying and purifying them for Himself. The process is long and severe, but He nourishes and cherishes them, as a man does his wounded flesh. And ere long, when the Bride is complete in numbers and in beauty, the mystery that now veils her shall be flung aside, and amid the joy of creation, He will present her to Himself, without spot or wrinkle or any such thing; bearing his name, sharing his rank, and position, and wealth, and power, and glory for ever and ever.

Then the Church shall cleave to Him for ever, and He shall cleave to her. And they twain shall be one spirit. And his own prayer shall be realised, offered on the eve of his agony and passion, "The glory which Thou hast given Me, I have given unto them, that they may be one, even as We are one."

HARVEST.

John iv. 35.

Behold in lucent glory,
O'er valley, hill, and plain,
Unto the harvest hoary,
The fields of waving grain.

Fair vines, with fruit are bending;
The orchard boughs droop low,
With gifts of his sweet sending,
To whom all praise we owe.

Lo! the whole earth rejoices;
Her sons go forth to reap;
With grateful hearts and voices,
The festive-tide we keep.

With loving adoration,
Thanksgiving psalms we sing;
And first fruit of oblation;
Unto thy altar bring.

We bless Thee, O our Father,
For all thy gifts love-given;
Yet not alone, but rather
For Christ the Bread of heaven.

Fields white to harvest waving,
Sown by his own pierced hand;
For firstfruits of his saving
From every age and land.

O Thou, O Lord, who reapeth
The guerdon of thy pain,
Who in thy garner keepeth
Thine own blood-purchased grain;

Who in this earth maternal,
Our souls as seed hath sown,
With sheaves of life eternal,
O bind us as thine own.

Apocalyptic Scenes.

XXII.

THE TWO WITNESSES.

We now approach a subject of peculiar and confessed difficulty—not that the symbols themselves are insoluble, if we allow ourselves to be guided by Scripture analogy, but that their precise application is a matter of some difference of opinion. This is, however, by no means unnatural, and need not shake the faith of those who believe that the historical interpretation of the prophecy is the true one. For it is only reasonable to expect that as the vision begins to relate to the very days in which we live, it would become specially difficult to appreciate the magnitude and relative importance of passing events. It is only those who view a battle from afar who can estimate the true bearing of this or that strategic movement. Those who are in the smoke and din of the conflict can rarely gain a wide or true comprehension of the swaying fortunes of the day.

Just so is it in this case. Living, as I believe we are, towards the close of the sixth trumpet, to which the prophecy of the two witnesses brings us, the events therein foreshadowed are, as regards some of their details, and particularly in the latter part, "hard questions." For we here reach the point when the application of the vision passes from the facts of history with which we are acquainted, to those which lie yet in the future. We have to deal with the days and scenes which immediately precede the sounding of the seventh, the LAST TRUMP! How bright and blessed, yet how unspeakably solemn is the thought!

In the first place we will endeavour to discern the import of the prophecy in its earlier and easier stages.

The two witnesses are not two individual men. The term is explanatory of the symbols by which they are represented, viz., olive trees and candlesticks. Concerning the meaning of these symbols we can have no doubt. An olive tree was the figure chosen, among others, to denote God's people of old (Jer. xi. 16), and to them St. Paul applies it in Rom. xi. 17-24. Candlesticks are expressly declared by the Giver of the Apocalypse Himself to be "churches" (ch. i. 20). The period during which the witnesses were to testify—1260 prophetic days or literal years—precludes moreover the supposition that they are two individuals. We must therefore regard them as Churches, or bodies of Christian people, bearing testimony to the truth of Christ, and consequently against error.

Why are they two? First, because two was the lowest number which could make testimony valid (Deut. xix. 15). Secondly, to show how few during that long period would be the true witnesses, and perhaps, in the third place, to signify the fact that the Empire, being then divided into two, Eastern and Western, a line of such testimony would be maintained in each division.

As "olive-trees" they are "anointed ones," standing before the God of the earth; in other words, Christians (which means "anointed"), those who have received the unction from the Holy One, and who minister life and light to the world. A similar position was accorded, under the earlier dispensation, to those who, as anointed prophets and priests, stood before God (see 1 Kings xviii. 1, and Deut. x. 8), and by their witness for Him sustained and enlightened others. Thus Zechariah and Joshua are represented in Zech. iv., and Ezra vi. 14 attests the fruitful result of the prophetic ministry.

They are witnesses to Christ, "my two witnesses." Later on the same people are described as those who "have the testimony of Jesus Christ" (chap. xii. 17), who overcame "by the word of their testimony" (chap. xii. 11). They are seen again on Mount Sion, following the Lamb (chap. xiv. 1-5). They "keep the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus" (chap. xiv. 12). They stand as victors by the sea of glass mingled with fire (chap. xv. 2). They reign with Christ (chap. xx. 4-6). They testify for Jesus. They are to prophesy clothed in sackcloth. Few in number, their position is to be one of humiliation. Not in purple, but in the garb of those who sigh and cry for the abominations that are done in the holy city, they are to testify for the truth of God against the error and evil all around. Their rejection and persecution was to be followed by retributive judgments from God.

It must be remembered that the prophecy is mainly symbolic. It is not literal fire and rain that are spoken of, but figurative. In the days of Moses and Elijah there was a literal infliction of such plagues or penalties. But this is a figurative prediction, and the fulfilment must be by means of certain events which the symbols represent. Sometimes, indeed, as previously observed, the necessities of language compel us to interpret an expression here or there literally, but such instances are but occasional.

In the mysterious language of the text these judgments appear to be inflicted by the witnesses themselves, but the use of similar expressions in the Old Testament shows that they were meant to describe divine action.

Thus, where Jeremiah's words were said to be "fire," and to "devour" the people (Jer. v. 14), where Isaiah is told to "make the heart of the people fat" (Is. vi. 10), where Ezekiel speaks of his coming to "destroy the city" (Ez. xliii. 3); in each of these instances the action, which is apparently attributed to God's witnesses, was really his own. National judgments, divinely inflicted, are described figuratively as "fire" by the prophets (see Deut. xxxii. 22, Is. x. 16, 17, xxxiii. 12, xlii. 25, and in Hos. vi. 5, the exact imagery of the text is employed: "I have hewed them by the prophets; I have slain them by the words of my mouth"). So in the present case, the meaning seems to be that the rejection of the testimony of Jesus, and the persecution of his witnesses, should be followed by spiritual drought, such as described in Am. viii. 11, and by Divine judgments on the rejectors.

Lastly, they were to bear their testimony for the long period of 1260 years (symbolic "days"). As Protestants for the truths of the Gospel, and against the soul-destroying errors and hellish wickedness of the great Apostasy, they were to stand before God and to shine before men—and the period of their testimony appears to coincide with that during which the true spiritual polity, "the holy city," was regarded by God as trodden down by the "Gentiles," or practically heathen multitude, in the visible Church, whom He utterly disowned.

And now, what saith history? Has there been a succession of true witnesses to the Lord Jesus Christ—Christian bodies, or organisations—"churches"—never dying out, though often reduced to so small a number as to be almost invisible—always in a more or less oppressed, hated, and persecuted condition, "prophesying in sackcloth"—their testimony lasting all through the dark and middle ages, and beyond them, too, and whose rejection has been followed by national calamities and spiritual death?

Most undoubtedly there has. The most ordinary acquaintance with Church history reveals the existence and faithfulness of Christ's witnessing churches—his "olive trees" and "candlesticks"—from the days of Gregory the Great, at the end of the sixth century, when the Apostasy, "the mystery of iniquity," was fully developed, down to our own times.

To quote from Canon Garratt:—"For nine hundred years, from the beginning of the seventh century until the Reformation, nothing can be conceived more miserable outwardly than the condition of the scattered witnesses against dominant error, both in the east and in the west, who, under the name of Paulicians and Cathari and Albigenses in France, and Waldenses in Piedmont, and Hussites in Bohemia, and Moravians in the country from which the United Brethren take their name, and Lollards and Wickliffites in England, were hunted down like wild beasts by Dominic and his followers; by St. Bernard, sometimes called the Great; by such a king as Louis XI. of France, misnamed Saint, and by such a general as Simon de Montfort. And after the Reformation the Protestant Churches still had to prophesy in sackcloth—witness Smithfield and St. Bartholomew, the dragonnades under Louis XIV., and the persecutions which followed even up to the reign of Louis XVI., who put a stop to them shortly before the breaking out of the French Revolution. Every Protestant Church has had its martyrs, and in France, Italy, and Spain and elsewhere, persecution was so far successful as to crush the Reformation.

"But it was foretold that the injury of these witnesses should be avenged. The evident meaning of the symbols is, that their rejection should be followed by complete spiritual drought, of which the religious condition of Roman Catholic Europe gives but too distinct an accomplishment, and that the persecution of the Protestant Churches would be some way avenged on their persecutors. The prophecy needs no other commentary than the words of secular historians. Louis Blanc heads a chapter containing an account of the worst ferocities of that time,—the September massacres,—when all the noblest blood in France was poured out like water in the streets of Paris, by the words, 'Souviens toi de St. Barthélemy' ('Remember St. Bartholomew'). It was God remembering St. Bartholomew. And Alison, in his History of Europe, declares that 'the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes was the chief remote cause of the French Revolution, and the terrible evils it brought upon the nobility and the Government, the natural consequence and just retribution of that abominable act of religious oppression.'"

Contrast with this the prosperity, the blessing, and the spiritual light and life which have characterised those countries which welcomed the Reformation and received the testimony of Jesus—our own beloved land and Northern Germany.

Let us, however, give heed to the words of the prophecy. The prophesying in sackcloth has not ceased. We cannot say with absolute certainty that the 1260 years have actually run out, and whenever they do, they are to be marked not by a removal of the sackcloth, but by a silencing of the testimony! We know well that true Evangelical, Protestant religion is still despised and hated. The very name of Protestant, or witness, is disowned. The churches who not merely in name, but in deed and in truth, testify the simple Gospel of Christ, and bear steadfast witness to Him, as sole Prophet, Priest, and King—how few they are. But if, as corporate bodies or churches, we can no longer exercise that high and holy privilege, it may yet be ours, as individuals, to stand firm for the truth of God, and to "contend earnestly for the faith which was once delivered to the saints." The more the churches, as such, may be permeated by Romanism, Ritualism, and Rationalism, the more urgent the call, and the more paramount the necessity of letting our personal testimony to the Person, work, and offices of our beloved Lord and Saviour be unmistakably clear. May He keep us faithful in the "perilous times" of these last days.

SAILORS AT BARBADOS.

Dear Sir,—I found it needful to spend a part of last winter in the exquisite climate of Barbados. The very many ships visiting Carlisle Bay for, and awaiting, orders, suggested to my mind the inquiry, "Is there a sailors' home or harbour mission in this chief port of the West Indies to overtake the needs and avail of the opportunities involved in this mass of shipping?" I found a seamen's Bethel and a sailors' evangelistic hall ashore, both zealously conducted, but the work afloat was almost entirely carried on by one young Christian friend, Mr. Hamlet Weekes, employed in one of the large commercial establishments in Bridgetown. His worthiness of character I had special means of verifying.

Anyone who knows of the teeming coloured population of Barbados and the loose domestic relations largely existing amongst it, also knows that in no part in Her Majesty's dominions is there more need to exercise Christian influences than on the seamen visiting there. Mr. Weekes' work of self-denial and sacrifice amounts to nothing less than acts of Christian heroism. He earnestly desires to set up a Sailors' Home, and also to get the means of buying a hulk, to be used as a floating Bethel.

Meanwhile he is in urgent need of tracts in English, Norwegian, and Swedish. I must mention that Miss Weston has materially aided this mission, and that the British and Foreign Sailors' Society contribute £10 annually towards its support. Christian friends of "Jack afloat" who wish to participate in this work can forward their offerings to Miss Weston, Royal Sailors' Rest, Devonport, who has kindly consented to receive and forward them.
—Yours in service, A Friend of the Work.

A PAPER ON P.S.A. WORK.

BY REV. J. K. NUTTALL, OF LIVERPOOL.

SOME years ago two young men, residing in Liverpool, gained by persevering effort the confidence of a number of coalheavers, won from them the soubriquet of "Our Lads," and at length persuaded them to go with them to the Congregational Chapel they themselves attended. Great was the joy of the two young fellows to sit with their friends and start them on the straight road, as they thought, to Christ and the Christian life. Whilst the novelty of the chapel service lasted all went well, but after a few Sundays they were surrounded by such a loudly snoring company of coalheavers as to make the two young fellows who were responsible for their presence shiver with discomfort. Within four months every man had ceased to attend. When pressed to say why they had left, one of their number said: "Most of us until we went with you had only been twice in a church in our lives, once to be christened, and once to be married, and we don't think we shall go again until we are buried. You have all been very kind to us, but we don't understand anything in the service. It is all 'double Dutch' to us, and we don't think it right to turn your chapel into a sleeping place." Another said: "We are always in the open-air, and your warm comfortable chapel sends us to sleep, but we cannot take part in the service." Their conclusion as a matter of experience was that chapel was no place for them. I may add that the pastor of that church was one of the most earnest and sympathetic of our ministers, and was noted for his genuine interest in every good work.

My friend who narrated to me this episode in his experience of home mission work made this wise comment—that the Church has yet to learn that adaptation of methods to the needs of its constituents is the first element in any successful aggressive Christian effort. The Church should keep to the highest ideals of faith and reverent worship, but should remember that half the population is still in the first standard of Christian training, and very few people have reached the seventh. Is it not a fact that, as a rule, our services are adapted for the few, and not for the many? We arrange our services to suit ourselves, and then lament that the masses of the people tarry away, We offer the higher mathematics to those who are barely familiar even with simple arithmetic. For at least once upon the Sabbath-day we should be of sharing a service which, though not exactly meeting our needs and our tastes, does meet the needs and the tastes of others. It is no use lamenting that the tastes of the people do not chime with our own. The fact is there, and must be reckoned with. They do not like our ornate services, our long sermons, our unfamiliar tunes, our pew rents, our conventional restrictions, our exclusive spirit, our frigid decorum. What they do like is to feel at home. If we can satisfy that feeling we have met one of the chief REASONS FOR THEIR NON-ATTENDANCE.

The Pleasant Sunday Afternoon movement is one proof of this. Do not misunderstand me. I am not advising that the tastes of the people should wholly determine the character of our services. I would not in the least degree lower their tone. I am no advocate for sensationalism. All who know me and my ministry will acquit me of the slightest tendency in that direction. And our Sunday Afternoon Service for men has succeeded without employing sensational methods. One of the most fastidious and cultured men I know said, at the close of one of our services, "Well, Mr. Nuttall, there is not a shred of sensationalism in it from beginning to end." We have the strongest and best speakers and preachers, and the most gifted Christian singers in Liverpool at our service, and all who come are struck with its reverence, devoutness, and sincerity, its freshness and intellectual power, as well as with its brightness, movement, warmth, simplicity, and unconventionalism. And the same can be said of the service conducted at Norwood by my friend, Rev. E. R. Barrett, and others whom I could name. It is said there are P.S.A.'s and P.S.A.'s. To this we object.

A TRUE P.S.A. SERVICE

is what I have described as intended by the gifted and honoured founder of the movement, Mr. Blackham, of West Bromwich. As Dr. Clark, the founder of the Christian Endeavour Society, protests against the appropriation of the name of "Christian Endeavour," when the central ideas of his movement are discarded, so Mr. Blackham and those who are working on his lines have a right to protest against the use of the name "Pleasant Sunday Afternoons," or "Pleasant Sunday Afternoon Adult Bible Class," when it takes the form of a Sunday afternoon's entertainment, or of a religious concert, or of a political or semi-political character. Let the latter be called "The Social Hour," or "The Men's Own," or some such designation. The P.S.A. movement is an outward, visible expression of an inward faith in God and in the Gospel to reclaim the lost. It was born, I verily believe, in the presence of God, and lives, moves, and has its being in the power and truth of God. To quote a sentence from the great leader of the Adult School Movement, Mr. Alderman White: "It was their glory always that the centreing point of their work was the Book of Truth, and that whatever efforts were made for the mind, for the body, or for the recreation and gratification of the scholars, must all spring from the principles they discovered in that Book." This is equally true of the P.S.A., which is very largely an outgrowth of the Adult School Enterprise. In order to keep the movement on the lines laid down by its founder, and for such other purposes as would tend to give it permanence, it might be advisable for Mr. Blackham to summon a council of its promoters in some central place for mutual conference, and if he could give early effect to his intention to issue a P.S.A. magazine to cover the whole work at home and abroad, it would do for the movement generally what is now so well done locally by the P.S.A. News, described in the February number as "The Official Organ of the Nottingham and District Associated P.S.A. Classes." Some such suggestions as those I have made are, in my judgment, highly necessary if this great aggressive agency is to be maintained on that high level that is essential to its abiding usefulness. As I am often asked how to begin and carry on a P.S.A. service, I venture to offer the following suggestions as the outcome of my own experience. For the sake of completeness you will forgive me if I mention some points already touched upon :—

1.—Prayer, earnest, reverent, expectant prayer must be your sheet-anchor. If this be neglected you will fail. Be sure God is with you and that He is leading you before you move.

2.—If possible, hold the service in a place of worship, not a public hall. It makes the men familiar with surroundings to which they have long been strangers, removes old prejudices against ministers of religion, and breaks down the barriers between them and Christian Churches.

3.—Carefully map out the streets within a certain radius of your building for purposes of day-by-day visitation.

4. Aim at non-church-goers, and so work that you will begin with a crowded attendance.

5.—Advertise your first service so thoroughly that the whole town shall know about it, and then no subsequent advertisements will be needed.

6.—Select your workers carefully, and choose the choicest Christian souls you can lay hold of, who will work with you for the highest results, and who will be satisfied with nothing less.

7.—Don't rely upon accessories, but upon the Spirit of God, to give permanence and power to your services.

8.—Let every service be distinctly religious. Aim at claiming and gaining the men for Christ.

9.—Never announce beforehand who will preside, speak, or sing. Train the men to come for the sake of the service itself.

10.—See that your soloists are singers with Christian sympathies, who will use their gifts of song as a Christian ministry. The solo feature is not without its dangers, and should be watched with ceaseless vigilance, lest it should become a mere musical performance.

11.—Character being secured, let your soloists be the very best singers the city possesses, who will both sing well and also articulate their words distinctly.

12.—Choose invariably well-known hymns and tunes; have great variety; the same hymn should not be repeated more than five or six times a year.

13.—If you have a choir, see that it simply leads and does not supplant the song worship of the congregation.

14.—The simpler and more unconventional the service the better. Aim at reality and efficiency. Let this pervade every part of the service. It outlives everything else. There are none more shrewd than working men. They soon detect tinsel and hollow notes, and none despise them more than they do.

15.—Get your speakers from all Evangelical denominations, and let them be the very best speakers in the city—men who can speak with plainness, courage, clearness and force.

16.—As your service is a men's service, it should be throughout strong as well as bright, instructive as well as interesting, wise as well as brotherly.

17.—Your addresses should not be exclusively on lines of Christian socialism on the one hand, or dull, cut and dried Gospel addresses (so-called) on the other. Bible truth should be the basis of the teaching, given in a free unconventional way, and with the accent of personal conviction running right through. "Jesus Christ and Him crucified" is the most acceptable theme to our men when the speaker is a strong, true man.

18.—See that the men get a hearty welcome as they enter; and make them feel at home.

19.—Keep strictly to your time-table: sometimes you may find this a difficult matter, but do your best to keep faith with the men by promptly opening and closing at the time announced.

20.—Keep clear of personal ends. Be fired with the sole object of benefiting the men, and give them a helping hand in every possible way. Make them feel that this is your ruling desire.

21.—Let all who are absent two Sundays be visited, and attend to all sick cases.

22.—Believe the men when they assign a reason for their absence. On no account suspect any of untruthfulness. By trusting them you educate them.

23.—Convene your workers for special prayer at intervals.

If these suggestions be carried out by an earnest and aggressive church, rigidly eschewing all methods not in line with Christian aims, I venture to predict that the result will be a harvest of surpassing richness. So far as I can judge, it has been the most useful and rewarding work in which I have ever been engaged. In it has far exceeded the usefulness of all our other services and agencies. Its growth and extension have been most encouraging. Including the Sunday service for men, the Monday evening service for women, and the Wednesday evening service for both sexes, mainly shop assistants, we have a weekly attendance of nearly 3000 persons, whose names and addresses are in our possession, in addition to the Sunday morning and evening congregations. The extra services are materially increasing the Sunday evening attendance. Carefully planned efforts are being made to meet the intellectual, social, and physical, as well as spiritual needs, of the members. We have a network of auxiliary agencies which I have no time to describe. I could give many striking instances of men rescued from intemperance and vice. I could take you to many homes not only enriched with the nucleus of a valuable library—6000 carefully selected volumes, paid for entirely by the members themselves, having been distributed during the last eighteen months—but also to homes where the richer treasures of buried affections have been found again, where restfulness and comfort have taken the place of worry and wretchedness, and where hearts, dark with despair, have been lit up with the glad and unlooked-for discovery that life is still worth living. I will close my paper with recently received, and referring exclusively to spiritual results. I may say that these are given without any breach of confidence.

March 17, 1893.—"One Sunday afternoon I went for a walk, and more by accident than anything else strolled into your chapel, and for many months I kept going now and again. Of all men I was the most miserable, because I had wandered from God through terrible troubles for about eight years; but just before Christmas last, God took me by the hand into his holy presence, and pardoned all my sins; so I commenced the New Year with my heart brimful of the fullest assurance of God's pardoning love. And now instead of my heart almost bursting with grief whilst listening to the beautiful singing in your services, it is all joy and peace with my soul. May God bless you and the P.S.A., work is my prayer with all my heart."

March 28, 1893.—"As a member of the P.S.A. I have no hesitation personally in stating that to my knowledge many a life has been reformed, and many a home made the brighter and happier as the result of the P.S.A."

April 19, 1893.—"I became a member of your P.S.A. twelve months last February, and for twenty years previously I never entered the house of God—only the day I was married—but I must thank God for his forgiveness to me, and I believe He has forgiven me. If it is God's will to spare you to carry on these meetings, I am sure there will be many thankful to God for it."

April 3, 1893.—"Coming to live in Liverpool, I came to the P.S.A., and I must tell you it has been a great help to me in my daily life. Through the week I long for Sunday afternoon to come. I pray for you to get 'power from on high' to carry on this great work, and it is my desire to bring as many as I can to our service, as I know it will do them good."

April 14, 1893.—"I joined your brotherhood on September 11 last year, and I have not missed since. One practical good resulting from the brotherhood is this—a man who is struggling with poverty, and though he may be a sober man, and having the most need of the comforting truths of religion to soothe him, is yet ashamed to go into some of the churches among the well-dressed people who pay for their pews and hymn-books, and so feels as if he were an intruder; but there is a kind of Christian socialism about the brotherhood which makes him feel at home—at least, that is the case in your chapel, and I pray that God may give you and your band of workers strength and courage to carry on your labour of love."

April 21, 1893.—"I have attended school and chapel in connection with Congregational bodies in various parts of Lancashire and Yorkshire, where my lot has been cast for forty-five years, and I can say that during the whole of that period I have not experienced the same helpfulness, the same simple story of the Gospel and service so beautifully rendered. I am sure there is a great spirit of religious feeling, of sincerity and devotion, in our brotherhood. The half will never be told you till you arrive in the Better Land."

May 1, 1893.—"I feel I ought not to withhold the acknowledgment of my deepening conviction that the work of the P.S.A. is bearing much fruit to the glory of God, and is producing the highest spiritual results. I have attended on almost every occasion for the last eight months, and never without realising great spiritual benefit. I have aimed, when coming and going to and from the services, to mingle with as many of the brotherhood as possible, and I heard from them testimony, invaluable and emphatic, as to blessing received. Even a little of the fruit already gathered amply justifies the movement, and constrains you to go forward in it."

Other testimonies equally emphatic have been given, to which I cannot now refer. Still larger ingatherings, I believe, await us. We shall continue so work on in the spirit of the lines:

Men may misjudge thy aim,
Men may not praise thy name,
Think they have cause for blame,
Say thou art wrong.
Hold on thy quiet way,
Heed not what men may say,
Christ is the judge—not they;
Fear not; be strong.

Quiet Work.

In a recent number of your paper the question was asked, "What could be a more quiet work for God than a tract, leaflet, paper, etc., which drops as silently as a snowflake, and yet brings a benediction from on high?" There may be many of your readers who long to do something for God, but have not the courage to offer a tract or booklet, and never thought of this "dropping." How often we get in and out the trams, omnibuses, or trains, and could "drop" or leave a little tract or booklet behind us.

When pacing these London streets we can drop one seed here and there—sometimes into the flower-girl's basket or the shoeblack's box, and even on the pavement; and with an earnest prayer, will one of those "seeds" be lost? Picked up, perhaps by the very one who was needing the help it contained, or keeping back that one from committing sin, Eternity alone will reveal the results of these seed-sowings.

SOUTH-EAST AFRICA MISSION.—During the temporary absence abroad of the hon. treasurer, Brigade Surgeon Robinson, all communications should be addressed to the hon. superintendents, Mr. and Mrs. Osborn-Howe, care of Mr. Arthur Day, Lancaster-road, Wimbledon.

GOSPEL WORK IN MADEIRA.—We have received several letters from English residents in Madeira, taking exception to statements made in an article under this heading which appeared in our issue for July 27. The writers speak warmly of the good work being done in Mrs. Smart's Protestant Schools, and of "the great knowledge of Scripture" shown by the Portuguese scholars.

WORLD-WIDE EVANGELISATION.—Mr. Nathaniel Northey, of North Malvern, issued a circular, inviting friends to meet in conference on this subject on August 6 and 7. Obstacles arose which led to the postponement of the meeting, but as a few persons came, not knowing of the postponement, he embraced the opportunity of laying his plans before them. A meeting was held at Cradley, near Malvern, on Monday, August 7, when Dr. Harris, of Guernsey, presided. After consideration a resolution was passed, pledging the meeting to aid, by prayer and free-will offerings. In the evening a second meeting was held in Mr. Northey's drawing-room, when the subject was further discussed. Those desiring to know particulars should address Mr. N. Northey, Cowleigh-road, North Malvern.

AWAKENING IN MADAGASCAR.

A Malagasy correspondent of Rev. J. Peill, in recent letters, describes a remarkable awakening in the villages of the island. He says:—

Ramàrosàta and his mother send you greeting. He is a changed character. He is the chief preacher in his native village now, does most of the work of the Church there, and is president of the Y.P.C.E. Society there, too. I went to the meeting one day when he conducted it. He was pleading earnestly with the young people to repent of their sins. Relating his own experience, he told how as a youth he went to school; later was trained as a teacher in the L.M.S. Normal School in the capital; how afterwards, for some years, he was teacher of the school at Antòhibelòma; how the devil overcame him there (and here he sobbed and shed tears, and could not continue for a time), then how he came again to Christ, how he repented of his sins, how Christ willingly received him and forgave his sin, and then he proceeded to plead with his hearers to turn from their sin, and come to Christ, for He would receive them also. He has not yet got employment as a teacher, though he wishes to do so, and especially to go out to the yet unevangelised part of the country.

In my last letter I told you about my visit to Ambòhindorina, where three persons gave themselves to Christ, and to Ikaloy, where eight in all did the same, and now I want to tell you further particulars. On leaving Ambòhinànga we slept at a village by the wayside, for we were caught by the rain, so we entered a large house within a circular enclosure near the road. In this house two orphans, a brother and sister, lived, and one slave about their own age. It grieved me very much to see these children, for there were no mats on the floor, nothing but bare earth. My sorrow for them increased as I discovered how full of superstitious fears they were. When we had finished cooking our rice after dark, and wanted to search for something in the house, they would not let us use a lighted torch, and when one of the men did this, they snatched the torch from his hand, and preferred to seek for what was wanted stumbling about in the dark and knocking their heads against the wall, and for a long time groping about without finding it, rather than carry a light, for it was a tabooed thing to carry lights about after dark in their house, they said.

Our water supply gave out, so we took the cooking pot to go and fetch more, but they seized this, for it is unlucky hey think to carry out a black cooking pot when it is raining, so they preferred to go to and fro many times with a small drinking cup to fetching a larger quantity in an unlucky vessel. When we had finished eating rice one of the men began to sweep up the scattered grains with his hand, when they stopped him saying that that also was tabooed in their house. Many were the taboos they observed, and even of the fowl that we ate without rice some parts were tabooed by them as being unlucky to eat.

Alas, for their ignorance! So I began to teach them, for I found they knew their letters (alphabet), and by bedtime they could spell out words pretty well. I showed them, too, how foolish it was to observe meaningless taboos like those they had been explaining to me. They agreed to what I said, and showed me a number of old torn books, which had belonged to their father, and which they kept shut up in an old box. I discovered that these were children of Christian parents, who had been cheated by the devil, so I invited them both to come and live with me and be my children, and I would bring them up as my own. They both consented, and I would gladly have brought them up with my own children, though it would have greatly added to my burdens, if it would bring them to the Lord. However, this plan fell through, for when I returned to fetch them afterwards, they refused to come with me, as their fellow villagers objected, thinking it would be a disgrace to the community.

We indeed thank God for Radòja, Rakotomanga, and Rajamaria. These three young men are my companions, who go with me to the various churches I visit in the country. They are most unwearied, though the distances are sometimes great, and God's blessing clearly rests upon their labours for Him. Every address we give includes a call to sinners to come to Christ, and that is indeed what we long that they should do, and our prayers that we offer are earnest cries to our heavenly Father to draw sinners to Christ.

If we pass a village where we see a number of people sitting about sunning themselves, we enter it, sing a hymn, and when the people are gathered together we read the Scriptures to them and then preach. Nearly every alternate Sunday we go out into the country villages in this way, and Rasòamanana sometimes joins us, but is often unable to do so because of his weakness and ill-health. In all we have thus visited sixteen villages. The total number of those who have made public confession of Christ in those villages, including sixty-one scholars from the united schools, amounts to 353 persons. Most of these are old scholars in the schools; many are slaves, and these are often the first to rise in the churches; I should think about 100, or nearly that number, are slaves; some are old people.

The three evangelists in the district are gladdened and yet burdened by these new converts; burdened, because it increases their work to have to teach these apart, and in addition to all their other work, besides having to go from village to village to teach them; gladdened, because the number of their friends and helpers is thus increased as these new converts join the churches. A few, after six months' trial, have been received into the Church; others, after two months of testing, have received baptism; the rest are under instruction for baptism now.

DR. BARNARDO'S EMIGRANTS.

A special meeting was held in Lower Exeter Hall, on Wednesday afternoon, in connection with the departure of Dr. Barnardo's fifty-fourth party for Canada. Some 172 boys were present, fifty or sixty being big lads from the Labour Home, and the others little fellows from Leopold, Sheppard, and Stepney Homes. The lads, who lined either side of the hall, were in themselves the strongest possible testimonial to the good care and treatment which the waifs and strays of London receive when they come under the influence of Dr. Barnardo and his associates in rescue work. Sturdy, happy, alert-looking fellows, from the youngest to the oldest, they bore in their faces and demeanour as they stood up to be introduced a disciplined independence which had no taint of servility or degradation, and was therefore good to see.

Mr. S. Gurney Sheppard, who presided, expressed the hope that every success would attend the labours of the young emigrants in the new land for which they were so soon to set sail.

Dr. Barnardo said that he hoped the result of the meeting would be to stir up the sympathy of Christian people, so that the opportunities and privileges hitherto enjoyed by the boys might be continued. It was gratifying to know that the good influences which the lads carry out with them proved a shield and a safeguard in the hour of temptation. Only honest lads and those having a spotless record were ever sent out to Canada. He regarded it as the highest privilege to be able to help those who were willing to help themselves. Up to December 31, 1892, 5737 boys had been emigrated; in March of this year, 311; in June, 287; and now about 200, making a total of 6530. It was very gratifying to know that only two per cent. of the boys thus emigrated turned out failures, this good result being doubtless due to the supervision, watchful care, and constant keeping in hand, which form so essential a part in the organising work.

In the course of his address Dr. Barnardo told of one boy sent out some years ago to Canada, and now the superintendent of a home for rescued boys (children of English emigrants) in a South American city. Detailing another sad case, he mentioned that the poor mother of one of the little boys now going to Canada was, in her despair, about to commit suicide, and murder as well, from the parapet of London Bridge, when a poor working-girl noticed her, spoke kindly to her, and went with her (though it was nearly midnight) to the all-night shelter opened by Dr. Barnardo, thus saving life and saving a sinner. The mother is now doing well, the boy is being set up in life, and all, humanly speaking, through the thoughtful kindness of a girl who herself has to work hard for a living. A few words followed by Mr. Baker, and the boys were commended to God in prayer.

A WINTER CONVENTION IN LONDON.—"An Old Reader" writes to ask whether a winter convention on the deepening of the spiritual life could not be arranged for in London, for the benefit of those who are unable to get to Keswick or any of the other provincial summer assemblies.

For the Young.

THE SWEETEST NAME.

You have probably heard the story of the Queen of Languages, who is said to have offered a prize for the person who should write down the sweetest word in the world. Among the replies that were sent in, one was from a miser who thought that "gold" was the sweetest word. Another was from a young man full of ambition, bent upon reaching a high position, and having his praises sung by others. He wrote the word "fame." A third was from a sailor, just returned from a long voyage. Do you wonder that he wrote the word "home"? A fourth wrote the name "mother"; and the Queen is said to have lingered over that word in doubt whether any sweeter would be found. But there was yet another slip on which was written the name of "Jesus"; and by universal consent that was allowed to be the sweetest name of all. Do you not think the decision was right?

I want to give you a little Bible reading in order to show that whatever there may be in the other words that appears worth the having is found in a better sense in this one word JESUS.

Have we not gold in Jesus? Read Prov. viii. 18, 19—"Riches and honour are with Me; yea, durable riches and righteousness. My fruit is better than GOLD, yea, than fine gold; and my revenue than choice silver." Wisdom, who speaks here, is Jesus.

Have we not fame in Jesus? See Prov. iv. 8, 9—"Exalt her and she shall promote thee; she shall bring thee to honour, when thou dost embrace her. She shall give to thine head an ornament of grace; a CROWN OF GLORY shall she deliver to thee." Is not that better fame than the young man desired?

Have we not home in Jesus? The Psalmist says we have. "Because thou hast made the Lord, which is my refuge, even the Most High, thy habitation, there shall no evil befall thee, neither shall any evil come nigh thy DWELLING" (Psa. xci. 9, 10). Is not that a better home than earth can provide? Protect our homes as we may, there are certain forms of evil which not only "come nigh," but actually enter in. Here is a HOME absolutely and eternally secure. Will you not dwell in Him.

Can we say that mother is in Jesus? Look at Isa lxvi. 13: "As one whom his MOTHER comforteth, so will I comfort you; and ye shall be comforted in Jerusalem." He will be to us just what the mother is when the child is in trouble and needs her most.

Do you not see that if you have Him you have all the other things as well? Without Him you may have gold, but what can that do for you in your time of deepest need? And how soon it may all flee away. Without Him you may have fame, but what will your fame appear when you look back upon it from an eternity without Christ? Without Him you may have home, but that cannot be yours for ever. Dark shadows are already in your home, and chairs are vacant that once were occupied by those you loved. Without Him you may have mother, but tender as that tie is it must be severed. Oh, to lose all these, and then to find them in perfection in Jesus. Is not this "the sweetest name"?

THE AFFECTION SHOWN TO A CHILD, which has not its basis upon reason, is liable to bring the child to shame, and the parent to sorrow.

THE SKYLARK.

Psalm cviii.

When soft, through shadows dim and grey,
Breaks forth the gladsome dawn of day,
Then from her lowly grassy bed
The sweet-voiced lark lifts up her head.
Away, away, on eager wings
She soars, and gay her matin rings,
As in the fair blue heavens above
She warbles forth her song of love.
O God, we pray Thee evermore,
Give us the wings of faith to soar
Above earth's strife, and sin, and care,
Thyself our Heaven everywhere.
Then shall our spirits, fixed on Thee,
Sing of thy love eternally.

HARRIET JULIA EVANS.

A SIMPLE STORY.

BY SISTER EMMELINE.

It is only a simple little story, and no very uncommon one perhaps; but it is worth telling. There is a woman old and very poor; all the doors of life are closing or are already closed to her, except the large door of the workhouse. The story is about her, or rather about a little child who has become bound up with her life.

It happened in this way. Some time ago a young woman, deserted by the father of her child, was in great difficulty. She was necessarily obliged to work for her own support, but she was hindered by her duties as a mother. This old woman came forward willingly to take entire charge and responsibility of the child for a weekly payment of five shillings. The agreement was made.

The old and empty heart opened wide to the touch of the baby-hand, and took the baby in. The lonely life, stripped of all its belongings, wove itself up with the little life just started on its journey. Love stepped in and sealed the bond. The mother saw—as everybody could soon see—that the nurse would not part from her charge for any consideration; so the payments stopped. But the light stayed in the old woman's face.

There were two ways out of the difficulty: to force the mother to a sense of her duty by thrusting the child back upon her hands, or to apply to the relieving officer on the baby's behalf. Strangely enough, neither thought occurred to the old woman as a possibility. Her little Daisy to know the miseries of neglect or of untender tendance! No; oh no! Anything rather than that! Everything could go. She would lose all rather than the love that had become more to her than life.

The winter came—the long hard winter of 1892, and its icy hand pressed heavily upon her, and put her endurance to a severe test. The child needed clothing; so did she herself, for the matter of that. There is always a last resource, after all. The woman cut up her own underskirt to make warm little garments which should protect her darling from the cold, and in the warmth of her brave old heart set the frost at defiance.

"Wardour Daisy" was the name she gave the child in baptism, because it was in "Wardour" Mission Hall that the brightest moments of their two lives (the old and the young) had been spent: because, she said herself at the time, "the only bit of brightness she has had, you know, has been in dear old Wardour." So Daisy grew in love's warm sunshine; laughter woke in the brown eyes and dimpled the little mouth, and she learned to wave her arms and clap her hands to the tune—the favourite in Wardour Hall—"O happy day," and by-and-by to stamp out the time on the floor with sturdy feet. No one had a right of the place more recognised than Wardour Daisy.

Then a dark cloud cast its gloom over the many who loved her; she was taken very ill. The old woman waited on her with ceaseless, unwearying devotion; sorrow looked at you out of the dim old eyes with pleading helplessness. But she did not pray God to spare the little one's life, because, after all, it might be best—best for Daisy to go first. She only prayed, with all the reality that death brings in its approach, that God would be kind enough to let her die, too, directly afterwards if He took the baby, because she felt she could not go on living. But, after all, it did not much matter what happened to her if her little one were safe in the keeping of "Our Father." Then she made a confession—how in worst moments, when faith cowered before the fear of the future, she had wondered whether it would be wicked to take Daisy in her arms, and sink with her into the river. She had asked herself whether God would not forgive her. He would know it was not for her own sake she had done it.

But little Daisy was left in her London home to grow sweeter than ever, and to twine closer round the hearts of those who love her. And now, the old woman is nearly starving; resources are waning; the hand of age presses heavily, and strength fails. Think of it, in this city of reckless extravagance and heedless gaiety!

Are not the facts of this simple story in themselves an appeal to "the human heart" in those who possess this world's good things?

That is no true alms which the hand can hold:
He gives only the worthless gold
Who gives from a sense of duty.
But he who gives but a slender mite,
And gives to that which is out of sight,
That thread of the all-sustaining beauty
Which runs through all and doth all unite—
The hand cannot grasp the whole of his alms;
The heart outstretches its eager palms,
For a God goes with it, and makes it store
For the soul that was starving in darkness before.

There are some who, reading this simple story, will feel anew that old throb of joy that always comes with the thought that the sweetest flowers of human nature are blooming by the wayside. Their hearts will respond to the need there is for their sympathy and help. Let me add, that Daisy's mother is now married to another man, and cares nothing, let happen to the child what may. There are no known relatives to share the burden of responsibility resting upon the woman who has filled the mother's place. Any communication on the subject should be addressed to Sister Elsie, West London Mission, 10, Fitzroy-square, W., who has shared by constant sympathy the joys and the sorrows and the cares of which some idea has been given in these few lines.

COMING CONGRESSES.

EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE CONFERENCE.—The forty-seventh annual Conference of the Evangelical Alliance will be held in Dublin on Sept. 25—28. The subjects for addresses will include the following:—"The Bible our sole rule of Faith," "Possibilities of Faith," "Reasons for Faith," "The adaptation of the Bible to the moral necessities of man," "Life in Christ," "Christ and the masses," "Loyalty to Jesus Christ," "Undenominationalism—not Indefiniteness," "Foreign Missions." Among those who have promised to take part in the Conference are—The Archbishop of Dublin, Dean of Connor, Archdeacon Taylor, Dean of Achonry, General Noble, Principal Culross, Canon Bell, Revs. Charles Spurgeon, John Bond, E. N. Thwaites, Dr. MacEwan, Principal Waller, Dr. Nicholas, W. Roberts, Dr. M'Cheyne Edgar, J. F. T. Hallowes, Dr. Murray Mitchell, W. E. Burroughes, H. D. Brown, and others. The programme and all information may be obtained of Mr. A. J. Arnold, general secretary, 7, Adam-street, Strand, W.C.

THE CHURCH CONGRESS.—The official programme of the Birmingham Congress (October 3—6) shows in the Bingley Hall a series of working men's meetings. At the first Major Seton Churchill will discuss the question, "How to reach the careless and non-churchgoers" and the Bishop of Wakefield, Mr. T. Dickie, Archdeacon Farrar, and Rev. H. Foster Pegg will deal with other aspects of work among artisans. "Licensing Reform" is the subject of the second working men's meeting, when the Bishop of Chester will expound the advantages of his scheme; Mr. Stafford Howard that of the C.E.T.S.; and the Dean of Armagh and Canon Wilberforce will defend the Local Veto. "The Church's Connection with the State: What we gain, or lose, by it, and what readjustments are practicable," will command interest in the hands of Canon Jacob, Canon the Hon. W. H. Fremantle, the Bishop of Ripon, Alderman Phillips, the Dean of Norwich, and Rev. G. S. Reaney. The last meeting in the Congress Hall will be devotional. Subject, "The Christian Ideal of Home Life," when Canon Newbolt and Prebendary Webb-Peploe will speak, and the Bishop of Hull, the Dean of Bristol, and Archdeacon Perowne read papers. The "general subjects" to be discussed in the Town-hall are, Education, Church Reform, the Anglican Communion, social and labour questions, the relations of the Church to other religious bodies, the financial condition of the clergy, foreign missions, and the Church and the Press.

IT IS OF GREAT IMPORTANCE to get a child to see that thought for others is a pleasure. But how is it to be done? It cannot be done by any but the gentlest means.

NOTES ON DAILY READINGS.

SUNDAY, AUGUST 20.—PSALM X.

This Psalm gives us the creed of the ungodly. His inner heart is laid open, and his secret thoughts and sayings are detailed. Whilst on the one hand he hotly pursues the poor, on the other he renounces and contemns the Lord. When a man acts as though there were no God, he comes to think that there is none. It is remarkable to follow the various items in his thoughts. He says: "He will not require it; there is no God; I shall not be moved; God hath forgotten; He will never see it." There may have been times in our own lives when we have reasoned thus with ourselves, and have drifted on into deeper and darker guilt.

What a prayer is that which arises from the Psalmist's heart. He summons Jehovah to rise from his throne, and raise his arm for one shattering blow. They had said, God forgets (v. 11); the Psalmist pleads that He would not forget (v. 12). They had said, God will not require, but God must and will take the cause of his people into his hand (v. 14).

In our helplessness let us commit ourselves to God. He was always the helper of the fatherless, and He will always be. The great deeds wrought in the extirpation of the Canaanites proved that God was the everlasting King, and what He did in the old time He can do again for his people. The desire of the meek has a voice which God hears, and He will not fail to defend their cause against the man who is of the dust.

MONDAY, AUGUST 21.—PSALM XI.

This Psalm may date from the days of Saul's persecution, or of Absalom's conspiracy. It tells how timid counsellors advised flight. Men often come to us with the best intentions in dark and difficult days, persuading us to flee to some strong mountain of refuge; and they found their arguments, first, on the bended bow and the winged arrow; and, secondly, on the rocking foundations that threaten to give way. Worldly policy is always great in its fear and in its suggestion of expedients. "What can the righteous do?" He may not put forth his hands to iniquity, and he must not use force: then, surely, he can do nothing better than follow the example of bird or deer, and find refuge in flight. So men speak.

But, on the other hand, God is in heaven; He has not vacated his throne; He will see that all wrong is righted. Not the mountains, but the temple of his presence is the true asylum of the persecuted soul. He is ever testing and trying the souls of men, especially of the righteous. Those who stand the test receive his grace of love as a crown of life, whilst those that love violence are rejected and punished.

TUESDAY, AUGUST 22.—PSALM XII.

When godly men look around them their hearts are like to break for the ungodliness of their times. The nearer they live to God the more sensitive they are, as the musician's ear is keenest for discords. There seems then nothing for us but to cry for help from God. Sometimes an Elijah thinks that he only is left. "The godly cease, the faithful fail."

The sins which the Psalmist singles out are those of the tongue. The vanity, the flattery, the duplicity, the arrogance of the speech. Ah, how rife are such amongst ourselves! There is a corruptness in the talk even of professing Christians which would horrify us, if we were not so prone to it ourselves, and so accustomed to it in others. We are men of unclean lips, and dwell among people of unclean lips; and how unclean we do not realise until we see the King, the Lord of hosts.

But what a marvellous change comes over the Psalmist's mind as he turns from earth to heaven, from man to God. He seems to detect the voice of Jehovah as He prepares to vindicate his own. Note the alternative reading of v. 5, "I will set him in the safety he panteth for." Oh, blessed words! To the Psalmist they seem to be like a stream of silver flowing earthward free of dross. And he turns to God to asseverate the Divine statement. He says in effect, it shall be so. To God's I will he answers, Thou shalt. The answer may appear delayed whilst the wicked walk on every side and vileness is exalted, but the end is guaranteed by words in which there is no alloy of falsehood.

WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 23.—PSALM XIII.

The Psalmist is weary. He has long been waiting for deliverance that does not come. The face of God does not emerge from behind the cloud. And whatever He may be thinking, and however He may be acting, the oppressed wants an interposition that shall relieve his situation. For long the tried soul had been planning its own deliverance; for many a day, and all the day, it had been full of sorrow, and its enemy had vaunted itself as Peninnah over Hannah.

Then the oppressed turns to God. There are three petitions in this prayer. "Consider," i.e., "look my way"; "answer"; "lighten mine eyes, lest they glaze with death." What anguish there is in this heart! How good to know that it has been so long at rest, and that from the vantage point of glory it sees that the way it trod was the best. Long ere now, the enemies and avengers have been stilled, its sorrow has been turned to joy, and the shadow of death into the everlasting morning. He who feared being moved is now an immoveable pillar in the temple of God.

THURSDAY, AUGUST 24.—PSALM XIV

In the Bible, fool stands for the morally and wilfully blind. A man gives himself up to lust or selfishness, and so destroys the organ by which alone he can discern the Almighty. With such a creed, is it to be wondered at that the soul sinks always deeper into evil? "They are corrupt," loathsome and infectious. "They are not good."

But, ah, how awful is the contrast between their evil and the silent watch of God, who seeks amid the sons of men for those whose heart is perfect towards Him, but so often seeks in vain. All have gone aside; all have become filthy; there is none that doeth good. These words quoted in Rom. iii. prove man's sinnership. But God does not only search for his saints; He speaks as though He were prepared to send another deluge to sweep the world clear of its inhabitants. Note that one of the three charges made in the fourth verse is that they call not upon God. Such a resolve on the part of God may well put his foes in great fear.

The Psalmist addresses the oppressor, and dares him to frustrate the counsel of the poor, who has made the Lord his refuge. Let all the lions of Bashan ring one saint around with their bellowing; yet, if he has made God his refuge, they expend their strength in vain. The Psalm ends with a sigh. Oh, Saviour of Israel, make haste to come out of Zion, to turn back the face of the foe, and to bring again thy captive people; for thy salvation brings joy and gladness in its train, as the keel of the vessel stirs the phosphorescence of the sea at night.

FRIDAY, AUGUST 25.—PSALM XV.

It is a solemn inquiry with which this Psalm begins. We want to know who may be the guests of Jehovah, sojourning in his tent (R.V. marg. v. 1) and dwelling in his holy hill, because to be there is to be safe and blessed. The tent of the Eastern is a sure sanctuary to those who are permitted to enter therein.

The answer is full and forcible. We must walk uprightly, our eyes toward heaven, away from the baits and dainties of earth. We must work righteousness as well as talk about it. Our heart must be true. All the remaining characteristics are negative, and the first three refer to that government of the tongue which has already occupied so much of our thought. Christian men would surely be more careful in the management of their speech if they realised how important an index it is to character.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 26.—PSALM XVI.

If it be true that this Psalm emanates from a bold confession made in the face of idolatry and apostasy, we can understand David asking to be preserved. It is a great thing when the soul can say to God, "Thou art mine, there is no good for me outside the precincts of thy nature and appointment." And such a choice of God makes the soul cleave to his saints, and say of them, "They are all my delight."

Our love to the saints makes us turn to contemplate with horror the sins of those who forsake God. In contrast to their evil choice, we may well turn to God, and find in Him our all in all.

The second section of this Psalm begins at v. 5, and is extremely beautiful. We may have no portion in this life, but God is our heritage, and He makes Himself responsible for maintaining us in it. And what could the soul want more than God? Is not the sun enough for a flower, and the ocean for a fish? Let us too break forth into song, and set the Lord always before us, and listen to his voice speaking in our heart, in the night. Make your choice of God; then your heart will sing. Your flesh shall be in safety. Though you descend into Sheol you shall not stay there. Though you are surrounded by death it shall not hold you, but you shall pass out and up upon the path of life, following the ascension track of Christ and into the presence of God, seated with Christ in heavenly places, and drinking deep draughts of the cup of heavenly delight.

INTERNATIONAL S. S. LESSONS.

AUGUST 27.

PAUL BEFORE AGRIPPA, Acts xxvi. 19-32.

GOLDEN TEXT, 1 Cor. i. 24.

PORCIUS FESTUS, appointed governor in A.D. 60 in place of Felix, was in many respects a better man than his predecessor. Though described as "a cynic in philosophy and a sceptic in religion," he was much more upright as a judge than his predecessor. His visit to Jerusalem, and his interview there with the high priest who informed him against Paul; his refusal to have a trial in Jerusalem; the trial in Cæsarea, and Paul's appeal to Cæsar—all are related in xxv. 1-12.

Among those who came to congratulate the new governor were King Agrippa II. and his sister Bernice (xxv. 13). Agrippa was the son of Herod Agrippa I., whose miserable death is recorded in chap. xii. By successive grants from the Emperors Claudius and Nero, he had obtained as his dominion the country east of the Upper Jordan and a part of Galilee. Bernice was his own sister, and was also sister to Drusilla, the wife of Felix (xxiv. 24). She had been first the wife of her uncle Herod, king of Chalcis, then of Ptolemon, king of Cilicia, but had left him, and was living in unholy alliance with Agrippa.

Our lesson introduces us into the palace at Cæsarea, where these two, and Festus, and a large company of notable persons, are present (xxv. 23) "in great pomp," and Paul, bound to a Roman soldier, is introduced to tell his story. The prediction spoken to Ananias is being fulfilled (ix. 15).

His address opens with words as wise as they were courteous, for they seemed to commit Agrippa to give a true decision (2, 3). A brief statement of Paul's early life follows (4, 5); then the account of his conversion (9-18).

19, 20. Having seen the vision, two courses were open to the Apostle. He could either do violence to his conscience and refuse to obey; or he could at once and entirely yield himself to serve the Lord whom he had persecuted. Either course had its difficulties. The first will save him from much present suffering, but expose him to fearful judgment at the last; the second, while giving him the joy of a peaceful conscience, will involve much persecution. Did he not make a good decision?

21, 22. The help continually given to him from God proved the wisdom of his choice. From the Jews he had nothing but opposition, with intent to put him to death; from God he had deliverance, which enabled him to continue his witness. If you fear to meet difficulty for Christ's sake, it is because you do not know, or will not believe in, the sufficiency of his grace.

23—25. The interruption by Festus is characteristic of the man. To him all religions were alike worthless. Paul's reply is as dignified and courteous as it is faithful. Which is the sane man—he who lives in the present, forgetful of the eternal future, or he who gives away all the life to come for the passing unsatisfactory pleasures of this world? (See Luke xv. 17.)

26—29. From Festus, Paul turns to Agrippa with a direct and personal appeal. To believe the prophets is to be committed practically to believe in Jesus. The reply of the king has caused much controversy. In our version it would represent him as almost persuaded to become a Christian. But the Revised Version gives a different sense, and represents Agrippa as sneering at the idea of becoming a Christian with such little persuasion. If that be accepted, we may regard Agrippa as being moved deeply by Paul's address; but as unwilling to let his impressions be known, and endeavouring to get rid of them with a sneer. Many others have repeated his folly. Whichever rendering is adopted, Paul's answer shows that the matter is no jest to him. Lifting up the chains that bound him, he said, "Except these bonds, would that ye were all as I am." It was a noble testimony, all the more impressive from such a prisoner.

30—32. Was the address fruitless? So far as the conversion of either Festus or Agrippa was concerned, yes. But among his hearers may there not have been some who heard and heeded his witness? It did, however, serve to vindicate Paul (31), and it may explain how Agrippa, some years later, during the great Jewish war, showed particular kindness to the Christians.

A useful way of enforcing the lesson of this narrative is to contrast the three chief characters in it. Paul, an obedient servant of Jesus, the freest and noblest man in that assembly; Festus, to whom all religion is unreal, a thorough man of the world, who never deems these things worthy a thought; Agrippa, more or less impressed, but unable to follow his convictions, partly because of his sinful union with Bernice, therefore treating his own convictions with a sneer.

The "College by Post."

Among talented women of the present day the name of Miss Mary L. G. Petrie, B.A., well deserves mention. She is known as one of the most eloquent of lady speakers, as the president of the "College by Post," and as the author of a very successful book entitled "Clews to Holy Writ." She has frequently been mentioned in these pages in connection with various religious and philanthropic works, but the objects that lie nearest to her heart are foreign missions and the higher education of women. To the promotion of these she devotes her time and talents.

Miss Petrie was born under the shadow of the Royal Staff College, York Town, Surrey, where her father, Colonel Martin Petrie, was highly distinguished as a student, and subsequently occupied the position of examiner for eighteen years. Her ancestors, on both sides, were Scottish; and piety and loyalty have been their characteristics for many generations. Her grandfather, Commissary-General Petrie, was the friend of Count Guicciardini, and in the early part of this century distributed Bibles among the people of Italy. Her father, Colonel Martin Petrie, who entered into rest on November 19, 1892, was a faithful servant of his God and of his country. He is well remembered for a gallant exploit of his adventurous youth: the rescue of the French ship Vesta, when a passenger on board her, in 1855. He took an active interest in philanthropic work, particularly the Latymer-road Mission and Mrs. Meredith's institutions, of which he was for many years trustee. Miss Petrie's mother was Eleanora Grant Macdowall, one of the Macdowalls of Garthland, in Scotland.

Under the loving and watchful care of her parents, Miss Petrie grew up a strong, healthy girl, both physically and mentally; thus she was fully fitted to enter on the severe strain of working for the University of London degree, and of organising the "College by Post." As is the case with many important undertakings, the seed from which the College sprang was a very tiny one. In 1880 Miss Caroline Cavendish founded the Christian Women's Education Union, with the twofold object of "raising the intellectual standard of religious education and bringing definite religious influence to bear upon higher education." Mrs. Petrie was one of the original members of this union, and in consequence of a suggestion from Miss Cavendish, her daughter undertook to give aid in study to two or three girls who were unable to avail themselves of professional teaching. This informal correspondence class was mentioned in The Girl's Own Paper in 1881, and the result was an avalanche of letters from all parts of the country asking for the proffered aid.

It is characteristic of Miss Petrie that, no matter how numerous the claims upon her attention, she always manages to make time for another, if by so doing she can assist or comfort. Though she had still the hardest part of her own University career before her, with the help of friends classes were organised, to assist by correspondence girls whose school days were over, and who were unable to obtain other aid in carrying on their studies.

"They that water others shall themselves be watered," and Miss Petrie's private work did not suffer in consequence of her consideration for others. In 1883 she took her degree with honours in classics, modern languages, mental and moral science, English literature and history. She also won numerous prizes at University College, London, including the composition prize for her poem "Amaranth." She was the first woman to gain the scholarship in philosophy and logic.

After this, Miss Petrie had more leisure for the College by Post, which seeks to promote the systematic study of Holy Scripture, as well as to give secular instruction to girls over sixteen years of age. All the teachers give their services gratuitously; the students have no expense save a nominal sum to defray postage. There are at the present time over 3000 students, each of whom devotes half-an-hour daily to Bible study, and may join one or more secular classes. The staff consists of over 200 ladies, many of whom have had a University education, and all of whom are well qualified for the position they hold. Both students and teachers are in direct communication with the president, and none but those who have been with Miss Petrie in her study can have any idea of the enormous amount of labour, both of hand and head, that is involved in such an undertaking.

Miss Petrie is a devoted member of the Church of England, and the daily lessons of that church are followed by some of the classes. Others belong to various well-known Bible-reading unions, but sixty out of seventy Scripture classes have chosen the "Chronological Scripture Cycle." This scheme for reading the Bible through chronologically in three years, was originally worked out by the president, in a set of twelve pamphlets for the use of the College. Within a short time 3000 of these papers had been subscribed for, not only by the students, but by others who wished to follow out the scheme at their leisure. So numerous were the requests for them, that on December 20, 1892, the complete course, revised and enlarged, was published in the volume, "Clews to Holy Writ."

Miss Petrie is a warm advocate of the cause of temperance, but her most burning and eloquent words are on the subject of foreign missions. As the proceeds of some lectures, for which tickets were sold, she was able to send in £100 to the Church Missionary Society. In the "College by Post" she is unremitting in her endeavours to stir up interest in the subject; and several members, both teachers and students, have gone abroad to carry the Gospel to the heathen. One of the latest additions to the College is a class to study the Expansion of Christendom. The papers, prepared by the president, include a sketch of Missionary History from the Day of Pentecost to the present time, illustrated by the lives of great representative missionaries. In answer to very many requests, this class, and also one of the C.S.C. classes, have been thrown open to young men.

It is reserved for those who are acquainted with Miss Petrie personally, to know her gentle, kindly nature, and her simple and unaffected manner. She is not by any means the middle-aged person that her correspondents often imagine her to be. A friend remarked to me once, "Miss Petrie may be a blue-stocking, but if so, the material is of the finest silk." She is emphatically a Christian gentlewoman, and her sweet and gracious influence is felt by all who come in contact with her.

Since the above was written we have learned of Miss Petrie's engagement to Professor Ashley Carus-Wilson, the youngest son of the late Rev. C. Carus-Wilson, vicar of St. Mark's, Leamington, and grandson of the late Rev. W. Carus-Wilson, of Casterton Hall, Westmoreland. The wedding will (D.V.) take place at the end of August, the bride and bridegroom sailing immediately for Montreal, where the latter is Professor of Electrical Engineering at McGill University. This is a distinguished post for so young a man. No new students can be admitted into the "College by Post" for the present, as fresh arrangements must be made for carrying on the work.

DEVONSHIRE.—In connection with the evangelistic labours of Mr. Henry Varley at Barnstaple and Ilfracombe (referred to in our last issue), a day of conference was held in both towns, to which hundreds came. In the meeting at Barnstaple Mr. Robert Chapman (in his ninety-first year) spoke with power and great acceptance. The scene at Ilfracombe on Tuesday last week will abide in many hearts as a grateful memory. Before separating Mr. Varley asked all believers present who would receive the Christ of God to be still more definitely the real and practical power of their present daily life, to rise. To this appeal the response was almost unanimous.

CHINA INLAND MISSION.

NORTH AMERICAN BRANCH.

It has been our privilege to tarry for a brief season under the hallowed roof of Mr. and Mrs. Frost, mingling with devoted men and women, wholly consecrated to the one object of proclaiming the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ to the heathen in China. It seemed to be truly a home of love and rest for the Lord's people.

In the five days we saw in that house about 200 of the dear children of God, going and coming. Some were missionaries on furlough, going forth as the way opened to the churches in North America, bearing testimony to the Lord's faithfulness during long years in China. Others were journeying to distant States to attend conferences, while some were filling pulpits in the neighbouring towns in Canada, and taking Bible classes in the surrounding villages.

Mr. Frost has many opportunities of witnessing for the Master, both far and near. The deepening of spiritual life and strengthening of faith in the believer, is a special work given him to do. As director of this branch of the China Inland Mission, his whole life is consecrated to that important work, and he is ably assisted in it by his devoted partner in life. Their self-abnegation and love to all saints are as fragrance poured forth.

The lady candidates who were accepted for foreign service, and were awaiting the means for transit to China, were learning many precious lessons, as they shared in the daily life, assisting in the office work, and taking part in the various domestic duties. A certain time was allowed to the study of the Chinese language, and in many ways they were being tested as to their fitness and capability for going forth as accredited workers to win souls among the heathen. How helpful must such training be to those who have been called of the Lord to go forth in his name!

Most cheering was the gathering on the Friday evening for prayer for China, a truly model meeting of over one hundred, filled with one theme—the needs of China. How the heart of our blessed Lord must have rejoiced as prayer after prayer ascended from both the aged and the young. Mr. M'Carthy led in earnest remarks, drawing lessons from the life of Jabez. It was quite plain that many young hearts were there, longing to be called forth to the fields in yonder land of Sinnim. They were enjoined to wait on, and not weary; in due time the gates of brass would open, and hindrances would be removed; meanwhile there is a life to be lived for Christ in their own homes. Seeking to win souls there would test their fitness; they were to trust on, and not be afraid.

Mr. Frost's home is a real practical school, giving experience in nursing the poor in their own homes; taking part in Missions in the slums; house-to-house visitation; cottage prayer-meetings; studying the principles and practices of the China Inland Mission.

Several youthful candidates are learning the lesson of trust in the living God, and to-day they went forth for a couple of months, with a Bible carriage, to the villages and towns in Ontario, to sell the Scriptures and preach the Gospel. Surely these young men will in due time be valiant missionaries among the millions in China. They also are members of this happy community, enduring hardness as good soldiers of the Lord Jesus.

Much more could be said of visitors being rested and cared for for the Master's sake, going back to their daily round of duty by tarrying here for a season. This little sketch is given that the Lord's children in England may remember these friends in prayer; that his servants in Toronto may be upheld by their pleadings at the throne of grace, and much praise redound to the glory of God.

THE TRAMCAR AND OMNIBUS TEXT MISSION has now carried on its service for about ten years. The growth has been gradual but sure, the first year's income being under £30. The cost of advertising one text is ten shillings a year, and since the last report three new ones have been exhibited, making a total of 262 texts which are now before the public eye. The aim of the Mission is a very simple one; it is to bring the inspired and momentous utterances of Scripture before the notice of those who never read the Divine Word for themselves. The secretary is Mrs. Wood, 1, King Edward-street, E.C.

MISS ANNIE R. TAYLOR,

CHINESE MISSIONARY AND TRAVELLER IN TIBET.

THE heroism of faith finds fresh illustration in the remarkable journey accomplished by this young sister into the jealously-secluded regions of Tibet proper. Going in faith, believing that the Lord had sent her, she traversed thousands of miles where no European foot had ever trodden before. We are aware that certain travellers have crossed Tibet in various directions, but few indeed have penetrated Inner Tibet; and of those known to have reached Lhassa, only two have returned to tell the tale. Apart, however, from any question of priority, the journey just completed is of peculiar interest in that it was definitely undertaken by faith, and in order to open the way for the Gospel.

Miss A. R. Taylor was early led to the knowledge of Jesus. Her thoughts were first directed to the heathen when a school girl at Richmond. Dr. Moffat's son gave an address on Africa, which greatly impressed at least one of his young hearers. The place and power of women in missions had not then been discovered, and the whole drift of the speaker's appeal was for young men. His idea was, however, so forceful that the sympathetic young pupil almost wished she were a boy that she might go at once. From that time she read all the missionary literature she could obtain, and pondered the theme constantly. Some years later she found that the Lord wanted women for China, that they were being accepted and sent out by the China Inland Mission, and that their labours were being blessed in the Flowery Land. When very young she read in "Near Home and Far Off" accounts of that strange mysterious region so rigidly closed against Europeans, and in this way Tibet seems to have laid hold of her mind.

In due course Miss Taylor offered herself and was accepted by the China Inland Mission. In 1884 she went out to China, and having learned the language, worked for a time in Tau-chau, near the Tibetan frontier. She was the first English person to reside in this city, and in 1887 visited the Great Lama monastery of Kum-bum, where the French priests, MM. Gabet and Huc, had previously learned Tibetan. Beyond this point no English traveller had gone, though a few Russians had explored the districts. That great unevangelised land pressed upon Miss Taylor's heart. When our Lord bade his witnesses "go into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature," He knew all about Tibetan exclusiveness. "We have," she reflected, "received no orders from the Lord that are impossible to be carried out." In the story of the China Inland Mission, she saw how the great interior of China had seemed hermetically closed until the foot of faith pressed forward, and then strangely and wonderfully it opened before the Lord's servants as they went in to possess: so she believed it would be on "the roof of the world," as Tibet has frequently been termed by reason of its altitude. At length she resolved to make the attempt to penetrate Central Asia and reach, if possible, Lhassa, the sacred city of the Lamas, and the capital of Tibet. This city lies nearer our Indian frontier than China.

Leaving China in 1888, Miss Taylor came home viâ Australia and India, and went on to Darjeeling, on the Bengal frontier, going to a Tibetan village near Darjeeling, her object being to learn the language. From there she pressed forward into Sikkim (not then under English rule). "I went," she says, "in simple faith, believing that the Lord had called me. I knew that the difficulties were great, and that enemies would be numerous, but I trusted God to take care of me, just as He protected David from the hands of Saul." She got not far from Kambajong, a Tibetan fort. Here the natives would ask her frequently what they were to do with her body if she died. She told them she was not going to die just then. They have, however, a custom of "praying people dead," and to this they resorted, taking care to help their prayers in a very effective manner. One day the chief's wife invited the stranger to eat, and prepared rice and a mixture of eggs for her.

Some conversation between the women as she was eating aroused Miss Taylor's suspicion as to the eggs placed before her, and sure enough, after she had partaken, she became ill, with all the symptoms of aconite poisoning. The Tibetan chief was greatly alarmed at her living so near the border, and came over and ordered her back to Darjeeling. She refused to go there, but settled down in a hut near a Tibetan monastery called Podang Gumpa, living as best she could.

After a year spent in Sikkim, during ten months of which she never saw a European, being surrounded by natives only, Miss Taylor was led to see that it was the Lord's will she should enter Tibet by way of China. Her stay at Sikkim had, however, not been in vain. First, she had learned the language as spoken at Lhassa, and secondly she had secured a faithful Tibetan servant. This young man, Pontso, is a native of Lhassa. Travelling on the frontier of India he had hurt his feet and was directed to the white stranger for treatment. He had never seen a foreigner before, and the kindness shown him won his heart, so that from that time he has been her constant companion and devoted servant, as well as a follower of Jesus.

Taking him with her, Miss Taylor sailed for Shanghai, went up the great river to Tau-chau, a city in Kansuh on the borders of Tibet, and surrounded by Tibetan villages. She visited several large monasteries, and became familiar with many phases of Tibetan life and character. In the monasteries she found some intelligent lamas, free from the grosser superstitions, and willing to lend her what assistance she required.

A year was thus spent on the frontier, and at last came the longed-for opportunity of penetrating the interior. It came about thus. A Chinese Mohammedan, Noga, had a wife from Lhassa, and he had promised her mother that he would return to Lhassa with his wife in three years. This he wished to do, but, having no money, he consented to conduct Miss Taylor to the capital, provided she found the necessary horses and funds. Mrs. Noga had already become very friendly with the young English lady, because she could speak her language, which the natives on the Chinese side could not do. Thus the way was prepared, and on September 2, 1892, Miss Taylor and her four servants, two Chinese and two Tibetans, started from Tau-chau for the interior.

The country is one mass of lofty mountains, a large part of it is above the snow line; the roads are merely mountain tracks, while the people seem to live almost wholly by brigandage, preying incessantly on the caravans which traverse the country. Hence the account of the long and arduous journey is simply a narrative of sore hardship amid snow and ice, perils from lawless robbers, and yet graver perils from her faithless and false guide, for Noga proved to be a great rascal, whose only object in taking Miss Taylor into Tibet appeared to be to rob and murder her: in the first he succeeded pretty thoroughly, but in the second he failed, inasmuch as she had "a shield of defence" of which he dreamt not, and she was kept with a sure hand.

Four days after leaving Tau-chau the little party encountered eight brigands, who were fortunately having tea, and took some time to light up the tinder-boxes of their matchlocks. Miss Taylor's party had only five fighting-men, but these, led by a young priest or lama, who was intensely fond of fighting, skilfully kept off the enemy until, after much firing, but no bloodshed, they had to retreat. Three days after, a friendly caravan of Mongols was joined, which much increased the strength of the party. Soon after the entire caravan was surrounded by 200 brigands, firing on all hands. Resistance was useless, and most of the men slipped away, leaving the property to the enemy. Two men were killed and eight wounded, and seven horses and some yak wounded. At last the lama packed off the two women and Miss Taylor's faithful Tibetan servant, Pontso, calling out to the enemy that they were women. They were allowed to ride away, as it is against the Tibetan custom to fire at a woman. It appeared that this attack was a piece of retaliation, the Mongols composing the caravan having previously robbed the tribe now attacking them. To prevent their being followed, the assailants took the chief man among the prisoners as a hostage, to be killed if they were pursued. Miss Taylor was amused at the truthful answers returned on all points as to property and as to who was the chief man, but found that absolute truthfulness is part of the etiquette of Tibetan tribal warfare. The people lie terribly in trade or social affairs, but in dealing with an enemy will not stoop to deception.

Meanwhile Noga began, now that he was fairly in the heart of the mountains, to show his hand, and not only tried to strike and abused Miss Taylor, but attempted again and again to murder her. Humanly speaking, she was only saved by the vigilance of her servant and the ready help of some native villagers and lamas. At length she had to leave Noga and his wife, and with her servant, Pontso, and another Tibetan named Pategn, she pressed on, penniless and comfortless, for the capital. They had many tokens of the presence of God. At one time they lost their way for three days in the mountains, finding afterwards that this had been God's method of sheltering them from a deliberate attempt at murder planned by Noga. Foiled in these purposes, he spread the report that Miss Taylor had gold and precious stones round her body—this being done to tempt the cupidity of the natives to kill her for the booty. Then he went on to Lhassa and told the authorities of her coming. These sent out stringent orders that she must be stopped, but not injured. Thus, when three days' journey from Lhassa, she was arrested by soldiers and brought before an official, who told her that if she resolutely went on he could not stop her, but he would be executed for letting her pass. She would have no man's blood spilt for her, and so—though on the verge of fulfilling her long-cherished idea—she turned back on a terrible return journey to China. The chiefs from Lhassa gave her two horses, an old tent, and some food, as her tents were gone, she being robbed by Noga of two horses, a tent, and nearly all the food; but half-way back the food was finished, and the tent given away, Miss Taylor being misled by the Tibetans.

Sometimes travelling was so dangerous on account of brigands that the escort dare not stop, and travelling went on day and night. On the way to Lhassa, Miss Taylor, with the greatest difficulty, induced them to stay while a tall, strong servant, a Chinese Mahometan, lay dying of congestion of the lungs, calling pitiably to Allah to help.

On the return journey another strong man, a Tibetan, died from the effect of the cold, and Miss Taylor herself at great altitudes had repeated attacks of palpitation. Cooking, when there was anything to cook, was most difficult, as the water boiled with so little heat. Frequently pieces of ice, put in to replenish the pan, floated in boiling water some time before melting. Once she was twenty nights in the open air sleeping on the ground, snow falling all the time, as neither tent nor house was to be found. The horses were almost starved, the snow covering everything. The poor animals even ate woollen clothing when they got the chance. A small ration of cheese, mixed with tea and butter, was often all that could be spared for them. Having lost her money, Miss Taylor could not buy a goat. Raw goat's flesh is an emergency food for horses in Tibet, and they like it. In fact, owing to the absence of grass, Tibetan horses will eat almost anything. Crossing fords was a very tiresome task. At first they crossed on rafts, made of inflated skins, with a few branches tied across. Later on, swimming on horseback was the only course, and this meant being up to the waist in water, the horse's head alone visible, and running the risk of tumbling into the torrent, and then on the slippery ice.

A most remarkable experience was the meeting with the tribe known as the Golocks, governed by a woman chief named Wachu Bumo. This is a most ungovernable tribe, amenable neither to Chinese nor to Tibetan authority, and living entirely by plunder. They go out in irresistible parties of 500 to 2000, and are so certain of victory that the women and children go out to see the fun. Plunder seems to be profitable, for they are the wealthiest tribe in Tibet. Wachu Bumo took quite a fancy to Miss Taylor, and gave her a royal safeguard. Finally, after many adventures, which will be told in her forthcoming book, Miss Taylor reached Ta Chien Fu, in Chinese territory, on April 12th, having left the Lhassa district on January 22nd, the first English lady, and certainly the first messenger of the Gospel, to penetrate to the heart of Tibet.

Many readers, profoundly concerned for the spread of the Gospel, will ask what has all this to do with mission work? Much, we reply. As Livingstone by his great journeys opened the way for the Gospel into dark Africa, so our sister expects that God will use her journey to pave the road for missionaries. She believes that the promise stands good: "Every place that the sole of your foot shall tread upon, that have I given unto you," and in the name of the Lord God she has taken possession of Tibet, fully anticipating that as soon as the right men arise to go forward and possess the land the way will be made plain, and the Gospel be published in this hitherto inaccessible region.

It must not be forgotten that far away at Leh, on the western side of Tibet, the heroic Moravians are doing good work, and already lives have been laid down for the Tibetans. They have translated the New and part of the Old Testament into the Tibetan language, as well as compiling a Tibetan and English dictionary and a grammar, so making it easy for students of the language. While on the north-east other C.I.M. missionaries, as Mr. and Mrs. Polhill Turner, are also at work, but in addition to these Miss Taylor pleads for a Tibetan Mission, on the lines of the C.I.M. She asks now for twelve missionaries, six of them medical missionaries, and all, at first, men. Although she, a woman, has penetrated Thibet, she does not think it desirable that women should go at the outset. Few there are of our sisters who could stand the hardships. When God raises the men, as she believes He will, she suggests they ought to go to Darjeeling and Sikkim to learn the language, and attempt entrance from that side. Englishmen, she maintains, are greatly respected and admired in Tibet, and once the official barriers are broken down, the way will be easy, for the Tibetans are willing to welcome those who come to teach and relieve suffering. Communications as to Tibet should be sent to the China Inland Mission, 6, Pyrland-road, N. The funds will be quite distinct, but the affairs will be conducted, at present, by Mr. Broomhall and his staff.

THE KESWICK CONVENTION.

AN EXPOSITION OF ROMANS VII.

BY REV. E. H. HOPKINS.

To will is present, but how to perform that which is good I find not. (Rom. vii. 18.)

I have come in contact with a number of people who find great difficulty in this seventh chapter of Romans; not because that chapter does not re-echo their own experience, but because they find it impossible to reconcile that experience with a life of victory and blessing. A key therefore is needed; and I think it is the duty of those upon the platform, if God has given any particular light on the subject, to pass it on.

Let us look at this passage practically. We know that too often this chapter has been used as a refuge by those who are leading inconsistent lives: and I believe our spiritual enemy would lead many of us to use this passage as a warrant for expecting defeat. Is it not true that too often it has been used, shall I say, as an excuse for sinning? At all events, many of God's children have come to this passage for comfort and encouragement while pursuing a course of inconsistency. Surely this was not the purpose of the Apostle in writing it; and when we come rightly to understand it, we shall find that it is full of encouragement, and gives real practical help as to the secret of overcoming sin.

There have been those who, in reading this chapter, have looked at the passage as describing the experience of an unconverted man. It is very important that, at the outset, we should clearly understand the spiritual standpoint of the man who uttered these words. If we look at it as the experience of an unconverted man there arises this difficulty. We have to assume that the Apostle, after having led us to those glorious heights of triumph and fellowship with Christ, suddenly goes back to the most elementary truths, and there is no longer anything like sequence in the record of experience given in these chapters. I want you to look at the passage as

DESCRIPTIVE OF A CHRISTIAN.

The Apostle speaks of himself. As a disciple of Jesus Christ he recognises the excellency of God's law. It is perfectly true that a Jew would be ready to recognise this; but the Apostle uses terms here in connection with the law which are strong and emphatic. He says of it something far more than any mere Jew could have said. "Wherefore the law is holy, and the commandment holy, and just, and good" (ver. 12). "The law is spiritual" (14). The writer no longer occupies the standpoint of a Jew, because he is not seeking to be justified by the law. It is by the law he has been convinced of sin. He has seen its spirituality, and it has dealt a death-blow to all his hopes of salvation by any righteousness of his own. None but those who have been spiritually enlightened could have spoken thus of God's law.

Another thing: he finds an inward joy in the requirements of God's law. "I delight in the law of God after the inward man" (22). The expression is strong and remarkable. It implies a sympathetic relation between the inmost being and God's law—an inward harmony with God's commandments. The natural man could never have said this; and the sinner, however deeply awakened, could never have used such language. By the phrase "the inward man" we must understand that part of the Apostle's being that had been born from above.

Notice again: the desires and intentions of the speaker are on the side of the law. "To will is present with me"—the will to do the good—"but how to perform that which is good I find not." This cannot be asserted of any soul untouched by Divine grace. We have here, therefore, the description of a Christian man.

BUT THERE IS A DIFFICULTY.

How are we to explain it as the language of a Christian man? Something is needed to fill it up. Therefore, I would say next, it is the description of a Christian man regarded in himself, apart from a present, living faith in Christ. How could any Christian man be in such a condition? It is spiritually inconceivable. Come next to this point. What do you mean by the expression "in Christ"? It is a favourite expression with Paul. We have the germ of it in John xv. But what do we understand by our Lord's words when He said, "Apart from Me ye can do nothing"? There is the "in Christ" of standing; every believer here is in Christ in that sense, without exception. God looks at you in Christ, and you are accepted in Him. But there is another "in Christ"—of condition and fellowship. There is such a thing as not abiding in Christ; as being out of communion with Christ. I believe it was to this that Christ referred when He said, "Apart from Me ye can do nothing." So in the passage before us. Verses 14 to 25 are a parenthesis in the argument. For a moment the Apostle is contemplating himself as a converted man, yet apart from Christ. His will is on the right side; but he lacks the power to perform. Sin is stronger than the strength of his will; stronger than all his tendencies upward; and because he lacks the power there are failure, fruitless struggle, painful effort, and continuous conflict. "It is true," says the Apostle, "that I have desires heavenward, but I see another law in my members—the law of sin—and the tendency of that power is downward. In spite of all my efforts as a renewed man, I find sin too strong for me." I believe

MANY CHRISTIANS ARE PRACTICALLY IN THAT CONDITION.

But you may ask: Is not the Apostle describing his own personal experience? He is not using the past tense. Yes; but he does not speak from the standpoint of present experience; he speaks from the standpoint of present conviction as to the tendency of the two natures in him; therefore, he uses the present tense. I may say to you, "Fire burns me"; but I don't mean precisely the same thing as when I say, "Fire is burning me." In the first case I am simply describing the property of fire; in the second, I am giving a description of the present action of fire within the sphere of my consciousness. So the Apostle is giving us here a diagram. He says:—Look at what you are as a converted man, a renewed soul, a child of God, but living the "I myself" life. He says in the last verse of this chapter, "With the mind I myself serve the law of God, but with the flesh the law of sin." There are multitudes of Christians living the "I myself" life. They know of the pardon of sin; but in times of difficulty and perplexity they live the "I myself" life, instead of the Christ life.

See God's remedy for this. You must first know the nature of the disease. The physician must first have a true diagnosis of the patient's condition. In chaps. v. to vii. we have in order that we may see how we have the threefold provision of God. In chap. v. we see sin as a load of guilt—sin upon us. In chap. vi. we see sin as a master over us, who demands service and pays wages. Sin is personified in that chapter. In chap. vii. there is another aspect of sin—the law of sin in us. Jesus Christ is God's remedy, and we see the corresponding aspects of the remedy to meet these three aspects of the disease. There are three little prepositions full of deep meaning. As to the load of guilt, Christ is revealed as my substitute (v. 6). Christ for me. In chap. vi. it is Christ with me. In part of chaps. vii. and viii. it is Christ in me.

Every Christian knows what is the meaning of Christ for me. But we too often fancy that with that truth we have grasped the whole of the Gospel, and there is nothing more to know. The Spirit of God leads us on to the next chapter, where we see another aspect—with Christ. This word expresses identification. If we grasp the truth contained in that thought, we understand what it is to be delivered from sin as a master. But some of us fancy that now we have got it all. Nay, we must still proceed, because we have not been brought to see the secret of deliverance from sin as a law in us. Here we understand God's remedy—Christ in us. You will notice that in these eleven verses, at the end of chap. vii., no less than thirty times reference is made by the Apostle to himself, and not one reference to God the Father, the Son, or the Spirit. He is regarding himself for the moment as a Christian apart from God's remedy.

In spite of good intentions and earnestness; in spite of the will being on the right side, the law of sin is too strong for the believer. What does the Apostle say in chap. viii.? "The law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made me free from the law of sin and death." The law of sin and death within me is not suspended; but its working is the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus. It is thus I read Romans vii., and I believe it is true of all Christians to the very last. There are the two tendencies. We do not triumph by virtue of our own struggles. What we have to learn is the secret of abiding in Christ. Let us begin to learn it here and now—Christ for acceptance and justification; Christ for my life and my walk; and abiding in Him continually as my power to deliver and to keep.

ABUNDANCE OF RAIN.

BY REV. E. W. MOORE.

And Elijah said unto Ahab, Get thee up, eat and drink, for there is a sound of abundance of rain (1 Kings xviii. 41).

These were the best tidings that could be proclaimed to Israel in that time of drought and famine. Gathered here, in the presence of God, what is the blessing that we need? What is the blessing at which our hearts may leap and rejoice, so that we may hold high banquet and festival with the King of kings? It is in the thought of "abundance of rain."

Let us ask first what this rain is for us; then, why it is so necessary; and lastly, how it may be had.

First of all, notice the promise in the verse: "There is a sound of abundance of rain." Rain we know full well in Scripture is one of the appointed symbols of the Divine Spirit. "I will pour water upon him that is thirsty, and floods upon the dry ground." "I will pour my Spirit upon my seed, and my blessing upon thine offspring." The promise is of "abundance of rain." This was a promise, by way of eminence, above and beyond all other visitations of rain that the land had known before. It was to be an abundant rain, to meet a terrible need.

When we interpret God's abundance of rain, how do we find the Scripture directing us? We take Joel ii., and we have the same symbol implied. "He will cause to come down for you the rain, the former rain, and the latter rain in the first month." A little later down in the chapter you have, "And it shall come to pass afterward, that I will pour out my Spirit upon all flesh; and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy, your old men shall dream dreams." When was that prophecy fulfilled? When was that promise realised? It was begun to be fulfilled on that memorable day which opened this dispensation: on the Pentecostal morning, when Peter rose up and said, "This is that which was spoken by the prophet Joel." Down upon the assembled company came the Holy Ghost, as He had never been poured out before, in abundance of rain. That outpouring is to characterise the whole of this dispensation.

EVERY DAY SHOULD BE A PENTECOST.

Anything less than abundance of rain will not meet the need of the Church to-day. The Church is languishing for lack of Pentecost. We are not straitened in God, but in ourselves. God loves abundance. Christ gives abundance of grace. He came that we might have abundant life. Without it you will never reach the height and depth and length and breadth of that knowledge of the promises of God which your hearts are yearning after.

Why is the rain so necessary? We have to transport ourselves into Eastern lands for an answer. We have had in the south of England this year almost an Oriental spring and early summer. We have been able from actual experience to enter, as perhaps few of us could before have entered, into the feeling and need of the Orientals in the early spring of Syria and elsewhere. Why is the rain so necessary? Ask the pastures that were burned up, as it were, by the devouring flame. See how the beasts of the field groan and are perplexed, because there is no pasture.. Men also are suffering from want of water.

The rain, then, is necessary for freshness. The Holy Ghost is needed in his fulness to keep our graces fresh. How often we have felt that the fruit of the Spirit in our life and experience was little better than dried fruit. Other people have found it out. The words were there, the Truth was there; but the spirit and the power were missing. Where the Holy Ghost is present there is freshness. The dew is on the branch. The truth spoken may be the simplest and the most familiar; but if the Holy Ghost is there He carries it home, and gives it exceeding pungency and power. He speaks to the conscience, and reaches where no human voice could reach—to the inmost recesses of the heart.

The Holy Ghost is necessary for fruitfulness. How little real lasting fruit is borne in the lives of many of us, who for many years have been following Jesus! Christ comes to these Conventions very specially. He walks up and down the churches everywhere, but surely He walks down the aisles of the Keswick tent. He comes seeking fruit on his fig trees. Here is great profession, but what fruit has the tree really borne? In the life, in the home, and in the business, is the fruit of the Spirit to be seen? Or is it conspicuous by its absence, or only found here and there, buried on the topmost bough, when the tree should be laden with fruit? The more heavily-laden the bough is with fruit, the more it will stoop. Never be afraid of the fulness of the Spirit making you proud. There is no such mark of the presence of the Holy Ghost as a broken and contrite spirit. There is no such mark of the absence of the Holy Ghost as a haughty spirit. When Christ comes to you

HE WILL KNOCK THE PRIDE OUT OF YOU.

That is the second blessing, when He comes and cleanses away that pride in your heart which has so hindered you from receiving his fulness.

We want the abundance of rain also for the cleansing of the soul. Look how, in a hot dry summer, plants are infested with insects and blight, which hinder their development and growth. You want the overflowing shower, the fulness and abundance of rain to cleanse away all these things. It will leave the leaves fresh and clean and bright. Your plants will thrive as never before. Oh, that the Holy Ghost would come and cleanse away those things that are encrusted on the hearts and souls of so many of us, and which hinder the growth of the plants in his spiritual vineyard.

Abundance of rain is necessary also for savour. When the rain falls, a thousand sweet scents come from earth and plants and flowers that never came forth before. When the Holy Ghost falls upon the soul there is a sweet savour of Christ; a holy perfume which cannot be imitated. You cannot define it or put the hand on it. It is the savour of the Holy Ghost. Do we savour of ourselves or of Christ? Have you ever thought of that wonderful testimony that St. Paul gave? He was no boaster, but he says that wherever he went he was a sweet savour or aroma of Christ. There was that about him which carried a resemblance of Christ, and which made men feel that he had been with Christ. Is that what people would say naturally of you and me? It is a heart-searching question.

Now, very briefly I want to come to the practical side of this subject. How may the fulness or abundance of rain be had? Take an object-lesson; there are no lessons so instructive. In the closing verse of 1 Kings xviii. we read, "Ahab went up to eat and to drink." Elijah had other work to do. He went to the top of Carmel, and cast himself down on the earth, and put his face between his knees. Think who this man was. He was one man against a multitude. The half-hearted Jehovah worshippers had not courage to stand by him. He had been alone with God all through these three and a-half years. You might have said he was God's favourite; for God had shown him favour as he showed it to no other Israelite.

But how does God's favourite behave? Elijah knew the promise was to be fulfilled; did he go up to eat and drink with Ahab? Nothing of the kind. God's promises are not fulfilled to us after that fashion. Elijah was under the guidance of the Holy Ghost. How did the Holy Ghost teach him to act? If you and I would receive the fulness of the Holy Ghost, we must first slay our sins. "Take the prophets of Baal, let not one of them escape." Slay your sins; in other words, be real. Have you noticed that wonderful account of conversion given in 2 Corinthians vii.? I remember an aged saint once pointing it out to me as

THE ONLY TRUE MEASURE OF CONVERSION.

"What carefulness it wrought in you; yea, what clearing of yourselves; yea, what vehement desire; yea, what zeal; yea, what revenge." Is not that last a remarkable word to go into the list? True conversion means vengeance on your sins, which have led you away from God, marring your life and destroying your usefulness. Death to them! If you would receive of the fulness of the Holy Ghost, you must take vengeance on your sins. We have no real foes but our sin. Let none of us plead for Baal. Be sincere, be real. "If I regard iniquity in my heart, the Lord will not hear me." Have we all prayed: "O Lord, make me real"? It is not a smooth and easy work, let me tell you. It is not coming to a beautiful place, and listening to beautiful addresses, and enjoying a lovely time; that is not the way, so far as my experience goes, that God gives men blessing. Of course He gives us these things to enjoy, but that is not the way the deepest things come into your life. They come through the knife, through the cross; they come through death. The true reason why souls do not get more life is that they shrink from more death.

Perhaps as children of God we have thought it was a rash and cruel proceeding of Elijah to slay all these men. But he did it by God's command. They were God's enemies, and his people's enemies, and they must die. Men often try to get blessing from God while cherishing sin in their hearts.

IT CANNOT BE DONE.

See Elijah on the top of Carmel. There was only one request; he was not lost in generalities. The great reason why we lose blessing is because in our prayers we go round and round, asking for a thousand things. We do not keep to one thing, and so we never reach it.

Be intense. Look at Elijah again. He cast himself down. He had been living with God all the time. It was a mighty blessing he was going to have. God cannot bestow on us the blessings He has it in his heart to give, unless we are in a state to receive them. You cannot have gold until it is melted. "Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled." Hunger and thirst are painful sensations. It is intensity of soul to which God is ready to reveal his riches.

Be very low. Elijah's face is on the ground; there is the deepest reverence, the creature in the dust before the Creator—that is our place. I am awfully afraid of any man who is anywhere else.

Then expect the answer. "Go, now, look and see." The servant came back, but he was not in touch with God as his master was. He thought it was no use looking over the Mediterranean; he had done that a long time, and there was nothing. Elijah said, "Go again." Have you ever persevered with such importunity? Have you ever besieged the cross in that fashion? "I will not let Thee go except Thou bless me." At any cost I will have the blessing. "Go again seven times." That is the complete number. "Faith and patience inherit the promises." They are twin sisters, folding doors (as one of our brethren once said) into the great large room of God's own grace.

"And at the seventh time he saw a little cloud rising out of the sea, like a man's hand." Act upon the first token of an answer. Elijah knew what that little cloud meant. If God gives you a little cloud in your heart, let the glimpse of his willingness and readiness to bless flood your soul. Though experience is often put in the wrong place, it has a real place. Matthew Henry says, "The experiences of the saints are the explications of the promises." You cannot understand what it is to be born again until you are born again. You cannot tell what the fulness of the Holy Ghost is till you have it. All the theories in the world cannot show you what it is. If you have had it, you will know it. Do you think Israel did not know when the great rain came? Have you had the great rain of God's strength flooding your soul, cleansing your heart, strengthening your whole being; to enable you to suffer, to persevere, and to go on to the end? If not, it is for you. May God help you to fulfil the conditions and receive the blessing.

PRACTICAL PERFECTION.

BY REV. HANDLEY C. G. MOULE.

Turn to 1 Peter v. 10—"But the God of all grace who hath called us, after that we have suffered awhile, into his eternal glory by Christ Jesus, shall make you perfect, stablish, strengthen, and settle you." You will see that I have slightly altered the order of the words as they stand in the English Bible; not, God forbid! to alter their bearing, but, as it seems to me, to point out quite clearly what the bearing is. We are apt to read the verse as if its gist were this: "The God of all grace, who hath called us to his eternal glory by Christ Jesus, after you have suffered awhile, make you perfect." But the point is other. The Apostle, as is his wont more than once in this epistle, speaks of the sufferings of this present time as a little matter to come before the eternal glory. Then with regard to these sufferings—with regard to what the Christian should have to bear; with regard particularly to what he has just referred to: what the Christian should have to bear because of the constant presence of his great enemy—he says, "The God of all grace make you perfect," or, taking the word as it was probably written by the Apostle, with a slight but significant difference, "shall make you perfect," The making perfect, whatever it means, was not to be the issue, the outcome of the suffering for awhile, but the equipment for it.

I have been led, somewhat of a sudden, to turn to this verse, because it has come to our knowledge that many earnest, devoted souls are in some special perplexity and wonderment as to what may be the simplest and most practical aspect of what we want to say. There are those scattered about—and we should think of them with the deepest sympathy and respect—who, coming here, understanding that there is a speciality talked about in this place, want to be perfectly clear what it is, and how it is supposed to work. God forbid that this place should be so associated with a specialty, that

"KESWICK" SHOULD BECOME A SHIBBOLETH.

God forbid that there should ever be the dream of such a question as "Do you go to Keswick?" as a gauge of a person's spiritual state. I seem to hear dear Mr. Bowker's voice saying, "Perish the thought!"

But, dear friends, we are here because there is a great speciality in the Gospel which, we do think, does need, for our own souls and those of others, to be put reverently and distinctly into the foreground; not to the forgetting of any other part of truth, but nevertheless into the foreground. And that is the truth of what there is laid up in our Lord in covenant; which He is not only willing but pledged to do to them that come to God by Him, in the deliverance of their souls and wills by his act, his power, and his presence; and altogether in his handling of them, and in the saving of them from the dominion and power of sin.

It does seem all important that we who dare to speak here in God's name should, at least, be perfectly clear that we understand what is set forth as to these matters in the Word of God. That brings us to this remarkable verse, "The God of all grace shall make you perfect." Perfection is a word which, alas! has been too often soiled with use that is sometimes ignoble and sometimes dangerous, and of which one gets (quite wrongly) to be shy. But there are uses made of the word which are deplorable. There are uses made of the thought of Christian perfection which, to my sorrowful knowledge, can blight and blind the conscience, until the sanctified one refuses, in the face of clearest evidence, to see that plain sin is sin. There are uses of the word which surely should make those who are in reverent adoration at the feet of Christ, who have got but one glimpse of his perfectness—his infinite and most terrible perfection—shrink and shudder, rather than rejoice. Nevertheless the word "perfect" stands in the word of God, and has its meaning. And here you have the great Apostle, humblest of men, saying that the God of all grace shall make these poor, tried, persecuted, often faltering Christians of Asia Minor perfect, having called them to his eternal glory after suffering for a while.

A DEFINITION.

Shall I be the least help to you if I call attention to what the word, looked at in the original, manifestly means in this place? The words "make perfect" is one you might use if, for instance, you had to mend a broken table, by making it stand on four legs firm; or if you had to mend a broken net by making the broken meshes up. It does not mean making an absolutely ideal and faultless thing; but making a thing, for its purpose, sound, workable and good. And what the Apostle means here is that the God of all grace (using this well-understood word in the Greek tongue in which he wrote) shall mend them; set them right; make them in this sense wholly complete; supply that which is lacking to their faith; furnish them with that which they have not yet discovered in their Lord; that they may be fitted, mended, equipped; that the broken joints may be in gear, so that the walk may be a real walk, and not a drag or a crawl upon the earth.

This is one thing which it seems to me clear as the day, from the Word of God, that our Lord and Master offers in his Word to do. He says, in effect: Come to Me with a desire that I shall do it, and behold I, a Person, can so deal with thee, a person, that where there was disjointing there shall be adjustment; where thou knewest not how to take a step without spiritual distress and exhaustion, thou shalt not indeed be an ideal walker as hereafter upon the hills of heaven, but thou shalt be a pilgrim that goes steadfastly, really, yea thankfully, forward and upward along the road that ends there. You have your enemy to meet. You have infinite danger around you. And within you, as to yourselves, to the end of the chapter, taken apart from the handling and presence of Christ, you have danger; and worse than danger, actual incapacity and impossibility. But, behold I stand opposite to you, saith the Lord, who am able to make you perfect; as a man who has to deal with a disjointed limb makes it perfect when he so treats it that bone and muscle are ready to do their work aright.

AN ILLUSTRATION.

I ventured in the ministers' meeting this morning to use an illustration of this very sort, which, a little more in outline and with reserve, I will ask to use again. Within the last few years there has happened the following very simple but important event to one near and dear to my heart; and every detail is intimately known to me. There came to the person six or seven years ago an accident that produced practical helplessness in the ankle-joint. Advice was taken, and means were used, but it was year after year a case of hope deferred. To walk even a short distance from the home to the house of God was impossible. The journey could never be taken but in the invalid chair; and this for one longing to be active, whose soul was in motion, whose will found its rest in doing, in acting, the will of God.

At last there was recommended to us a medical man, famed for his successful treatment of difficult cases of dislocated and disordered joints. The patient was taken to him, and I was there. The moment the troubled limb was shown, the man hardly stopped to touch it, but said at a moment's inspection, "I can set you right." In due time, when the necessary pressure of work and duty made it possible to go to town, the patient went to him again, with a friend who was a skilled nurse, in order that when the anæsthetic was applied, and the sufferer unconscious, there might be someone to say what had happened. For this malady, strange to say, had been treated by one skilled man and another, as more than half a matter of imagination. It proved to be nothing of the kind. What happened? When insensibility had come on, "Now," said the doctor to the patient's friend, "I want to tell you just what I am going to do. A muscle is clogged in its sheath, and my business is to pull it out. All the pressure has been exactly upon that point, irritating and making things worse. I am going to deal with it so that all the muscles may do their right part equally, and that there may be strain on none." Then, seizing the limb with a giant grasp, he wrenched it backward and forward for the space, I suppose, of a minute at the outside. Then recovery from the stupor came. "And now," said said he to his patient, "put down your foot and walk." It was done, and it has been done since. There has been walking power restored. For practical purposes the joint is perfect, and for practical purposes it is as useful as ever. But it has to be remembered that it was once disjointed; certain special attentions have to be kept up; certain special directions have to be taken, but there is now all the difference in the world between the state of things in which for a time the limb, with great distress, could be used for a few yards, or perhaps, as a triumph, for a quarter of a mile, and the state in which it is good for active movement day by day, and sometimes good for a long walk and healthful exercise.

Here is a case in which "perfection" was given as an antithesis to dislocation, and being out of gear. And what our Lord Jesus Christ undertakes in his sacred promise to do is not to dispense with discipline; is not to have done with that "following after sanctification" of which the apostle speaks; is not to have done with that chastening of us, as to which, if we are not partakers of it we are not sons; but for our walk to put the limb in order, to set the will right with Him by his own gracious act, which may be, and from his point of view assuredly is, whether from our consciousness or not, as decisive as possible a crisis, with a view to a process, with a view to growth, and with a view to the future, which shall make us enjoy the blessed experience of having continually to depend on Him in our always identical self-need for his most wonderful supply. If I guess by my own heart at all and the hearts of others in this matter, an illustration such as this may be at least of some help toward clearing thought and directing faith.

THERE IS ONE THING PRESUPPOSED

in the whole question; as with the patient's body, so with the patient's soul. There was the most energetic desire to be set free. The encumbered one wanted nothing so much as to be able to walk and to work. And surely that is what every one of us here wants to do. If that is not quite so yet, let us go and tell our Lord about it; remembering that we are not dealing with a mechanical force which is helplessly waiting for us to set it in motion, but are dealing with a Person who has made us and understands us, and who can, in ways infinitely past our knowing, so show Himself, and the fair beauty of doing his will and loving it, that we shall feel at least that sort of magnet that takes the helpless patient with full purpose to the physician's door. Shall we assume it of one another to-night that there is not one perplexed over this question, who is not at least perfectly clear about this, "O Lord, my unreserved desire is to walk worthy of Thee into all pleasing. What I want is to be what Thou wouldst have me be. My earnest expectation and my intense desire are that Thou shouldest have thy way in me, that Thou shouldest get thy value out of me, that Thou shouldest not have agonised in the Gethsemane we have read of, and the result in me should be only a half, or perhaps one-tenth, part of the will to do thy will; but that there should be, by thy mighty grace, an ardent desire to be ever willing to do thy will."

Then we are definitely commanded by our Lord to remember that He is able to do this thing, and able—yea, as in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye—not only to show us that in Him we are emancipated, and that the dislocation is set free, but to wake us, as it were, to find ourselves on the couch, and the physician saying, "Thou canst not tell what I have done, but put down thy foot and walk."

This is, after all, a matter of personal confidence in the ability of a Person infinitely trustworthy, infinitely loveable. Nine-tenths of the difficulty with many—it was so with me—is from distrust of what He means to do. It is not so with all. But there are those who are afraid of what the Physician means to do. They do not like to put themselves into his hands, helpless as the patient who has taken a soporific; and they are not absolutely surrendered, that He may do what he pleases, so that they may be able to walk.

But why should we be afraid? Christ is no heathen god waiting with cruel jealousy in his heart, unkindly towards our happiness, and wanting to strike. He is not waiting round some ambush for us to put ourselves into his grasp, that He may do with us precisely, perhaps, the thing we dread. You know well enough, fathers and mothers, how you would meet a child that has long resisted you, and comes to-day to say, "I am so sorry, I will do exactly what you tell me." You would not begin to torture the child, or set it a most repulsive task, just to exercise your power. You would probably give it some really tender, wisely-chosen exercises on its new obedience; but you would first clasp it to your heart and give it a love that you had never been free, during the rebellion time, to let it feel before.

Shall it not be so for many of us here—that we shall, whether beneath this tent or in our rooms personally in quiet, show our Lord at least that we are not afraid of Him; that there is nothing so restful as letting Him do what He will with the being who says, "I see thy face; I trust thy heart; I take a mighty grasp of thy hand; I lay myself into thy will and rest there: do what Thou likest with me?" This, it seems to me, is one speciality of what we long, with our imperfect words, here to say about the Lord's "perfecting." It is that Christ is able, if the soul by his grace is simply and honestly desiring it, to set free the clogged, complicated, irritated, and fevered will,

TO WORK IN HONEST HEALTH FOR HIM.

We again and again set it before you. Behold the Person who stands willing to do it; the heart of love; the hand of power; the skill of infinite wisdom; intentions of perfect rightness, in which your blessedness and his glory will be absolutely harmonised.

One pathetic, but so intensely natural, question put is, "What does it mean when one speaker says that the old life was a life of ups and downs, and that the new life has been blessedly different, though the old foe has reappeared again and again?" Oh, let us be absolutely honest. If the old foe has reappeared again and again, do not let us paint our experience brighter than it is; it will not be to the glory of our Lord. But there is an immense difference in kind between the state of the limb I have told you of, when it was dragged under compulsion to do its work to a certain extent, and the state of things in which though it cannot be forgotten that it once was very bad, and now and then there comes a prick of the old trouble; the difference is this—the patient for one thing knows exactly what is the matter, knows exactly what the treatment was, and knows the doctor to whom instantly to go back.

The practical result is not an ideal state of things. Our bodies certainly will not be in an ideal condition until they are transformed and made like the body of his glory. But it is a state of things in which the average result is radically different, and it is on a quite different plane from the old. As regards discouragement and the discovery of failure in the Christian life, you can take prompt, hopeful, intelligent, and decisive action. You can, as it were, lose no time, with the definite purpose of not going on stumbling, as though that must be, but in going back to Him who can keep you from stumbling, and enable the joint, once helpless and still so weak that it needs this watching and practical care, to do its work

WITH FREEDOM, EQUABILITY, AND REALITY.

The subject I had meant to take may be just mentioned as I close; it was "The Covenant and the Writer on the Heart." You know the Lord sealed the Covenant with his blood, and every time we are at the Holy Supper, and take the holy cup, that cup is the new Covenant in his blood. Do not wait for the tent or the convention, but next time you attend in humblest reverence the Supper of your Lord, remember that as you drink that drop of sacred wine, you are taking the Lord's own sacrament of the Lord's own covenant, the whole of which He pledges Himself to keep to the soul that claims it at his feet. Keep fast hold of that—that for his sake and for nothing else "your sins and iniquities will He remember no more."

The second part equally guaranteed, equally covenanted, equally certain, and equally to be dealt with before Him at his feet, is this, "I will put my laws into their minds and write them on their hearts." Where is the mind? Where is the heart? Bring it to Him; spread it out to Him; leave it in his hands, and remember that He, not you, holds the pen — "I will write...I will put." O Lord my God, behold this will, this heart, this mind. I am not going to mock thy pen and tell Thee how to write; but the surface is here, oh put Thou thy writing on.

THE LAST TEN MINUTES.

BY REV. H. B. MACARTNEY.

(The Tent, 7 a.m., Monday morning, July 31.)

There was one text amongst the many given in this tent at the praise meeting on Saturday which seemed to me to convey the whole of Keswick teaching in a few words. "Thine handmaid hath not anything in the house save a pot of oil" (2 Kings iv. 2). A woman had lost her husband; she had neither gold nor silver; the house was absolutely empty, and the creditor had come to take away her sons to slavery. Hers was apparently a state of utter desolation, and yet there was close at hand a source of unbounded wealth.

Observe, firstly: she was answering the question, "What hast thou in the house?" If God wants something done which seems impossible, you need not look for help to the ends of the earth. The instrument for doing it is nigh, even at the door. Observe, secondly: the vessel of oil is a type of Christ. God always brings in a sense of nothingness. It is when we feel that we are nothing, when we know that we have nothing; it is when the Holy Spirit brings over us a great sense of poverty and need, that God displays the fulness that is in Christ. Some stop at the point of emptiness. They think that Isaiah's truest place was when he cried, "Woe is me, for I am undone!" But God did not think so. He not only purged his sin, and took away his iniquity, but he took him into fellowship with Himself. "Having nothing" would be a poor experience if we could not add, "yet possessing all things." How many cry with a lamentable voice, "I am nothing; I have nothing!" The true disciple drops the "I am" and the "I have," and rings out, "Nothing but Christ." He is enough: He satisfies.

I said that Christ is set forth in this pot of oil. He had been typified long before by the pot of manna. It was a golden pot, bright, precious and imperishable. The gold set forth his deity, as the manna set forth his humanity. Jesus is the pot of oil, full of the Holy Ghost for us. Mark the present tense in John i. 33—"the same is He which baptizeth with the Holy Ghost." That is his perpetual work, his eternal characteristic. Even now, this moment, the stream is "proceeding out of the Throne of God and of the Lamb"; He is today "shedding forth" the Holy Spirit upon human hearts. There is a fulness in Christ for all the sin of the past and for all the need of the present.

The widow woman was supplied with sufficient not only to extinguish her debt, but "live thou and thy children of the rest." The "oil stayed" simply because there were no more empty vessels. It was emptiness and brokenness (with faith) that kept the river of oil flowing. Oh, how Christ longs to fill us! His yearning is infinitely deeper than ours. Let your soul dwell more on God's facts than on dreams of holiness, and wonderings how it can be brought about. Believe, only believe, that you have the pot of oil in the house—that God's Son has the fulness of God's spirit for you; and thus, with faith in the fact, and with the simultaneous work of Him who has pledged Himself to respond to faith in you, there will come, if not a cry of ecstacy, at least a cry of rest.

PARTING COUNSELS.

The Convention will be over in a few seconds. Let me say a few parting, warning words. 1. We are all agreed that the world and the devil are without us, watching to draw us from our city of refuge; but if you overlook the third foe it will prove your ruin. The Holy Spirit has given it a specific name. He calls it "the flesh." It is untameable and incurable. "It is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be." You may be occupied with Christ—God grant it—so gloriously filled with His Spirit that you do not feel its presence; but whether you feel it or not, there it is, a relic of the "old man," a Canaanite left in the land. It is not in any sense to "have dominion" over you. Christ, on the contrary, is to have absolute dominion over it. It is wrong to say that we are without sin. It is right to say that the Lord can keep us without consciously sinning. The flesh in its own nature "lusteth against the Spirit;" but He to whom all power is given can so keep it in paralysis, that while you and the Lord know that it is there, its presence should not be known to any third person.

2. A true indication that your sanctification is real, not spurious, is a shrinking from riches and rank. Instead of courting the society of those who are above us in wealth and social position, the tendency of the soul is more and more to the poor and the sick and the sorrowing. Our salvation is indeed to be manifest to all men, high and low, and we should compassionate all; but love's proneness is to sink, not to rise; it is "to seek and to save that which is lost," and to find some place where we can labour far away from the public gaze.

3. Growth in grace is indicated when we more and more withdraw from promiscuous reading, and find a growing satisfaction in the Bible, or when we are more than ever rejoicing in those books which help us to understand it better.

4. When grace is strong we shall not seek to anticipate heaven by ceaseless services, religious engagements and fellowships, even with the most saintly; but in strong self-denial we listen to the voice of God, and are ready to forsake all—home, children, country, even life itself, to please Him "who hath called us out of darkness into his marvellous light."

5. The greatest test of pure and undefiled religion is this: "esteeming others better than ourselves." This is simply impossible to nature. We may be conscious of superiority socially, intellectually, religiously. How, then, can we esteem others better than ourselves? Only in one way—by a miracle wrought in our souls. "Let this mind be in you, which was also in Christ Jesus" (Phil. ii. 3-5.) CHRIST in you will think very differently from SELF in you. For me to think is Christ to think in me.

Ladies' Meetings.

YEAR by year the Lord has granted great blessing in the ladies' meetings. Those who have charge of them have mentioned how deeply they are conscious of the help of the audience, and how the concentrated aim in those present seems to make an atmosphere in which every sentence tells; for when there is determination to obey and to follow "whatsoever He saith," then a little child's lips with the Master's words are as effectual as the most skilled speaker. And they also deeply recognise the power of prayer present, that there are those who undertake the responsibility of prayer, and are true Israels in pleading that the Lord may reveal Himself through humblest words. And, on the other hand, the listeners come to share, and not merely to listen.

The increase of numbers this year was also felt in the ladies' meetings, many having to turn away; and there was a quietness of waiting which did not prepare for the sight of the closely fitting audience, overflowing the platform as well as the rest.

A SEARCHING QUESTION.

Mrs. BANNISTER and Miss NUGENT were again in charge, and the first address laid immediate hold. It was from Mrs. Bannister on the question, "What is your life?" She read through the whole of that heart-searching chapter of James, in which it occurs, and its verses seemed to be again a sword of the Lord, with keen and penetrating blade. She reminded all that amid the stir of arrival, the crowded lodgings, the many friends, it was possible to forget the tremendous responsibility of meeting God. But that was the whole object, and that was what we must face. And now He met us with this question, "What is your life?" A young girl had said, "I am not going to Keswick because of the responsibility." That was a right sense, but a wrong use of it; for here we also learn the empowering of the responsibility." We must answer this question. We cannot be speechless over it; we have to give some answer. You may not know how to answer fully now, but we shall know before the week is over, for God will show it to us if we wish to know. Meanwhile answer something, even if it is only, "I do not know, God; but show me."

We can see something of the answer by the previous verses. "Whence come wars and fightings?" Is that your life? It is from the unrest and dissatisfaction within that there come woes and fightings without. It is self reigning in a divided heart which makes the unrest; and that leads to the friendship of the world, which is enmity with God. But, as the Revised Version shows, God wants to end this state of division and unrest. The Spirit jealously, enviously, desireth to possess us. Have we yielded? Have we resigned possession?

What is your life? First as to its source. "Christ who is our life." The Christian's life has but one source; and do let us remember that God's life is the only life which is recognised as the Christian life.

Prayer followed, and then Miss NUGENT closed with a few minutes on the only power which could so make us abhor self as to lead us to yield entirely to Him; and that was seeing what He is. The picture she took of Him was from Rev. i. 13, when He appeared to his lonely servant. We are to see Him in those two characters—as Priest and as Servant. As Priest ever standing in atoning power for all the past, and as Servant, girded ready to do the work which the Holy Spirit will show to be needful—girded ready to clear away what his searching eyes as a flame of fire will reveal.

CONSECRATION.

The next day, after the requests had been presented—they increased with each day—Mrs. Hatt Noble prayed, and then Miss Nugent, under evident sense of the presence of God, followed by taking the striking verse of Jer. xxxi. 40.—"The whole valley of the dead bodies and of the ashes...shall be holy to the Lord." There is not space to give its substance. Its point was the transformation God that can work in any life when it is yielded to Him. The Word of God teems with pledges of this, but no promise is stronger than this one, because it takes up the very worst of all Israel's sins, and says of even the spot of their worst disgrace, that it shall be "holy to the Lord." Then she briefly sketched the history of the Valley of Ashes—that it was the spot of disobedience, defiance, death, and corruption, for it was the spot where the children had been offered to Moloch. The firstborn, which God claimed as his own and which were refused to Him, were lost and sacrificed in this awful way.

God made the words forcible. It was felt to be a true indictment, that what we refuse to Him we lose. But even the very worst scene of horror and sin can be transformed, as fully as the leper house in the London swamps of ages gone had been transformed into the palace where all hearts had been fixed a few days since, as the Royal Wedding enchained all thoughts.

The stream of prayer which followed was the revealing of how God used this message, as confession and claim came forth in broken words from very many.

WHOLE-HEARTEDNESS.

The next day was one of yet fuller blessing and continued searching power. After the requests Miss LILIAS TROTTER spoke, and in words and manner brimful with the conviction of intense experience; she spoke from Jer. xvii. 8, on "The impossibility of living two lives," as illustrated by the desert and the oasis. It was there either oasis or desert; it was either an absolute existence upon the living water, or else being absolutely arid. There under the vertical sun you saw its work, drawing up all that was planted by the water, and withering down all the spontaneous life out of reach of the water. This was what we should know; the power of Christ to wither down all self—good self as well as bad self.

Shall we, she asked, dare to let ourselves go to God to quench all the risings of self and not only of sin? All power for this in Africa has to be from the Spirit of God alone, for between the oppression of the Mohammedan atmosphere and the climate with its withering sirocco, you must be either desert or oasis. He may have to bring us to the desert to show us wholly what He means: shall we let Him teach us here?

Mrs. BANNISTER followed this appeal by speaking of the soul-thirst which was needed before we were fully ready to accept only his life. And it was God alone who could create this soul-thirst. The Lord Jesus once met one who was not at all thirsty, but He made soul-thirst in her by showing her his thirst—asking, "Give Me to drink." Will you say, Nothing shall satisfy me but to be an oasis in the desert of the world, nourished alone by the Water of Life?

That both these messages had the power of God in them was again even more fully shown than on the previous day by the prayer following, which revealed the deep hunger-need to live only by his life, and so to submit to his life alone.

THE DAILY WALK.

The closing day was another time of God's presence. Mrs. BANNISTER started from Col. ii. 6, "As ye have received Christ Jesus the Lord, so walk ye in Him"; and dealt with the general principles of maintaining the life and the steady walk. She alluded to an illustration used by Mr. Moule, and greatly blessed to many, of an injured joint set right by one touch, but needed practice of walking afterwards. So, she said, if God has adjusted us here, remember we are still weak; and that part needs special attention. Our long subservience to sin has left many weak points in character and will, which need great grace constantly claimed.

There must be a constantly looking off unto Jesus, not within to his work in us; and as we look off, the Holy Spirit will work his life and his likeness within. We want to be more possessed of the Spirit of unveiling, that we may see and know more of Jesus. Let us try to take hold of the two aspects of his work—revealing Christ without, and forming Christ within.

Miss NUGENT closed with a few words on "David pursued" (1 Sam. xxx. 10), reminding of the deliberate, determined action involved in the word

"pursue." He was on the plain and unmistakable track of God's will and revealed command (ver. 8). So are we, and on that track may lie some wounded Egyptian, something very like an interruption. What shall we do with it? Pass it by unheeded? Nay, take up the plain duty which lies in our path; for that will prove's God's avenue not only to recover any captive blessing, but also to a crown and a kingdom, which may be as near to each pursuing one as it was to David.

With prayer and praise we ended, and we separated—to "pursue."

Second Advent Meetings.

Many were pleased to find, this year, a notice on the official programme that arrangements had been made to hold a three days' conference, during the second week, on God's people, Israel, and on our Lord's second coming. Meetings were accordingly held on the mornings of Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, July 31 and August 1 and 2, from 10 to 12 o'clock, the speakers being Rev. J. Wilkinson, Dr. T. Neatby, and Dr. McKilliam.

Notwithstanding that such large numbers leave Keswick at the end of the first week, the attendance in the large tent at these meetings was exceedingly good, and the general interest awakened was apparent.

Mr. Robert Wilson, the convener and president of the Convention, occupied the chair at all the meetings. As the interest grew with each meeting, it was proposed on Wednesday morning that an extra meeting should be held that afternoon, for the purpose of answering the many questions that were being sent in. This was arranged, and the final meeting accordingly held at three o'clock. This also was largely attended. Many interesting and important questions were received and replied to. To many the study of this part of the faith was new, and a desire to know more was earnestly expressed. Many wished to know the best books to read, and there was a general expression of the hope that such meetings should continue to be a feature of the Keswick Convention, "till He come."

A Note of Praise.

A Nonconformist pastor who was present at the recent Keswick meetings writes to a friend:—

Our heart is filled with one long, loud "Hallelujah." The best time was saved to the last. That is like our Lord. The missionary meeting was worth living a life to witness. I saw my own child rise with others when an invitation was given to those who were willing to consecrate themselves to mission work.

The Lord wondrously helped Mr. Meyer on Sunday; he was made the channel of great blessing to many.

Hoxton Hall, N.

For more than a month Mr. Wm. Noble has been holding the fort here with every token of deep and sustained interest. Open-air gatherings are held previous to the meetings in the hall on Sunday mornings and evenings. There are also meetings during the week. The people are rallying round Mr. Noble, whose earnest work at Hoxton in years past is held in grateful remembrance.

The reconstruction of the committee and the trustees, necessary through Mr. Palmer's death, is in progress, and will be completed, it is hoped, next month. Meantime, Mr. Noble is undertaking all responsibility, financial and otherwise. Friends who wish to express practical sympathy with him may address him at Hoxton Hall, Hoxton, N. We learn with much regret that Mrs. Noble continues in very precarious health.

A MOSLEM CONVERT.—Mohammedans are hard to win for Christ, but once gained often become noble Christians. Mr. Richardson, of the Eastern Turkey Mission of the American Congregationalists, tells of one such convert from Islamism, who has just passed away. At his first profession of faith he had to bear fierce persecution, imprisonment, exile. He did not flinch. He was ready, he declared, to die for Christ's sake. At last he was allowed to register himself as a Christian, and for six years lived in peace in his own village. His death was triumphant. His last words to his pastor were: "Ah, sir! preach Jesus! preach Jesus! blessed Jesus!" His wife, still a Moslem, used to say: "I am thankful to the Protestants. My husband used to blaspheme and beat me; now he treats me with gentleness and consideration. The lion indeed has become a lamb."

THE PRINCESS LOUISE HOME.

The fifty-eighth annual meeting of the subscribers and friends of the Princess Louise Home of the National Society for the Protection of Young Girls, which occupies the premises on Kingston Hill formerly tenanted by the Metropolitan Convalescent Institution, was lately held at the Home. The object of the Society is to save young girls between the ages of eleven and fifteen, whether orphans or otherwise, who are, from any circumstance, in danger of becoming abandoned; to educate, train, feed, clothe, and prepare them for future usefulness as domestic servants; to protect them during the most critical period of life, and land them safe into womanhood; to procure situations for them, provide them with an outfit, and generally to watch over, advise, and counsel them; to reward them for continued good conduct in service, and in every possible way to become their guardians; also to provide a home of rest for working girls, who by reason of failing health or other causes incidental to their avocation, are in danger of being thrown out of work.

The Chairman (Sir Lintorn Simmons), in opening the proceedings, referred in sympathetic terms to the loss the Society had sustained by the death of Mr. A. M. Gillham, who had acted as its secretary for many years. He expressed pleasure at finding the Home in such a fine building, and his gratification at the smart and intelligent appearance of the girls. In erecting the laundry they had incurred a debt of £2000, which it was absolutely essential should be cleared off as soon as possible.

The Secretary read the annual report, from which it appeared that owing to deaths and other causes, the old subscriptions were slightly under those of 1891, and the new ones only amounted to about half, while the donations received were only £398, as against £1824 of the year previous; the payments by relatives and friends on account of maintenance were about £30 less, and the total income under all heads were less than half that received in the previous year. The Education Department had placed the day and night schools in connection with the Home on the annual grant list as a public elementary school since August last. The total number of girls admitted and trained since the foundation of the Society was 1603, of whom 1144 had been sent out to service, and the number in the Home at the end of the year was 74. The committee regretted that they found it necessary to plead for additional funds. The institution had no funded property, and was entirely dependent on contributions from well-wishers and supporters. At present there was a debt of £2000 which seriously hampered the committee in carrying out the objects of the society.

The Chairman moved a resolution to the effect that, having regard to the dangers to which many young girls are exposed by the loss or habits of their parents, the efficient maintenance of this institution is a matter of public importance, and every effort should be made to raise funds to carry on the work of the Society effectually, and specially with a view to paying off the debt of £2,000 incurred in building and fitting the laundry. He said they ought to have twice as many girls in the Home if the advantages it offered were more generally known. He believed one reason why the number remained small was because the girls' parents could not afford to guarantee £10, or one-third of the cost of an inmate's maintenance for a year. It was necessary, however, that this charge should be made. A bright feature of the working of the Home was the increasing usefulness of the laundry, the income from which during the last month was £50.

This Society is not local but national, and as such receives girls from all parts of the kingdom. The Home is at Kingston, and the office at London, but the scope of the Society's work extends over the whole country, including the Channel Isles. It is, therefore, incumbent on those who take an interest in it to do all in their power to let its usefulness be known far and wide.

Writing from the office, 32, Sackville-street, W., the secretary, Mr. Reginald Drake, says:—"This most worthy institution is in a sad way for want of funds wherewith to carry on its good work. Founded in 1835, it has been the means of rescuing over 1600 young girls from evil surroundings, and has trained and educated them for domestic service. Over 1100 have been provided with situations, and testify to the great benefits they have received at our hands. Two thousand pounds are required to pay off a debt which has been incurred in building and fitting a laundry, which is now in working order and earning a fair income. We hope by this means to make ourselves to some extent self-supporting, but we require funds to enable us to admit a large number of cases where payment for maintenance is difficult to meet, and which for the above reason, we are reluctantly unable to entertain."

MISSION SCHOOLS AT SINGAPORE.

Dear Sir,—Some three years ago I wrote a letter to The Christian stating that a man was needed at Singapore to teach in our Anglo-Chinese school. Amongst other replies I received a communication from a young man, Mr. G. F. Pykett, who had had seven years' experience as a teacher. Shortly after, Mr. Pykett proceeded to Singapore, where he has done splendid service in the school, both in teaching and influencing for good the boys who have been under him; he has at the same time lent a helping hand in all forms of Christian work and has prepared himself by careful study of the native languages for his future life-work as a missionary. At our last conference he was received as a minister on trial in the Methodist Episcopal Church, and his gifts and his devotion to the work pointed him out as the man for the responsible post of principal of our school at Penang. Now he has sole charge of a school of 300 boys, and is exerting an influence the results of which it would be impossible to estimate.

The need of two more teachers for the school work of our Malaysia Mission leads me to write this account of what has been accomplished in a little over two years by a young man of singular devotion and ability, in the hope that others may be stirred to emulate his example.

The scholars in our Anglo-Chinese school at Singapore now number over 400, in addition to the above-mentioned 300 boys in our Penang school, and we have in view the opening of new schools at other important points on the Malay Peninsula. These schools are not supported by funds raised for missionary work; they constitute a most valuable self-supporting mission agency, and in past years our Singapore school supported all new missionaries while they were learning the native languages, until the appropriations of the Missionary Society were available for their support. This policy is in many cases still pursued, and with the best results.

Bishop Thoburn, who superintends our Malaysia Missions as well as our missions in India, has asked me to do my best to engage two men before I return to Singapore. We should prefer young men who have had some experience of teaching. Applicants must be well educated, and, above all, they must be devoted to the services of God, undertaking this work for the work's sake with the single aim of bringing their scholars to the knowledge of Christ. We would gladly receive any man who feels that he could work in harmony with Methodists; at the same time preference would be given to those who would desire ultimately to become missionaries of our church.

As I am expecting to leave England on August 24, I should be very glad to communicate at once with any candidates for this work, who may address me at Ashley House, Gosport, Hampshire. The sum of £50, I may add, will be required to pay the passage of these teachers to Singapore.

W. G. Shellabear, Missionary M.E. Church.

SANDGATE SOLDIERS' HOME.—Recent visits to Miss Papillon's Soldiers' Institute and Mission Hall, Sandgate, have much cheered me, as a real work is doing. The resident missionary (retired from the Navy) and his wife—Mr. and Mrs. George Campbell—are truly a father and mother to the young soldiers attending the Institute. On Sundays and Wednesdays Gospel addresses are delivered in the Mission Hall, while Bible readings are conducted on other days, as also on Sunday afternoons. The selected chapter, sometimes chosen by one of the soldiers, is read, and Mr. Campbell makes some opening remarks, and invites a few words from those present—thus leading to exposition, application, personal experience of the truth, and confession of shortcomings; individual and collective prayer follow, as they had preceded. It is believed that many are thus built up in the faith and drawn nearer to Christ Jesus, while afforded Christian fellowship and counsel. The sympathy and support of friends are invited. Communications should be addressed to the treasurer, Dr. W. E. Alston, Sandgate.

WITNESSES AT THE FRONT.

THREE LADY MISSIONARIES OPEN A NEW CITY.

The following extracts from the diary of one of a party of lady missionaries in China, who have been graciously preserved in a time of peril, furnish fresh testimony to the sustaining grace of God under all circumstances :—

Kiang-tsin is a Hsien city, about 180 li (sixty miles) from Ch'ong-K'ing, up the Yang-tse. We have had a native helper and his wife here for some time and foreigners have visited occasionally. Miss Southall (Friends' Mission), Miss Anderson, and I came up here on April 25. On our arrival Mr. and Mrs. Tsen welcomed us most heartily; they are old friends to me, they both lived in Ch'ong-K'ing before coming to this city.

We have had crowds of visitors daily, and all seem so friendly. Of course, we are asked innumerable questions. In spite of these, the Gospel was preached. I either gave time before or after to "Pai-long-men-chen," that is, "gossip"; then, when I thought they had had enough of it, I would say, "Please do not talk any more, but listen to me while I kiang shu" (explain book). I almost always get immediate attention; they often check one another if they interrupt while I am speaking. I generally open at 1 Tim. ii., 4, 5, 6, or 1 Cor. viii. 4, 5, 6. Both passages are well rendered in Chinese. We seem to hear so much more of the idolatry here then we did in Ch'ong-K'ing; the reason may be that we are in a main street and close to the principal temples.

One day last week was dedicated to the worship of the God of Thunder. The women put on their best clothes and flocked to the temple, paying 100 cash (4d.) or fifty or twenty, as they were able. With this small offering they sought to pacify and propitiate the God of Thunder. Crowds came in to see us, and we had a grand opportunity of speaking of the one true God. Another day was set apart to worship the God who rules life and death. There was a grand procession that went right past our doors.

That afternoon we had a splendid opportunity to tell these poor ignorant ones of the Lord of Life, who only has the keys of hell and of death. When we tell them their idols are false, they smilingly assent, and say, "Oh, yes, we know that; we trust in heaven," "K'ao T'ien ch' ih fan" (trust heaven for rice), is one of their favourite proverbs. They think that to worship heaven and earth is superior to the worship of idols. Their gods are innumerable: boatmen have their god, tailors have their god, and so on and on; and I have heard that robbers even have their own special deity.

Thank God, among all the daily crowds there have always been some willing to hear, and interested in his message. Several have come again and again, and I am sure the seed has fallen into some prepared ground. One old lady stayed a long time after the others had left. She did not ask me any questions about myself and country, etc., but only about our God and the Lord Jesus.

Taking my hand, and looking anxiously into my face, she said, "How am I to worship your God?" "What do you mean by believing?" "What is it to repent?" "Can Jesus forgive sin?" It took a long time to answer all these question. Their idea of worship is to offer incense, burn candles, burn paper money, call in the priests to chant prayers, etc., etc. "God is a Spirit, and they that worship Him must worship Him in spirit and in truth," can only be made clear to them by the power of the Holy Ghost.

RIOTS AND RUMOURS.

Sunday afternoon (May 14th), Miss Southall and I went out visiting. Some women invited us in. Their house was on the street, and we soon had a crowd of men thronging in. The women kept close to us; we sat there some time without speaking much and feeling uncomfortably warm, when the women rose in a body and said, "Come along with us, we'll take you to a quiet place." With much laughter they rushed off with us, and at last we found ourselves in a large open courtyard; they had taken the precaution to shut the big doors, so the men were left outside. I had a large congregation of women; some listened and some did not. When speaking of our Lord one woman interrupted me, saying, "I have seen Him hanging on a cross, and I wondered what sin He had committed!" (She had been to the R.C. chapel).

Monday (15th) brought a change on the scene that we little expected. From time to time we had heard of rumours being circulated, but we were not in the least apprehensive of trouble. In the afternoon of Monday we had a very happy time speaking to some visitors who had been once or twice before. They had come on purpose to ask about the doctrine, and we felt the power of the Spirit with us. They left us about dusk, and we went to our rooms to have our evening meal. We had hardly sat down before Mrs. Tsen rushed in, saying, "We had all better pray to God; I am afraid there is going to be trouble." She told us that some men had annoyed our guests as they were going out; that Mr. Tsen and Chen-ri, our cook, had gone to settle the matter, and that in the meanwhile a large crowd was gathering. We heard cries of "We want to see the foreigners." I went to the front door, Miss Southall following me. I shall never forget the sight of that seething, angry mob. Someone—I don't know who it was—called us back, and certainly our presence seemed to infuriate them more. Poor Mrs. Tsen was pulled on to the street, and shouts were heard of "Ta t'a" (beat her), but, as she told us afterwards, she was not at all afraid; naturally she would have been terribly frightened, so she concluded this supernatural courage was given her from the Lord.

We three, with Mrs. Tsen and the children, were hurried off to the back of the house. There we took refuge, but only for a little while. Miss Southall had snatched up our Bibles; we opened them and read the 91st Psalm, and felt comforted, realising our Father's love and power to protect. The words spoken to my heart were, "I will trust and not be afraid."

Mrs. Tsen and her two little ones were with us; as we sat there we could hear the yelling of the mob, which once heard is not easily forgotten, and shoutings of "Ta Je-su-t'ang" (Destroy the je-su-t'ang), and "We want to see the foreigners." We did not know where Mr. Tsen and Chen-ri were; we could only pray for them. Mrs. Tsen ventured forth to reconnoitre, and she came back saying the rioters had nearly forced their way in, and we were advised to make our way into Mr. Chu's house. To do this we had to climb over the roof of a house. Mr. Chu and family were very kind, and we thanked the Lord for this place of shelter. We read our Bibles and prayed. Even there we could hear the roar of the mob, who were now in the house. Both the civil and the military mandarins were on the spot, trying to quell the disturbance. After what seemed a very long time to us, we were told we could return, the rioters having left our premises to destroy the R.C. place. We were glad to see Mr. Tsen and Chen-ri again; the latter had narrowly escaped being beaten.

The house looked so desolate, the front premises were all destroyed; poor Mr. and Mrs. Tsen had nothing they could call their own but the clothes they stood upright in; everything was gone, even the food they had, their rice, pork fat, etc., all had been taken. We turned to look at our room, and to our great astonishment, not a thing had been touched. We had prayer with Mr. and Mrs. Tsen, and did all we could to make them comfortable for the night; they certainly "took joyfully the spoiling of their goods;" we were heart sorry for them. I wrote a letter to Mr. Beauchamp asking advice, and then we went to bed, thoroughly tired out.

The next day, Tuesday, was very trying; we had special need of patience. We had Yamen runners on the premises to protect us, but we had little faith in them. We dared not venture out of our room, there seemed to be a constant crowd at the door, and we could hear them asking where the foreigners were, and where their things were. Mr. Tsen told us that the riot had been caused by some scholars who were returning from a theatre; they urged the people on, and did the rest. The mandarins are taking the matter up; several have been caught and beaten, poor things, they are not nearly so much to blame as the students, who always get off scot-free.

We thought that at any moment we might be ordered by the mandarins to return to Ch'ong K'ing. We were praying the Lord to prevent this. We heard afterwards that a boat and escort were in readiness to take us down that evening (Tuesday, 16th). There is no doubt we must have left if things had not quickly quieted down.

On Wednesday night Mr. Beauchamp arrived. We were right glad to see him. Mr. Tsen was quite delighted; he felt his responsibility, and was anxious on our account. Mr. Beauchamp was glad to find us so well and tolerably quiet. Of course the rumours about us were legion; we were said to have a pit under our flooring, where we put the bodies of the children we killed. Mr. Beauchamp had an interview with the mandarin. He seemed rather reticent, but has promised to put out a Proclamation in our favour and to allow us to rent another house, if we can get one, this being most unsuitable for ladies' work. Mr. Beauchamp left us again on Saturday morning, everything being quite quiet. The proclamation was put up; it forbade men to come in or to follow us on the street or into houses. It also forbade these idle rumours, stating we had come for a good purpose. The women could come and listen to us just as they chose, but they were not to spread foolish reports. Sunday was a strangely quiet day, not one outside visitor came near.

Wednesday, 24th.—Praise the Lord, a few of our neighbours came in this morning; it was so nice to see them. The house seems so strangely quiet compared with the past state of things, when we were crowded with guests all day long. We can only go out late in the evening. The heat is great for this season, we must stay indoors; we dare not expose ourselves to the rays of the sun. We have need of patience; everything goes slowly in China.

We are firmly believing that the riot will tend "unto the furtherance of the Gospel" in this place. It will be worth much if we can get a better house; we are praying the Lord to give us one.

The Book of Acts is being opened up to us in a new way. I see clearly our commission is to preach "Jesus" to his people, "none other name." This name has still power to "turn the world upside down;" the people and the rulers of Kiang-tsin City are troubled, the mandarins are saying, "These people, being foreigners, do exceedingly trouble our city." The devil's power here has at last been stirred, but our Jesus is "stronger than he."

I. W. Ramsay.

A correspondent in Shanghai writes:—"Revs. O. F. Wikholm and A. D. Johnason, Swedish missionaries, were murdered on July 1 at Sungpu, 100 miles N.E. of Hankow, in an anti-foreign riot. Great blessing is attending the preaching of the Gospel in Shanghai. The missionaries are thoroughly united in spirit, both in prayer and effort, and from all sides come cheering testimonies to the power of God to save."

The Birmingham Homes of Industry.

A helpful and sympathetic spirit has asserted itself in Birmingham, which deserves wide appreciation. There are girls and young women well able to work for their living, but, unhappily, in some measure they are deficient in the self-protecting quality. Some of the ladies of Birmingham saw that there was work to be done in this direction, and a year ago a meeting was held at the Council-house, and a strong committee was formed to begin operations. A report has been issued, and it shows that a most satisfactory beginning has been made. The initial difficulties were considerable, but the committee may be congratulated on the amount of preventive work that has been already done. These ladies, having put their hands to the plough, now see how wide the field is on which they have entered, and it is reassuring to learn that they contemplate beginning another branch of social salvage work. For the sake, not only of the individuals, but the moral condition of their large city, it is to be hoped that they will press forward in the undertaking. If the work is onerous, there is none that is more productive in good results. It is an effort in which all good citizens will surely help, not only with moral support, but with generous financial aid. Mrs. A. Stacey, 30, Calthorpe-road, Edgbaston, Birmingham, honorary secretary, will be glad to supply friends with a copy of the first annual report.

Jews in Jerusalem.

The usual Missionary Prayer Meeting was held at the Metropolitan Tabernacle, on the evening of the Bank Holiday, Aug. 7. Over 2,000 were present, Rev. T. Spurgeon presiding. The principal speaker was Rev. A. Ben-Oliel, of Jerusalem, who was cordially introduced by Mr. Spurgeon. Mr. Ben-Oliel spoke of the origin of the Jerusalem Mission to the Sephardim Jews, long neglected for want of a labourer familiar with their domestic dialect or who could converse in Hebrew with rabbis and learned Jews. For three years he had supplied an upper room, where non-Episcopalians could worship God together. He referred also briefly to the labours of his wife and daughter among the Jewesses and the poor, and pleaded for an Evangelistic Hall in the Holy City, to be held in trust for all Evangelical workers.

THE NEW ERA.*

THE title of this able book may not be the happiest, simply because the cry of "a new era," "a better age," is always on the lips of men, and the dreams it kindles, or of which it is the expression, are never realised. Nevertheless in the sixteen chapters which he has written Dr. Strong has given us, from his point of view, an exhaustive, careful, and powerful discussion of the great questions which are to-day pressing upon the minds of the leading nations, especially England and the United States. His object is to show "why this is a period of transition, or to point out its relations to the past and future, and thus interpret its meaning." We think that too much stress is generally laid upon the fact that this is an age of transition; for if, as Dr. Strong affirms, "there must be a social evolution," the same may be said of every age; the past has been a preparation for the present, a passage into it, and the present holds the same relation to the future. The important question is, What is it a transition from and into?

Dr. Strong insists upon an acknowledgment being given to the two cardinal principles of individualism and socialism, and shows in an interesting way how nations have been influenced, as one principle or the other has been in the ascendant; individualism tending to wake them up from sleep, and give the fullest play to all the talent and energy they possessed; socialism tending to centralisation and stagnation. England may be taken to represent the former, China the latter. "The progress of civilisation has been slow because the conditions most favourable to the development of one of these principles have been least favourable to the development of the other. It is of the utmost significance that now for the first time in the history of the race, the same causes are favourable to the development of both. I refer to steam and electricity." (The italics are Dr. Strong's.) "Christianity as now understood is in favour of both principles, expounds and applies them, and is leading the nations to use the new conditions of the age for individual development and universal good. Dr. Strong, however, desires that this process should be carried forward intelligently, by men who know the laws of progress under which they live. "As Professor Peabody, of Harvard, happily says: 'True liberty is the discovery of one's place in the universal organism.' But the acceptance of our place in the universal organism involves our entering into right relations with our fellow men and with God, which is the acceptance of all moral and spiritual obligations, and which indicates a healthy, moral, and spiritual nature."

"The contribution made by the three great races of antiquity" towards preparing the world for the inauguration of the kingdom of God, is, of course, the familiar idea that the Jew contributed the religious, the Greek the intellectual, the Roman the physical preparation. Then we come to a chapter of supreme present-day importance on "the contribution made by the Anglo-Saxon," in which it is contended that "the qualities which made the Greeks, Hebrews, and Romans supreme in their respective spheres all unite in the Anglo-Saxon." Various and suggestive information forms the substratum of this chapter; apt quotations brighten it, and its argument is sure to be highly popular with the English-speaking race all the world over. Its facts ought to be full of solemn meaning to Anglo-Saxon Christians. Thus from one table we learn that, whereas in 1801, out of seven languages English ranked fifth, being spoken by 20,520,000, or 12·7 per cent., in 1890 it ranked first, being spoken by 111,100,000, or 27·7 per cent. Great nations like the peoples of India acquire it; travel, commerce, and the missionary disseminate it.

With great force it is asked, "Is there no significance in the fact that while the great races of antiquity occupied insignificant homes, and many inferior races have possessed superior lands, now for the first time in the record of history the greatest occupies the greatest home?"

We think that Dr. Strong has overlooked at least two important facts which go far to modify the conclusions of this chapter, if not to destroy them. First, when he says that "Great Britain is the richest nation of Europe, and the United States is richer than Great Britain," has he not counted the Jews as part and parcel of both? When money is involved they have a way of acting by themselves for themselves. Second: does he not forget that Europe, after all, especially in its northern parts, breeds stronger and more enduring races than America?

Students of social questions who are not believers in Christ will find in this book an uncompromising statement of the claims of "The Authoritative Teacher." In Jesus Christ our author sees the leader of men, "the Saviour of man as well as of men," and in the present condition of thought about Christ he recognises "the timing of Providence that the new era of the near future may indeed be the fuller coming of the kingdom."

The chapters on "Popular Discontent," on "The Problem of the Country," on "The Problem of the City," on "The Separation of the Masses from the Church," are replete with information, especially on the conditions of life in America, and shed much light on the problems to be solved. We are glad to note the emphasis which Dr. Strong lays on the necessity for individual loving aid. In his view, and in ours, too, "Christian work has become largely institutional instead of personal, and, therefore, largely mechanical instead of vital." Self-giving is the proof of love, but unhappily Church habits and methods have signally failed to manifest a personal love for non-churchgoers. It is the discontented class and the non-churchgoing class which are substantially the same. "It is the masses who are discontented; the masses who rule; the masses on whom the Church has lost her hold." Here we may ask—when had the Church ever a hold on the masses? It is not a lost hold, but a hold to be gained. It is the work the Church has been busy with from the beginnning—praying men to be reconciled unto God.

Dr. Strong insists that until the whole body of Christians undertakes the work of saving men, and the full force and value of "personal contact" has been proved, there can be no such thing as "the good seed" multiplying thirty-fold, sixty-fold, and an hundred-fold. "Self-giving can dissipate scepticism," and "self-giving only can solve the problem of pauperism." We have no space to quote his words on "institutional methods of Church work," or "the institutional Church," by which is meant a church with every kind of appliance for promoting the social and physical, as well as spiritual, well-being of the people. Much as we have doubted the safety of this method, weighty evidence is here produced of its happy effects on the spiritual life of the Church. We are in deep accord with Dr. Strong when he says at the end—"It is possible to see these opportunities and yet feel no thrill of new life unless there is added the quickening touch of the Divine Spirit. These great truths which have been pointed out are the fuel. If it is to be kindled into a blessed conflagration of Christian enthusiasm, the heavenly spark must fall. Let us gain a profound conviction of the worth of every human being, a profound conviction of human need, a profound conviction of the saving power of Jesus Christ and his truth, and surely we shall not wait in vain for the cloven tongue of Pentecostal flame."

Were the social questions of our age always discussed with such knowledge, insight, breadth of view, charity, and intenseness of loyalty to Christ as we find in this volume, we should more quickly reach their solution. J. P. GLEDSTONE.

Young Women in Alexandria.

MISS LIERHAMMER, whose work is highly commended by ministers, consuls, and others on the spot, has found that young girls are continually being enticed to leave their homes and go to Egypt, under the pretence of having more remunerative employment found for them, and that in most of these cases the unfortunate girls find, when they reach their destination, that they are expected to lead a shameful life, not seldom ending in suicide or starvation. In Europe many societies are doing their utmost to rescue these poor girls. There is in Alexandria urgent need for such rescue work, and Miss Lierhammer appeals to all who desire the welfare of young women to enable her to open a Home, where girls of all nationalities may be safely lodged until they can be restored to their families or sent to some respectable situation. The work has already gone on for two months, and with growing success. All ships likely to convey friendless girls are now visited immediately on arrival in port. Several girls have been interviewed, advised, and warned, and four of them have been sheltered for a time. The address is Miss Luisa Lierhammer, Maison Turin, Place de la Paille, Alexandria.

THE Y.M.C.A.

MR. W. R. LANE will speak at the Camden-road Rooms on Sunday, September 3, and each Thursday evening in September.

The Brighton Y.M.C.A. open-air band is having a busy time this month at the race meetings and each evening on the Lower Esplanade.

The Association in the Hawaiian Isles is reported as doing excellent work, both among young residents and on board ships visiting Honolulu.

A company of the Boys' Brigade has been recently started in connection with the Devonport Y.M.C.A. Bible classes, Gospel services, the use of a good library, gymnasium, and a drum-and-fife band are among the agencies employed. It is expected that the Brigade will prove a nursery for the Association.

The secretary of the Sheffield Y.M.C.A. wishes helpers for the Doncaster race week, September 4 to 11. During the last two years the association has organised parties of young men to work at Doncaster during the three principal days, but the opportunities for usefulness are so many, and the crowds attending so great, that more helpers are needed. Volunteers must be willing to pay their own expenses. Tract distributors, speakers, singers, organists, and those who can deal individually with men and women will find an open door in this great St. Leger festival. Address, Walter Jervis, Y.M.C.A., Sheffield.

During the past fortnight between forty and fifty members and friends of the Hackney Y.M.C.A. have been spending a delightful holiday on the Norfolk and Suffolk Broads, and at the same time engaging in active evangelistic work amongst the villages and towns of Broadland. Meetings were held at various places, including Beccles, Halesworth, Wissett, Bramfield, Wenhaston, Aldeby, Reedham, Norwich, Stalham, Palling, Ludham, Wroxham, Hickling, and Acle. The services were well attended, and the common people heard the Word gladly. The attendances varied according to the size of the village from sixty up to 600. The meetings were mostly held in the open air on the village green, in the middle of the street, or on the sea beach. Many testified to blessing received, and earnestly expressed the wish that the visitors would come again.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOUR NOTES.

FLOATING societies of Christian Endeavour are being successfully organised on board some of the ships of the United States Navy.

Ten couples (all past or present Christian Endeavourers) are shortly going forth from the Malua Institute, Samoa, to mission work in New Guinea.

The Ilkley Society held their first missionary social the other evening, when short papers were read by several of the members on various aspects of missionary work in Madagascar.

Rev. R. E. Speer, addressing C.E. (Presbyterian) Societies in the States, says: "In 1890-91 you gave, roughly, 5,910 dols.; in 1891-92, 13,353 dols.; in 1892-93, 24,568 dols. You are asked this year to give 60,000 dols. Some of you are already regular contributors. Your regular offerings and all others sent by you this coming year through the Board in New York or through the Women's Boards will be counted as part of the 60,000 dols. There is no doubt about your ability to give this much. The only question is why there is not faith to ask you for more. If each of you adopted the two cents. a week plan, you would raise over 300,000 dols. this year."

On Bank Holiday large numbers of Endeavourers from Luton, Dunstable, Houghton, and Stopsley drove in brakes and wagonettes to Berkhamsted, where they joined other parties from St. Albans, Hemel Hempstead, Maulden, and Berkhamsted. The meetings were held in the Congregational Church. After a business meeting a conference was held, when papers were read on "The Work of Committees, viz., the Prayer Meeting," by Mrs. Chamberlain (Berkhamsted); "The Look Out," by Mr. R. Oadley (St. Albans); "The Missionary," by Mr. J. S. Putnam (Hemel Hempstead); and "The Social," by Miss Millard (Dunstable). Addresses followed by Revs. J. T. Frost (Houghton) and C. M. Hardy, B.A. (St. Albans). In the evening a united Consecration Service was conducted by Rev. F. J. Flatt (Dunstable), followed by a public meeting.

THE BELLEVILLE MISSION, PARIS.—We regret to know that Miss Ker, the devoted helper of Miss De Broen in this good work among Parisian ouvriers, is in a very low state of health. The Mission is at this time in special need of sympathetic help, that its beneficent operations may be maintained. Miss de Broen may be addressed, 4, Horbury-crescent, Notting-hill-gate, W.

THE PROPOSED CONVENTUAL INQUIRY.

Sir,—Now that public attention has been fully drawn to this inquiry, it should be made to fulfil an important service by exposing to light all the information which has been accumulating for years, especially by the diligent research of such able men as have been nominated to serve on the Investigating Committee. Independent of Romish tactics, anyone who has read a little of canon law will know that Miss Golding will hardly be able to substantiate legally all her allegations. Whether this be so or not, I apprehend that it will be a step in the right direction if she is supported by all the circumstantial evidence that can be brought to bear on the subject, some of which may be gleaned from the writings of Romish authorities, together with the personal evidence of those who have escaped from the toils of Papacy.

For my part, I think Miss Golding, with her 25 years' experience, ought to inspire her friends with a little of that confidence which she herself possesses; therefore, I fail to see why "Vindex" should be overcome with "grief of mind" when such a grand opportunity arises to forward the cause of "Inspection," and when the course he suggests is still feasible.—Your obedient servant,

Bournemouth, August 12. W. D. Haslam.

RITUALISM IN EAST LONDON.

Sir,—The attack made on the action of the Council of the East London Church Fund in giving grants to certain churches, on the ground of their ritualistic practices, is so eminently unfair that the editor of The Christian will no doubt allow a word in reply.

A good deal may be said. In the first place, such practices as are specified at St. Clement's, as, e.g., the burning of candles before an image of our Lord, are so evidently a mere minor matter, an accident added to the main structure of St. Clement's teaching and work, that no business man would withhold a grant on the ground that candles were burnt, unless he wished to lose his reputation for common sense. If it be replied that this extravagance is systematic, and that it shows the general character of St. Clement's, then I reply that a Council has to deal with overt acts, and not with "general tendency" or "suspected motives."

(2) A large crucifix is objected to. Really, it is difficult to sympathise with the bigotry which can see something Romish in the presentment of our Lord's passion.

(3) "On the west wall of the church a list of the names of dead persons for whose souls in purgatory prayers were asked and being offered." I doubt very much whether the word or thing purgatory is to be found alluded to in this notice. What the Church of England objects to is the "Roman doctrine concerning purgatory." The intermediate state, as witnessed to by the New Testament, and referred to in every ancient Liturgy, she by implication allows. The practice of praying for the souls of our lost ones is sanctioned by natural feeling, antiquity, and the New Testament. St. Clement's has not gone beyond that.

(4) The same Church is said also to have "a Ward of the Romish Confraternity of the Blessed Sacrament." This is a mistake. There is a C.B.S. in the Roman Church and a C.B.S. in the English, and they are not identical.

(5) The eastward position is complained of. Would the gentleman who complains have the Council condemn the Church for doing what the Archbishop of Canterbury has pronounced not illegal?

(6) "Manual acts after the Romish fashion." How does he know? What are they?

(7) "Four lighted candles brought in for the act of Transubstantiation." This act exists only in the brain of the careless visitor. The Real Presence of our Lord is one thing; Transubstantiation something entirely different.

But why go through the tedious list? The complaint really amounts to a condemnation, because the service was not of the sort approved by the complainant.

There are two other points which the Editor of The Christian will think worth notice. One is that, after all, allowing that the worship is extreme, yet it represents a small part of the work done. The moral and spiritual good of the people are cared for; they are civilised, humanised, Christianised. Let the work go on and be proved by time. If it be of man it will come to nought; if it be of God then its opponents will be fighting against Him.

The other is that the writer continually uses the epithet Romish. This is gravely culpable. He ought to know that it is an offence against truth and fair-dealing to use question-begging terms. To libel is not the same as to disprove. And what the writer calls Romish, thousands strenuously uphold as Catholic, and anti-Roman because ante-Roman.

I wish to add as another example of the writer's incompetence that he speaks of thirteen churches circulating "fasting, communion, penance, reserved sacrament, etc.," and of the E.C.U. as pledged to visible communion with the Papal anti-Christ. The E.C.U. is pledged to nothing at all in relation to inter-communion with Rome. Its President has certainly, and very properly, expressed a strong desire for reunion, but it is dishonest to omit his repeated declaration, that any such reunion must be "through the truth." In other words, he would see Rome's errors abandoned first. To speak of the "E.C.U." instead of Lord Halifax, and of "the Papal anti-Christ" instead of a purified Rome, is the height of uncandid and blundering opposition.

"A PERFECTIONIST SNARE."

Sir,—The letter from Mr. T. M. Neatby, in a recent issue under the above title, calls for careful reply. His statement, that "if intention and not achievement is the touchstone of our conduct, then the foundations of morality are sapped," is not in accord either with Scripture or sound philosophy. When the widow woman cast her two mites into the Treasury, our Saviour stated that she had cast in MORE than any of the rich had contributed. Did this "MORE" consist in intention or achievement? Again, St. Paul tells us, in 2 Cor. viii. 12, "If there be first a willing mind"—i.e. the intention—"it is accepted according to that a man hath, and not according to that he hath not." Is this intention or achievement? Surely, therefore, Thomas Cook is right when he says in his tract in question, "On the principle of merit... achievement and not intention would be taken into account. But God looks more at what we intend to do than at what we do"—i.e. at what we achieve.

Let me quote Professor C. G. Finney, one of the ablest of Christian philosophers, and one of God's most honoured servants in the conversion and sanctification of souls. In his "Systematic Theology," edited by Dr. Redford, we read: "Moral character is and must be as the intention is. Whatever is beyond the control of a moral agent he cannot be responsible for. Whatever he cannot control by intention he cannot control at all. Everything for which he can possibly be responsible resolves itself into his intention. Outward actions are required of men only because they are connected with intention by a natural necessity. And no outward action is ever required of us unless it can be produced by intending or aiming to do it" (pp. 146, 147).

"The law of God requires supreme disinterested benevolence, and all holiness in the last analysis resolves itself into some modification of supreme disinterested benevolence or good-willing. Benevolence or good-willing is synonymous with good-intending, or intending good. Now the true spirit of the requirement of the moral law is this—that every moral being shall choose every interest according to its value as perceived by the mind. This is holiness. It is exercising supreme love or good-will to God, and equal love or good-will to our neighbour. This is choice or intention. Holiness or virtue consists in the supreme ultimate intention, choice, or willing of the highest well-being of God, and the highest good of his Kingdom. Nothing else than this is holiness or virtue" (pp. 140, 141).

Not only is Mr. Neatby mistaken in putting achievement before intention, but he also neglects, in condemning Mr. Thomas Cook, to take into consideration a most important fact, which Mr. Cook brings clearly out in his little book, as does Finney in the passages I have quoted. This fact is, that perfect love to God includes and necessitates equal love towards our fellow men, and therefore forbids any unkind treatment of others in any way or shape. Therefore anything like persecution is incompatible with perfect love to God or "Scriptural perfection."

I would venture to remind Mr. Neatby and others who are in the habit of comparing honoured servants of God with Jesuits, or of applying to them the name of "perfectionists," of our Saviour's words, "By their fruits ye shall know them." If the Wesleys, Fletcher, Finney, Mahan, Thomas Cook, and countless more, who in all ages have preached that Christ is a Saviour from ALL sin—internal, external, past, present, and future—have been teaching error instead of God's truth, how is it that He has so marvellously honoured these men in making them the instruments of the salvation of countless thousands of souls?

Let me conclude by quoting Finney once more: "The true foundation of moral obligation is the intrinsic value and nature of the highest well-being of God and of the universe. Moral obligation regards the choice of an ultimate end. This end is a clear, simple unit. It is necessarily known to every moral agent. The choice of this end is the whole of virtue, and it is impossible to sin while this end is sincerely intended with all the heart and soul. There can scarcely be a more dangerous error than to say that while we are conscious of present sin we are, or can be, in a state acceptable to God" (pp. 132, 153).—Yours truly, Henry E. Millar.

EDUCATION AND MISSIONS.

Dear Sir,—The Christian of June 15 has com by the last mail, and this letter cannot be printe till long after Mr. Phillips' articles have been rea in England; still, I hope you will publish it, as th subject, "Education and Missions," is important.

I agree with a great deal of what Mr. Phillips say but think he has been too ready to generalise hi statements, and to apply to the whole of India wha is really only applicable to a part. He says:—"On thing is certain, and cannot be too strongly em phasised, viz., that "should our schools and college be the means of bringing any member to a publi profession of Christianity, they would be hopelessl emptied! This is placed beyond a doubt....."

This is not true of the North-West Provinces an Oudh. I baptized a boy in Class II. of the Church Mission High School, Lucknow, of which I am i charge, and I do not know of any boys who left th school. Before this the second master in the schoo a high caste man, was baptized, and continued t work in the school. A young man who had left th school, and is working as a railway clerk, has sinc been baptized.

Again, he says: "Government will not give grant to teachers who have not passed certain prescribe examinations." This does not apply to N.W.P. an Oudh. Our head-master and several others hav passed no examinations at all, yet we draw a gran in aid from Government.

Again, he says: "The principle laid down in thi paper involves, if carried to its logical conclusion the giving up of Government grants": and lowe down in the same paragraph, "I am not prepared however, to suggest that we should give up Govern ment grants." Does Mr. Phillips not believe tha the silver and the gold are the Lord's, or cannot h trust God to supply all that is needed to carry on hi work? If Government grants hinder spiritual work let them be given up at once. In our case they d not hinder it.

Again, he says: "Government looks to head an brain qualifications; we must look to heart as well. By inserting the words "as well," he admits that w must look to head and brain qualifications, too, an in this he is right, for if we do not give as good a education as Government schools, no boys, Christia or non-Christian, will come to us. I go further however, and say that Christians ought to give better education, for we ought to be filled with th Spirit that we may do ALL to the glory of God whether we preach, or teach A B C.

Again, he says: "Most, if not all, our schools an colleges have been established, and are being carrie on irrespective of the needs of the Indian Chri tians." The C.M.S. High School was establishe when there was no Indian Church in Lucknow, so i needs could not then be considered. It has bee transferred to a new building, that it may be neare the homes of Indian Christians. St. John's Colleg Agra, and the Christian College, Lucknow, ar intended specially for Christians.

I heartily agree, however, with Mr. Phillips, th fifteen to two is not the right proportion of teachin evangelists to preaching evangelists. It ough rather, to be two to fifteen.—Yours truly, Lucknow, July 18. A. I. Birkett.

NEWSPAPER IRREVERENCE.

Dear Sir,—I was particularly thankful to observ in your editorial pages, a few weeks ago, a paragrap deprecating the growing practice of Scriptural qu tation and reference in a way of jest and bante The Daily News of August 4 contained a most offe sive leaderette in this particular. Mr. Goschen the object of what is evidently intended to be scat ing irony, and in the space of three or four lines many passages of the Word of God are twisted o of their proper connection for the purpose of makin sarcasm and supposed wit more telling. Our lead writers and newspaper proprietors surely do not su pose that it is gratifying to their readers to find sc Scriptural phrases as "need no repentance," "jus man made perfect," "entered into the inheritan prepared for him from the foundation of the world and other sentences bearing the most hallowed ass ciations prostituted to serve the purpose of a mer political hit.—Yours faithfully, F. MISSIONARY LEAFLETS.

Dear Sir,—Might I suggest through your colum that missionary leaflets or tracts giving short a clear information about the Lord's work in fore lands would be most useful, if printed in a for suitable for enclosing in letters? I often feel t need of something of the kind.

Will someone who has the time and the abi take up this work, and help to spread and deepen t interest in foreign missions?—Yours in the Lor service, A Home Missionary

Notes and Comments.

NEXT week we purpose giving portrait and sketch of the late Rev. T. W. Brown, D.D., ex-Secretary of the Turkish Missions Aid Society.

There appears to be something like an epidemic of suicide amongst us at present. Out of one case a lengthy correspondence has arisen in the columns of The Daily Chronicle, the leading feature of which, so far, has been a suggestion by a well-known literary critic that the Government should provide "lethal chambers" at convenient centres, where the depressed and discontented could comfortably shuffle off this mortal coil." The proposal is so outrageous that one can scarcely regard it with seriousness; and we are inclined to agree with some correspondents that it ought never to have seen the light through the columns of a reputable journal.

It would be unfair to put all instances of self-destruction into the same category. Doubtless there are cases where the accumulated ills and sorrows of life so press on the mental machinery that it is for the time thrown out of gear, and the verdict of "temporary insanity" is not inappropriate. There are other cases reported where the rash and wicked act is clearly the result of low and materialistic views of life and its responsibilities. One correspondent of The Chronicle rightly finds the solution of such desperate deeds in the fact that "men take the control and direction of their lives out of the hands of God." The trustful Christian knows that life will not be exempt from trial, but he knows also that for every buffeting storm of circumstance a sufficient shelter will be provided. If people would but learn the philosophy of Paul, who, greatly tried though he was, rejoiced in the belief that all life's sufferings are as nothing compared with the glory that is to follow, they would endure patiently, and endure to the end.

"The needy shall not always be forgotten; the expectation of the poor shall not perish for ever." We have elsewhere referred to the condition of the poor in some other lands; we have here to note the appearance in The Daily News of an article on the Church and the Homes of the Poor by Rev. Arthur Robins, of Windsor, which sets forth once again the miserable condition of the homes of the people, charges the Church with the sin of neglecting to improve it, and affirms that "human homes can be built all over the country to return not less than 4½ to 5 per cent. upon the outlay." Mr. Robins is of opinion that slums will never be done away until the fit housing of the poor becomes compulsory, and "all medical officers of health made supreme over cities, towns, or districts, and all sanitary inspectors are the officers of the State, and not the servants of the local authority."

The remarks of Mr. J. Addison, Q.C., M.P., in his charge to the grand jury of the Salford sessions, on the diminution of crime throughout England, are full of encouragement to reformers. The diminution is great, is extended over the whole country, and has proceeded at a steady rate for a considerable period of time. He was of opinion that the two principal causes of the improvement are the religious and moral agencies which are always at work; and that two subsidiary causes are the Elementary Education Act and the Licensing Acts of 1872 and 1874. If Mr. Addison is right in ascribing so much as he does to the Licensing Acts, then he entirely justifies the temperance party in their demand for further legislation on the same lines.

Rev. W. L. Watkinson, who has been appointed Connexional Secretary of the Wesleyan Methodists, in succession to Rev. B. Gregory, has a sermon in his able volume, "The Transfigured Sackloth," on "The Transformation of Evil," which we wish a great many professing Christians would read. He is especially searching and admonitory in his warnings on the transformation of evil as seen in fiction.

> By imagination's aid souls are lured into corruption, misery, ruin. Atheism has signally failed in practical life to produce beautiful characters—its biographies are terribly disappointing; but the novels of scepticism are producing magnificent characters; indeed, it may be confessed that their paper saints are of an ideal perfection. In our fiction also, immoral characters are often made to appear altogether heroic and charming.

This sermon should be read along with Dr. Conan Doyle's paper at the Lucerne Conference, and it will show how superficial and unsatisfactory that paper is.

The announcement of the Behring Sea award gave great satisfaction in England, as it was thought that she had gained all her points; in America it was received with something like indifference, as a kind of foregone conclusion. From Victoria, British Columbia, comes the news that the local sealers consider the result as dead fruit; although they are glad at being compensated for losses, they declare that the new regulations will greatly imperil, if they do not even ruin, their interests, by giving the United States the real benefit of the arbitration. A similar view seems to be held in Ottawa. Such opinions should not affect our estimate of the superiority of arbitration over war as a means of settling disputes. No award can ever give satisfaction to both sides; but in war how much greater are the causes for dissatisfaction and complaint. As time advances the awards of arbitration will appear in a better light, while the fruits of war appear blacker and more repellent. If ever a nation gained her end by war it was Germany, but what an enormous discount has to be taken from her conquests.

The International Congress at Zurich did not omit to deal with the question of the attitude which working-men should observe in the event of hostilities being entered upon between any two nations. The Congress discussed and rejected the plan of a general strike as a means of rendering war impossible after it had been declared. Finally, a resolution was carried in favour of aiming at the suppression of militarism by withholding supplies. How this is to be done we are not told, whether by refusing to pay taxes, and if refusing, whether to submit quietly to distraint of goods, or to resist such distraint. These, however, are secondary matters. The important and significant thing is, that these wealth-producers agree to stop the supplies. Making war is no longer to be the business of kings and senates—that is the thing close at hand.

In the course of a recent criminal trial at the Court of Justiciary, Edinburgh, Lord Young, one of the judges of the High Court, said that in Glasgow the crime was inconsiderable for such a populous place. This he attributed largely to the efforts of its generous and benevolent citizens. There is no doubt that the Christian public sentiment in Glasgow has of late years secured the election of local authorities who have felt their responsibility as to the lessening of crime in all its grosser forms, as well as to the improvement of the social surroundings of the great labouring class. Glasgow has proved (as other cities might equally prove) that if men cannot be made moral by Acts of Parliament, at any rate the removal of incitements to evil will sensibly diminish that evil, so far as it appears on the surface.

It says little for the elevating influences of the Papal system that in a land like Spain, where it has long had full scope, the popular tastes in "pastime" so called are retrograding to a point worthy of the darkest and rudest ages. In a recent bull fight near Madrid, in spite of official orders to the contrary, strong animals with bare horns were brought into the ring. One young toreador was gored to death, and a number of others tossed and trampled on. A London daily paper, whose correspondent describes the scene, may well call it "a disgrace to civilisation."

The Lyceum, which is the monthly organ of the Jesuits in Ireland, had an article in July on "The Jew in Ireland," which contained fresh information, and was by no means friendly in tone. It declares that Jews are settling in ever-increasing numbers in Dublin; that close to the quarter of the city which they frequent a spacious synagogue has recently been built; that in some of the streets of the Jewish quarter you may walk from end to end, and hardly hear a word of English spoken by the children who are at play on the footpath. In that district you might think you were wandering through some city of Poland or Southern Russia. The Jew is looked upon by this writer as a danger to Irish social and economic life because of his gombeening propensities; he goes about as a petty trader, selling cheap wares, pious pictures, statues of the Christian Redeemer, and allowing his customers to pay in instalments spread over a considerable time.

It is clearly pointed out that the ways of the Jew in Ireland are precisely the same as those which have earned him unpopularity in Germany. The writer of the article says that if the Jew comes to take a share in Irish industries, to be an honest producer to contribute by his labour to the general wealth, he is welcome; but if he comes merely as a parasite, to live upon the fruits of the labours of others, "which he secures by the acts of doubtful traffic and dangerous money lending, then let him not be more welcome here than he is among the peasants of Germany or among the labourers of France." We only wish he might become a worker on the soil, an artisan, a producer; but if in Ireland, as in so many other places, he chooses trade, it will not be permitted the people who have bought his wares to persecute him, and amuse themselves with Jew-baiting. Rome will not be allowed a renewal of her former ways of treating Jews. We are not anxious as to the fate of the immigrants to the Emerald Isle.

Details have now been received of the murder of two Swedish missionaries on July 1, at Sung-pu, near Hankow. Revs. O. F. Wikholm and J. A. D. Johansson were, it appears, hounded to death by a mob infuriated against foreigners, and obviously reckoning upon the sympathy or connivance of the district magistrate. In a carefully-prepared statement of the facts, Dr. Griffith John says:—

Since the massacre of Tientsin, nothing more terrible has occurred in China. The attack was not made by the people of Sung-pu, but by the people of a group of villages four or five miles off. The whole thing seems to have been set in motion by a powerful bully named Li Kia-tsung, a native of Ta-yeu-chai, one of those villages. I give it as my decided conviction that the murder would never have been perpetrated had the Macheng magistrate done his duty. But behind all you have the anti-foreign feeling which pervades the official class from top to bottom, and of which the people are thoroughly aware.

Dr. John asks: "What will the Viceroy do?" Certainly the situation is grave in the extreme, for, according to a letter from the Shanghai correspondent of The Daily Chronicle, the Kolao-Hui secret society has again become active, with designs against the Government as well as the hated foreigner.

Among the many parallels which may be drawn between the Living and the written Word is that of the intense humanness which belongs to both. Just as He who was in truth the Son of God, yet showed Himself to be as truly the Son of Man, so that Word which is manifestly Divine, yet comes down to the level of our humanity, and associates itself with all our earthly experiences. The personal Logos became incarnate that He might have a point of contact with every phase of human need, and so the Holy Ghost in the sacred page accommodates Himself to every aspect of our helplessness and frail mortality. The "Holy One" and the "Holy Scriptures" are both God manifested in flesh, the Light of lights flashing forth through human media, perfect in Divine perfection, yet stooping down to the level of flesh and blood, with all its craving for deliverance and aid.

As well might we reject the Deity of Christ, because of his lowly guise as the despised man of Nazareth, as reject the Book of God because of its coming to us through human channels, and bearing marks of its human authorship. Herein lies its charm, and its wondrous power to touch our hearts and bless our souls. Had it come to us with all the majesty of diction and infinity of thought which, as the Word of God it breathes and might well have assumed, we should, like Israel at Sinai, have been appalled by its sublimity, and have fled from its awful voice. But coming as it does through men who, though divinely inspired, were yet of like passions with ourselves, it reaches our inmost soul, and draws us to its dictates by winsome spell of love, which reveals the transcendent grace that gave it birth. Thus, as in Christ, so in the Scriptures which reveal Him, God and man meet together, and incarnate Love accomplishes its gracious end.

REVIVAL IN IRELAND.

The work of God still goes on in the neighbourhood of Ballymena, for which many—I trust all your readers—will give praise to the blessed name of Him who works after the counsel of his own will.

About eight weeks ago Mr. David Rea took his canvas tent to the village of Ahoghill, about four miles from the town, and the blessing has far exceeded all expectation, as it was looked upon as a cold, prejudiced place. The tent, which seats six hundred, was soon found to be too small, and an additional pole and canvas were put to it to try and accommodate the numbers attending on Lord's-day evenings, which were over twelve hundred. On Lord's-day evening, which was the last night of the meetings there, the sight was truly a rare one. Seats were provided for nine hundred and sixty; but long before the hour for the meeting to commence, not alone were the seats occupied to the full, but as many more outside as would fill another tent. Many—from eleven years of age to three-score-and-ten—have professed to find peace with God, and many others are under deep conviction of sin.

On Thursday last the tent was removed to Broughshane, where the power and presence of God were so manifest last winter, and where the interest seems to be unabated. Will the Lord's people remember this place in prayer that his word may have free course and be glorified?

WORK OF GRACE ON THE CONGO.

I write in deep thankfulness to God for his abundant mercies and blessing to us. We have in our Congo-Balolo Mission truly seen the hand of death. Since October of last year five of our number have entered into the Divine presence of our Father. In the midst of sorrow our hearts have been cheered by many coming forward to give their hearts to Jesus. I had occasion to visit Bongandanga, and on Easter Sunday morning had the pleasure of assisting Mr. Haupt in the baptism of thirteen natives. On Sunday, April 9, two were baptized at our own station—Ikau. On Sunday, April 23, eight more were baptized, and on Sunday last, April 30, nineteen lads were baptized. Most of these have been candidates for seven or eight months, and now there are more to follow. In these baptisms we thought of "the great cloud of witnesses," from the African field looking on. The s.s. Pioneer being in, we had a visit from dear Mrs. McKittrick, also Mr. Bett, who was taking the steamer on to Bongandanga. I can assure you that John McKittrick, John Luff, Scarnell, and others were not forgotten. At the communion our hearts were full. About forty lads sat down with us at the Lord's Table. Could it be so? Yes, full forty. I felt like shouting "Hallelujah." Truly "the Lord hath done great thing for us, whereof we are glad." We are looking forward for news from Bongandanga. We are expecting to hear of a mighty blessing there. A work of grace seems to be going on everywhere amongst the lads. Oh for more older ones. In this time of refreshing pray for us that we may lead these day by day closer to Him.

TIBETAN MISSION.—Communications as to the work in Tibet should be sent to Miss A. R. Taylor, care of China Inland Mission, 4, Pyrland-road, N. The funds for this work are being kept quite distinct from those of the C.I.M. for the present, and under Miss Taylor's control, until the Tibetan Mission takes shape, and definite arrangements are made.

WORK AMONG KANAKAS.

An account of the Kanakas of Queensland appears in the Australian S.S. Teacher for July. The writer protests against the idea that Kanaka labour is slavery, maintaining "that there is not a more independent people under the sun than the Kanakas of North Queensland," and painting their life and treatment in somewhat roseate hues. No one doubts that there are kindly planters who use their people well, but even then the abuses of the traffic itself remain. The chief interest in the paper lies in its description of Christian work. The writer says:—

A great deal has been said about the non-success of mission-work amongst the "boys" in Queensland. I am inclined to think that it is more successful here than on their islands, and I have great reasons for so thinking. In the islands they are surrounded by every form of heathenism. They are all extremely superstitious, and it is very difficult to break through their prejudices. Why, even here we have them to contend against, but, of course, to a much smaller extent. For example, on a plantation near to us there is a large number of Aoba men employed. They, I find, are harder to win than any other (excepting Malayta), and why? because they are many in numbers, and when some of their countrymen come to school they have to stand all kinds of persecution from the others. Many of them have been won for Jesus, but not so good an average as other islands.

TESTIMONIES OF THE "BOYS."

One of them, the other Sunday, in speaking, said that, "before he came to school, he walked in darkness like he not have any eyes to see with; but now Jesus made plenty light about him, and he could say, like the blind man, that, 'Whereas once he was blind, now he could see.'" What could be more beautiful or true than this simple testimony? Another, speaking on "Ye must be born again," spoke thus: "Born again in Jesus, live new life, throw away altogether old way, and live for Jesus only." Could the most brilliant speaker say more? I trow not, for in these words lie the secret of a happy life and a glorious death. One "boy" came lately to say good-bye ere returning home. His words were: "Good-bye, missis, suppose me no see you again in this world, me meet you in heaven." I reminded him that God would be with him on his island, if he remained true to Him, and his face brightened as he said, "Yes, missis; Jesus say, 'Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world,'" Is this not another proof that they understand what they are taught? Tom (a Tanna "boy") died on a neighbouring plantation some few months ago. I had been to see him, two days before his death, when he appeared to be much better, and assured me that he would soon be back at school again; but this was not to be—I had looked upon him for the last time in this world, for on the second day after I saw him his spirit departed. Joe, a Sandwich Islander who helps me in school, was with him, and his last words were, "Tell missis I was not afraid to die," and so he passed away.

Another correspondent of The Sunday-School Teacher gives a description of similar work in quite a different part of Queensland. Here is a good incident:—

One of my best and steadiest boys, a baptized convert, is Natiogartie, and he was won to the Christian life by the consistent walk of another scholar of mine, Patrick Yorripin, a Tanna boy, who left me to find work far north on the Johnston river. Natiogartie was frequently spoken to there by Patrick concerning the better life, and noticed how his comrade knelt down to pray morning and evening in the megass yard, where their work lay. Greatly puzzled, Natiogartie at length ventured to ask "What work he make along ground? what for he talk along himself?" and then Patrick explained all, and was afterwards very closely watched by his mates, and was tried, though in vain, to see if he practised this better life he talked about, and, finding he did, they decided to come and see for themselves, as did the disciples of old. Thus Patrick came south again with a small tribe of boys, all of whom were afterwards baptized, and lived as became their profession.

Whatever be our view of the Kanaka traffic itself, we rejoice that Christians in the far south see the opportunities presented, and are wise to turn them to good account.

The Poor of the World.

The Rev. S. A. Barnett says, in an article n The Fortnightly on "The Poor of the Vorld," that whereas the total yearly income f each member of this nation is £33, and in urkey £4, in India it is only £2. Two llions of deaths annually arise in India from d and insufficient food and general insani- ry conditions. Vast multitudes live at most the lowest level compatible with con- ued existence. According to official evi- nce of the highest character, the condition the tenantry in several parts of India is a il to society and a disgrace to any civilised inistration. Mr. Barnett is of opinion at, although the poor of India are generally ntented with their lot, their condition is full danger to society and the State; their norance is the cause of their ferocity and o of their contentment, but this means ir constant exposure to famine. Ignorant d untrained to self-restraint, any trifling ident may at any moment "rouse thou- ds to sudden anger, and encourage them acts of murder." All the more need, there- e, that our government should be just, oral, and Christian; and, spite of England's lings, she has done much for India.

Mr. Barnett found no poverty worth the me in Japan. Some of the "professors" emed, however, to be of opinion that it uld come as the "necessary equipment of ation which had adopted Western civilisa- n." A very painful comment on the ilisation; in this view, it is backward pro- ess. The reasons why Japan has no erty are manifold; one is the land system, ich has given to every worker a holding d encouraged him to supply his wants by own labour; effort has thus been veloped and wants are limited. Another is national taste for country beauty; country has its own interest, and men do not (at esent) crowd the cities for the sake of excite- nt. The Japanese are also without a love ostentatious luxury, the habits of living ing much the same in all classes. The uality of manners is given as a final reason; e governor lets his child go to the common ool, and sit next to the child of the casual ourer, certain that he will get no con- mination in thought or in person. This uld shock English feeling, no doubt; but rhaps a School Board school would be found ite as pure and refined as a Public School, we dared to try it. A boy from such a ool, the son of a deceased Independent inister, was at the head of the 2,000 ccessful candidates for matriculation at the ndon University this year.

It is now a well-known fact that the ited States have their poverty problem. . Barnett says that "the poor are (1) a body tramps, single men, who, during the mmer, travel the country, doing jobs on the ms, and during the winter throng the ns; (2) foreign immigrants; (3) the weak, e thriftless, and the drunken." Boston is id to have one in twenty or one in fifteen of people in receipt of help; its poor live in healthy houses such as would be con- mned in London on account of want of air d bad sanitary arrangements. Chicago, th all its wealth and all its charities, is in dreadful plight; so, too, is San Francisco; d New York, as we all know, is far worse an London. The ready but thoughtless ving of the rich is said to aggravate and rpetuate the evil; on the other hand, the or of the States are not so hopeless as those England, but are always looking for better nes, and have the faith that a better fate is store for their children.

World-Wide Evangelization.—3.

When I was a young lawyer it was my custom, about forty-three years ago, to preach in the open-air on Sunday afternoons, not far from St. John's Church, Liverpool. The most frequent interrupters cried out, "Who sent you to preach?" One evening my friend the late Canon Falloon, then incumbent of St. John's, as he retired from his pulpit to the vestry, after preaching, beckoned to me and said, "I have a text for you, The Spirit and the bride say, Come, and let him that heareth say, Come, and let him that is athirst come: and whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely." (Rev. xxii, 17).

Now, if in this year of our Lord 1893, by all the efforts of all ministers and all the male and female city missionaries, in addition to much voluntary unpaid labour, the population of London is being imperfectly reached, and this after centuries of Christianity; are we not dreamers if we expect to evangelize far vaster heathen lands, unless we follow the example of the outspoken persecuted Christians of the first centuries? I write in no disparagement of the noble men and blessed women now labouring in heathen lands. But is it not written, "Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings Thou hast ordained strength, that Thou mayest still the enemy and the avenger, that no flesh should glory in thy presence!"

And surely we cannot but believe that when there was no printing, no steamboats, no railways, in the early centuries, the rapid spread of the Gospel was instrumentally owing more than now to the gratuitous efforts and outspoken boldness of each individual convert, man or woman, master or servant, freeman or slave, not only talking and preaching, but actually bearing witness for Christ at the risk of life, and boldly yielding themselves to cruel deaths.

In this critical hour I would again specially entreat prayer for our own country and our colonies, for the United States, and for the people of Russia from the Tzar downwards, and especially for the Greek Church, for the persecuted Jews, and the poor Stundists; because our loving Father turned the scattering out of Jerusalem and many of the subsequent bloody persecutions into blessings to the world, making again and again the blood of the martyrs to be truly the seed of the Church. Let us have faith in our Heavenly Father, the Lord God Almighty, and with one accord pray for the whole earth. Oh the wonders to be expected from Christians asking UNITEDLY AND FOR GOD'S GLORY! Was not the blessed awakening of 1859-60 a result of closet-prayer and combined one-accord prayer?

His arm now, in 1893, is not shortened that it cannot save! But let not our iniquities, or our mistakes, or our luke warmness, and especially the ungrateful iniquity of unbelief, stay the putting forth of his all-mighty arm. He tells us (Psalm ii. 8), as it were, to present cheques on his bank in the name of his well-beloved Son, saying, "Ask of me, and I shall give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession." But He tells us to ask for large amounts, for his words are, "Open thy mouth wide, and I will fill it."

The great heathen empire of Rome, at the instigation of the Jews, crucified the World's Redeemer and scattered his followers like chaff before the whirlwind, hunting them and ingeniously torturing multitudes of them by deaths most cruel. But the sheep conquered the wolves, and ere long the heathen Roman Empire declared itself for Christ.*

Is this, then, an hour for us to ask little things! No, never! For the weapons of our warfare are not pins and needles or baby's toys, but are still mighty through God to the pulling down of strongholds. Yet, let us in our inmost souls ever remember that our weapons are mighty only through God.

Reginald Radcliffe.

A PASSION FOR SOULS.

What we want is preaching, but preaching of the right sort. It goes without saying that it must be passionate preaching. A cold tongue, a calm tongue, a dry tongue, is worse than useless. It must be a tongue "of fire." We have had too many essays in the pulpit. Real preachers are not schoolmasters or academic professors. It is all rubbish to talk about an "instructive ministry" which does not inflame the imagination or fire the heart. All real preachers—that is to say, prophets—have always had tongues "of fire," even when their temperaments were philosophical and their tendency logical and didactic. Think of the great Dr. Bunting. He was not a rhetorician or a rhapsodist. But he sobbed and wept in the pulpit of Grosvenor-street, Manchester, as he pleaded passionately with what was then the wealthiest and most fashionable congregation of Methodism to forsake their sins that very hour. How puerile it is to say that some men cannot plead earnestly and intensely, but must be cold, calm, reserved. There is latent in every heart an inexhaustible fund of enthusiasm and emotion that is raised to a white heat when we are possessed by "the passion for souls," and are baptized with the Holy Ghost "and with fire."

Without that baptism we are weak as other men. We may instruct, please, or amuse; but we shall never persuade our hearers to submit themselves to Christ. Even when, by the grace of God, in answer to believing and expectant prayer, we have received the baptism of fire, we must use our brains, the whole of our brains, if we mean to do real and permanent good.

We are not pleading for any particular machinery, or for any particular methods of work or types of agency. But every faithful minister must be a soul-winner, and must speak and act as though he expected Christ to do now what He has always been doing. We must expect conversions and arrange for conversions. Preaching is not an end in itself. It is only a means to an end. And unless it produces that end, it is worse than a failure—it is a delusion and a snare. Every consideration of personal ease, and personal ambition, and personal gratification must be subordinated to the one paramount duty of persuading men to submit to Christ, and to submit while we are yet speaking to them. We have not said a tithe of what ought to be said. The subject is almost inexhaustible. But the main thing is to remember that the pulpit is the key to the situation. If we succeed there, we shall succeed everywhere. If we fail there, all success elsewhere will be an empty show, and will be followed by bitter disappointment.—The Methodist Times.

THE OPIUM COMMISSION has now been definitely constituted as follows: Lord Brassey (chairman), Mr. Caine, M.P., Mr. R. G. Mowbray, M.P., Mr. Arthur Pease, Sir William Roberts, Sir James Lyall, Mr. Fanshawe, a Bengali landowner concerned in poppy cultivation, and a well-known Indian merchant. The secretary of the Commission is Mr. Prescott Hewett.

THE SI-GAN PLAIN.—Two new stations have been opened by the C. I. M. in this populous plain. Mr. Stevenson says: "I believe that when once the Gospel begins to take hold of the Si-gan Plain, we shall have a large number of converts; meanwhile we praise God for the progress our friends are making. Messrs. Hendriksen and Soderström are at Lung-chan; Messrs. Lagerquist and Hagquist are at Cheo-chih Hien."

* Dean Alford, in his comments on 1 Cor. i. 26, quoting Olshausen, observes, "The ancient Christians were for the most part slaves and men of low station; the whole history of the expansion of the Church is in reality a progressive history of the ignorant over the learned, the lowly over the lofty, until the emperor himself laid down his crown before the Cross of Christ."

The Key-Notes of Life.

By Rev. F. B. Meyer, B.A.

POWER.

Man longs for Power. The young man will give all he has for love, the older man counts no sacrifice too great for power. He who wields power is the idol of his fellows, even though, like the first Napoleon, he has won it at the cost of the suffering of myriads. We are not wrong in longing for spiritual power, if only we desire it for the glory of our Master and the blessing of man. It is even our duty to covet this great gift, and to take all means to procure it, that we may be strong and able to do exploits.

Let us never forget that the power of the spiritual realm is never to be had except in submission to the laws of its operation. All around us in our world-home great forces are throbbing, prepared to do our bidding, to carry our messages or draw our carriages; but we must obey them ere we can use them. Once learn the laws of their operation, and yield to them exact obedience, and there is nothing they will not do, toiling like another Hercules in notable deeds. Scientific men are devoting their nights and days to discover the laws of the operation of physical forces, that they may communicate them to their fellows, and that these may in turn yield humble and punctilious compliance. Similarly we must learn, by prayer and watching, the laws of the operation of the power of God, that we may adapt our lives and methods to benefit by each throb and pulse of it which may be within the reach of man.

We must remember also that spiritual power is not a separate entity, which we may possess independently of the Holy Spirit. The power of the spiritual world is the indwelling and inspiration of the Holy Spirit Himself. We cannot have it apart from Him. We diminish it when He is grieved or quenched. We are most evidently the subjects and vehicles of it, when He resides in his gracious fulness in yielded and loving hearts. We covet the gift, let us then make welcome the Giver. Let us no longer speak of it but of Him.

Eph. i. 19. The Power of God in the Ascension Life.—We are bidden to follow our Master in his upward track, and to sit with Him, in daily happy experience, where He is already seated at the right hand of God. But this is as impossible to our unaided energy, as for the swallow to follow the majestic flight of the golden eagle, soaring sunward. So strong is the gravitation that holds us to earth, so dissipating our cares, so fickle our resolution, that nought but the Divine power and grace can lift us to the level of the Divine life.

But God waits to realise in us all that He has prepared for us, and the third item in the Apostle's prayer for his converts is that they might know "the exceeding greatness of his power to usward who believe."

It is power. It is his power. It is great power, nothing less would suffice. It is exceeding great power, beyond the furthest cast of thought (such is the literal rendering of the word hyperbole, employed here). It is equivalent to "the energy of the strength of his might, which He energised in Christ, when He raised Him from the dead, and seated him at his own right hand in the heavenlies."

A marvellous lift was there! From the grave of mortality to the throne of the eternal God, who only has immortality; from the darkness of the tomb to the insufferable light; from this small world to the centre and metropolis of the universe. Open the compasses of your faith to measure this measureless abyss, and then marvel at the power which bore your Lord across it, and know that that same power is towards you, if you believe, waiting to do as much for you in your daily experience if you will but let it have its blessed way.

It is a matter of constant complaint with Christian people that they fall so far below their aspirations and hopes. They sigh at the foot of cliffs they cannot scale. The fault is with themselves. As we step into the lifts which are attached to so many factories and offices, and expect them to bear us upward, never doubting for a moment that they will do so if only we keep in the line of their ascent, so if we would keep in abiding fellowship with the Holy Spirit, i.e., if we would not wilfully step out of the range of his blessed help, we should find ourselves mounting with wings of eagles, and going from strength to strength.

Eph. iii. 7. The Power of God in the Communication of Spiritual Gift.—The Apostle took a very lowly view of himself. He was but a minister, a deacon, a servant, like the Master, who, when none of his disciples essayed to do the servile work of washing the feet of the rest, put an end to the hesitation as to who should do it, by doing it Himself. It is only the greatest that can stoop to these menial offices without loss of position or self-respect.

But the position that the great Apostle occupied was distinctly, in his judgment, the gift of the grace of God. And he never ceased magnifying the exceeding abundance of the grace which had not only saved him, but had given him an office in the church.

The grace of God which calls us into his blessed service is connected with the energy of his power, so that whatever the work may be to which we are called, there is ever sufficient power waiting within our reach to do it. The grace of God permits us to be his fellow-workers in the salvation of men, and the power of God moves parallel with the line of our activities, to do that which would baffle our unaided efforts. Whatever you are called to do by the grace of God, you may be enabled to do by the power of God, even to make all men see the meaning of mysteries long veiled from their view.

Eph. iii. 20. The Power of God in Prayer.—In this marvellous doxology the Apostle seems to have come to the limits of human reach, though not of thought or conception. Here the two seem to be on the point of parting company. The speech remains below, while the thought goes forth on its glorious way.

He had a marvellous glimpse of what God would do in answer to prayer. For, notice the power of God without is always commensurate with his power that works within. It is the same Greek word in each case. He is able to do exceeding abundantly above our prayer or thought, according to the power that worketh in us. As I write these words, I am passing up the great Hardanger Fiord; before me rise the mighty mountains, sheer from the edge of the still green water to the snows which cool the air: the steep slopes, seamed with water-courses and covered with firs; the rock, standing forth in its naked grandeur or covered with patches of fresh green grass. But lofty and overwhelming as the mountains are, it is probable that the depth below us is equal to the height above us. So the power of God that waits to answer prayer in yonder heights, is equivalent to the power of God the Holy Ghost, who makes intercession within us with groanings that cannot be uttered.

Conceive of all that the saints have asked. Think what John Knox asked for Scotland; Luther for Germany; Brainerd and Schwartz for the heathen. Compute the agony of supplication that has been made by parents for their children, by lovers for their beloved, by patriots for their fatherland. But the God who taught them to pray was able to do exceeding abundantly above all.

Conceive of all that the saints have thought. Imagine the unspoken prayers of the saints. Things that could not be uttered because speech failed, songs without words, thoughts that have flashed to and fro between the Father and his children, like love glances between those who can read each other's heart through the eyes. But God who inspired them, was able to do exceeding abundantly above all.

Above all.—He is not niggard or scanty in his gifts, eking out their measure by stretching them, just coming up to the brink of our emptiness, just topping the Himalayas of our sin. Where sin abounds his grace much more abounds. He not only feeds our hunger, but gives us twelve baskets full of fragments over and above.

Abundantly above all.—We think of the profusion of spring flowers with which He carpets the glades; of the star-dust, collected in wreaths of light on the midnight sky; of the wealth of his creative fancy in every corner of the world around us. Ah! how prolific his thought, how rich his imagination, how fertile his power. Such is our Father in nature. Think, then, O child of His, what He will not be to thee, whom He loves as He loves his Son! Ask great things of Him for his work and his world, and believe that He will far exceed thy furthest reach of desire. Thy least word will stir and bring down a blessing, mighty as an avalanche, but as soft as summer rain.

Exceeding abundantly.—We will stay here. The words cease to mean more than we have already learned. Our faculties are too immature and limited to understand their depth of meaning. Only let us yield our hearts more to the power that waits to strive and yearn within them, that the depth within may cry to the depth above.

Eph. vi. 10. The Power of God equipping us to Conflict.—We are seated with Christ above the power of the enemy, but we are still assailed by it in our daily experience. We wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities and powers. The darkness of the world, and especially of heathen lands, is the veil beneath which malignant and mighty spirits set themselves against the Lord, and against his Christ. What are we that we may hope to prevail, either in our own temptations, or in our efforts to dislodge them from human wills, unless we have learnt to be empowered in the Lord, and in the strength of his might?

By his own conflicts, and notably by the mighty act of his Ascension, our Lord Jesus has become in his human and representative capacity, the storehouse of spiritual force, which has proved itself more than a match for all the power and craft of Satan. He holds in himself a plenitude of spiritual power, which is destined finally to issue in the binding of Satan and the destruction of his realm. That power is not yet exerted to its full measure. But it is nevertheless in Him, and in Him for us. We may be strengthened with might by his Spirit in the inner man (iii. 16). We may become strong in the Lord, and in the strength of his might. It is too wonderful! Thought wearies in its flight to cover conceptions so vast. May the power of the risen and ascended Lord be really ours. Then let us chide ourselves that our lives are so poor and ineffective, and let us begin to live in such wise that we may be divinely empowered, and able to do all things through Christ that strengtheneth us.

AGED CHRISTIAN BLIND.

Next to insanity, there is no calamity more distressing than loss of sight, and when accompanied by poverty and old age the case of such is exceedingly trying. In the Homes for Aged Christian Blind Men and Women at Hanley-road, Crouch Hill, there are at present eighty-two inmates; one of these is in her ninety-fourth year, twenty-three are over eighty, and fifty are over seventy. Blind persons are received from all parts of the United Kingdom, irrespective of sex. Christian character, old age, poverty, and blindness are the only qualifications for admittance. There are a few who have been blind from their birth, but the majority have lost their sight, and with it their means of support within the last ten or twenty years.

The following instances are but a sample of cases showing the necessity for such a home for the aged blind, who, having outlived their relatives and exhausted their slender means, are glad to seek such a refuge as is afforded them here. "W. B. L." was for some years a colonist in Texas, possessed of considerable means, until overtaken with blindness. His sister, the wife of a rector, made application for his admission to the Home in 1890; it soon became apparent that his health had given way, and after enduring affliction he entered into rest.

"E. C." was a native of Cork, and when received was seventy-eight years of age. More than usual interest is attached to this case; for twelve years she shared the benefits of the Home, but for the last four years reason was dethroned and her delusion was that of becoming wealthy, talking mechanically when awake, but in lucid intervals showing where her heart was—Christ was her theme. In February last exhausted nature gave way, and she gently fell asleep, aged ninety years.

"J. M.," writes on behalf of "F. A. M.," who was an accountant with every prospect of success. By carefulness and industry he had saved a considerable sum, which he invested in what was thought a safe society; he was overtaken with blindness, and following this was the collapse of the Society, and thus he became penniless.

The Home has no endowment, and the superintendents, Mr. and Mrs. Bright, have great difficulty in meeting the wants of this large family. They ask for the prayers of God's stewards who are blessed with sight, that out of gratitude to the Divine giver of this great blessing, these helpless and afflicted ones may not be overlooked. The Homes are open every day (Sunday excepted) for inspection. The office is 77, Hanley-road, Crouch Hill, London, N.

Apocalyptic Scenes.

XXIII.

THE DEATH AND RESURRECTION OF THE WITNESSES.

We come now to that part of the prophecy concerning the two Witnesses to which I referred as being one of considerable difficulty, and therefore naturally of difference of views.

The Great Revealer declares to his servant John that the Witnesses are to be killed by an agency from the abyss, that their corpses are to be exposed to public contempt, their death being a cause of universal rejoicing, but that they are to be resuscitated and to be raised, in the sight of all, to a position of glorious exaltation.

The Protestant Churches are to lose their vitality, their life. The olive-trees are to become destitute of oil; the light of the candlesticks is to be extinguished. They will no longer be filled with the breath of the Spirit, no longer feed upon the Bread of Life, no longer lift up their voices in testimony for God. That is how Churches die.

They are to be slain by "the wild beast that ascendeth out of the bottomless pit." This is the first time that this awful phenomenon has been mentioned. The full meaning of the symbol is given later on. We will not, therefore, dwell upon it here, except so far as to say that the wild beast is identical with the fourth wild beast seen by Daniel (ch. vii.), and consequently denotes the fourth great world empire, or ROME. The various aspects under which that power appears, first Pagan, then Papal, first united and Imperial, then divided and monarchical, and finally Democratic, or what we call "Constitutional," are presently described. This is the power that makes war with the Witnesses, overcomes, and at length kills them. The life of the Protestant Churches is destroyed by Rome.

This end is accomplished "when they shall have finished their testimony." The war of the wild beast, or Rome, with them, has been carried on during the period of their testimony—i.e., throughout the 1260 years of their witness for Christ and against anti-Christian error.

The lifeless organisations—"their dead bodies" are treated with gross ignominy, or exhibited as objects of public contempt and scorn. And this occurs in a specific locality, "a particular street" or open place, a forum of "the great city" (ch. xvii. 18), or Roman Empire; for the city, or citizenship, was made coterminous with the Empire—e.g., Paul was a "Roman," though a native of Tarsus (Acts xxii. 25, 28). The name of the street is given—that is, its spiritual or figurative name—and a special mark of identification is furnished. "Spiritually" it is called Sodom and Egypt, and it is that spot in the Roman Empire "where our Lord was crucified." Now, though there is no passage in the Scriptures where Jerusalem is actually called Egypt, it is addressed as Sodom in Is. i. 10 and Jer. xxiii. 14, and when to that name is added the explanatory note, that it is the scene of the crucifixion, we can have hardly any doubt that Jerusalem is intended.

For three years and a-half (3½ prophetic days) these dead churches, whose witness to Christ and to truth is no longer heard, become the gazing-stock and scorn of the representatives of Christendom ("they out of the people and kindreds and tongues and nations," i.e. deputies therefrom) who treat them with grossest ignominy. They are cast out of their graves as abominable branches, "carcases trodden under foot" (see Is. xiv. 19). There being "none to bury them, (they) are become a reproach to (their) neighbours, a scorn and derision to them that are round about (them)" (Ps. lxxix. 3).

The dwellers upon the earth rejoice over vanquished Protestantism. Their troublesome testimony is silenced. Dissent, Nonconformity, evangelical truth, are all suppressed. The dwellers on the earth can be happy now. No unpleasant witness to the truths of God is heard. The realities of holiness and sin, death, judgment, and eternity, of the Cross of Christ, of heaven and hell are put on one side. They are all explained away, the Bible itself having been proved (?) to be a collection of old-world myths. The Protestant Churches have, some of them, modified their creed and standards to obtain or preserve State recognition, while others, in order to abolish it, have subordinated their Christianity to their politics. In one way or another, the Churches have ceased to testify. They have abandoned their Protestant attitude. It may be that, cap in hand, they have humbly sued to be included in the imposing organisation presented by a reunited Christendom, but though they "laid (their) body as the ground, and as the street to them that went over," they obtain no favour in the sight of the representatives and rulers of the worldly-religious Church that has the upper hand, and exercises universal sway. They do not even "suffer their dead bodies to be put in graves." [The present readiness of a certain party in the Church of England to accept such a position is illustrated by the following language lately used by an active Ritualist: "It is reasonable to hope that twenty years hence Catholicism will have so leavened our Church that she herself, in her corporate capacity, will be able to come to you (the Roman Catholics) and say, 'Let the hands which political force, not spiritual choice, have parted these 300 years be once more joined. We are one with you in faith; there may be a few divergences of practice on our side. We seek to make no terms; we come in the spirit of love and of humility; but we feel sure that the chief shepherd of the flock of Christ (the Pope) will deal tenderly with us, and place no yoke upon us which we are not able to bear'"!]

This state of things lasts for three years and a-half, and no longer. The period is accurately, divinely measured. At its end a glorious revival takes place. No human agency is mentioned; "the Spirit of life from God enters into them, and they stand upon their feet." No longer crouching, cringing, ashamed of their previous history and the noble testimony of their ancestors—in fact, void of vitality and power—they are once more erect, bold, and steadfast. The functions of living Churches are again exercised; the holy oil pervades the branches and fills them with beauty and fruitfulness; the light of the candlesticks once more shines forth with divinely-imparted brilliance. The testimony of Jesus is sounded forth anew in all its truth and sweetness.

"Great fear fell upon them which saw them." The revival of the Protestant Churches is as conspicuous, as notorious, as had their shameful death been, and the world that hated their testimony and thought it for ever silenced, is amazed and alarmed by their resuscitation in such marvellous power as to demonstrate the direct intervention of God Himself.

But in all this we are venturing upon the untrodden ground of the future. Hitherto history has given us her aid, but we seem now to have reached that point in this most wonderful prophecy where she can afford us no clue, for the things foretold have not yet come to pass. The master key can no longer be used with any absolute certainty; and it must be with deeper humility and greater diffidence that we search into the things that are revealed for our learning. It is only by the light which the ascertained use of Scripture symbolism, and the probable application of the visions to the leading events of the past, shed upon the mysterious scenes now disclosed, that we can hope in any measure to discern their meaning.

If the view so briefly given in the former part of this paper (and which, I should say, is that advocated by Canon Garratt), be in any degree correct, what are the coming—or, indeed, perhaps now passing—events which the prophecy discloses?

The extinction of the life and testimony of the Churches that have witnessed for Christ for twelve hundred and sixty years—not, be it observed, the extinction of Christians or of Christianity—is foretold. It is the corporate organisations that die, the candlesticks that cease to give light; individual testimony may be more numerous, more powerful than ever; it is the testimony of the Churches, as such, that is silenced, though only for a time. It is by the power of Rome that this is effected; not perhaps, as in former days, by fire and sword, but by other not less effectual methods. It is at Jerusalem that some great gathering, or Œcumenical Council, of united Christendom is held at which the submission of the Protestant Churches takes place, a submission that is regarded with contempt towards the silenced prophets (or religious teachers) that had tormented the world, and with mutual congratulation amongst the triumphant representatives of the fashionable religion. And then, after three and a-half years of ignominious silence, a revival of extraordinary character takes place—the once again witnessing Churches are publicly called and raised to a position of privilege; for exaltation to heaven and casting down to earth or hell, are, in figurative language, expressions denoting elevation to, or depression from, stations of privilege, national or ecclesiastical, political or spiritual (see Is. xiv. 12-15; Lam. ii. 1; Matt. xi. 23). And this is in the sight of those who had triumphed over them. "Their enemies beheld them."

Of the succeeding, or perhaps contemporaneous, events—"the same hour," described in the next verses—it is still more difficult to speak. A tremendous convulsion of society ("a great earthquake") takes place; "the tenth part of the city" (believed by some to be England, as one of the ten component parts of the Roman Empire) falls—national ruin, the result of national apostasy. In this social cataclysm, seven thousand persons of prominent position, "names of men" (or men of note, cf. "men of renown," Nu. xvi. 2) are brought to nought. But the result is national repentance and glory to God. This closes the sixth trumpet, the second woe.

All this appears to be yet unfulfilled. Yet are there some striking indications of the probability of the earlier stages of the prophecy being realised, indications calling for most earnest attention.

1. The 1260 years of the great apostasy are, in the belief of many, on the point of expiring, if they have not already expired.

2. The Churches—or witnessing bodies—are giving up their witness, their Protestant attitude. Is not this the case in the so-called Reformed and Protestant Church of England? The very name of Protestant is hated and practically disowned by the hierarchy and by the great majority of those who call themselves "the Church." Where is the witness against Romish error in the great Lutheran Church of once Protestant Germany? It is notorious that the whole body is permeated with sacramentarianism and practical sacerdotalism, their "high sacramental doctrine bringing them almost into contact with Catholicism" (Times leader, Nov. 1, 1892). Spiritually-minded Christians in German lands attest this on all sides. Only the other day the Lutheran Church in Austria excised "its article denouncing the sacrifice of the Mass as a blasphemous deceit" (O shade of Luther!) because it was offensive to the Roman Catholic Church, and in order to retain State recognition. And what are we seeing in the Presbyterian Church of Scotland, the church of John Knox? In October last was formed within its pale a "Church Society," which is characterised by some of the leading features of early Tractarianism, and is looked upon by many as sacerdotal and sacramentarian in its principles and aims. Are not the witnesses ceasing to witness? Is not Protestantism, so far as regards the voice of Churches, dying out?

3. And by what power is the Protestantism of the Churches being overcome and killed? It is by the power of Rome, "the wild beast that ascendeth out of the bottomless pit." Not, as I have said, by fire and sword, by Inquisition and dragonnades—though such means are still employed where circumstances permit, as in Portugal, Mexico, and other places—but by the now far more successful agency of Ritualism in one shape or another. A religion of forms and ceremonies, of priestcraft and sacraments of alleged mysterious efficacy, is surely and by no means slowly sapping the lifeblood of the Churches of Protestantism, and where this avails not, Rationalism, its twin sister, is so blunting the edge of "the sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God," that its testimony against the enemies of the truth is weakened and ineffectual.

Thus would it seem that we are on the very verge of a state of things when, if, as has been often thought probable, an Œcumenical Council were to meet at Jerusalem, the scenes which appear to be foreshadowed in the prophecy may rapidly come to pass.

May God in his mercy give his servants grace to discern the signs of the times.

Note.—The Rev. E. B. Elliott believed that the death of the witnessing Churches and their revival took place in the days of Luther, and his views of the passage are deeply interesting. But, besides other most serious objections, he is obliged, in order to allow this application, for one thing, to make these events take place 300 years before the end of the 1260, and for another to translate the words "when they shall have finished their testimony" as "when they shall have completed (i.e., given a perfect) testimony." He admits, however, that the rendering of the Authorised Version, "which refers chronologically to the end of the 1260 years of witnessing, is the most natural mode of translating and understanding it."

A Consecrated Ministry.

NOTES ON A BIBLE READING AT KESWICK.

By REV. H. W. WEBB-PEPLOE.

Having read several portions of 2 Cor. vi., the speaker said:—It is always more agreeable, both for speaker and hearer, to dwell upon doctrine rather than duty, so long as duty is considered to be drudgery; which is generally the idea, I am afraid, even of the Christian Church. We are turning this day, as the last day of the Convention, to speak of the practical outcome of the blessed truths we have received. I think I have been guided by God to dwell upon this passage, for the special reason that while I had prepared two or three different subjects on which to speak, I have found from so many gathered here that they think the teaching is leading to passivity. They fear what are called the doctrines of quietism, leading to an actual vacuity of life; that is to say, nothing practical as an outcome of what they hear, except a sort of easy repose of soul which of course will be quickly disturbed by the stern necessities of life. My humble object is to show that if there is anything in this world that will lead to activity, and also to patience and submission in trial and affliction, to power in the service of God and in seeking the souls of men, it is the teaching that we have been endeavouring to set forth. I never knew what it was to obey and serve God as a Loving Father, to have Jesus Christ as my sole Master, and the Holy Ghost as my alone power; to try and seek the salvation of souls with holy joy instead of from a stern sense of necessity, until I learned to know Christ Jesus as a perfect Saviour. I did not understand what it was to glory in the privilege of being a slave of God until I had learned a little—would to God I knew more—of the holy privilege of resting in Christ as one's sufficiency for provision and power. Then there came over the soul a deep inward instinct to arise and act because the power is given.

That word duty, which so often comes out from the lips of Christians, ought, in one sense, to be banished for ever from our terminology. It does not exist in the Bible; that is quite certain. That is a solemn assertion to make. But you will remember there are only two passages in the New Testament where it occurs—one in Luke xvii. 10, and the other in Romans xv. 27—in which we have the verb "we ought"—that is, we find ourselves bound; we are morally constrained. That is what every soul must feel who has received the blessings that are in the Lord Jesus Christ for us. As in the fifth chapter of this Epistle we read, "The love of Christ constraineth us"—shutteth us up and driveth us on by a grand necessity. But it is not the duty of drudgery; it is and of love. In Ecclesiastes xii. 13, where we are told, "This is the whole duty of man," the word "duty" is inserted. It ought to read, "This is the whole of man"; meaning, of course, that until a man comes to see that he is to "fear God and keep his commandments" he is not a man in the truest sense of the word. It is not a duty in the sense of compulsion; it is a delight to a man.

In this passage the apostle is turning from his teaching of doctrine, to the practical outcome of that doctrine as applied to himself and his readers. You will observe he introduces his exhortations by that striking word "beseech," of which he is so specially fond, and which occurs at the turning-point of almost all his epistles (see Rom. xii. 1; 1 Cor. iv. 16; 2 Cor. vi. 1; Eph. iv. 1; 1 Thess. iv. 1; Philemon 9). What I think is so beautiful in every part of the New Testament is that there is none of the thought and idea of commandment, or enforcing duty at the point of the sword. It is always the beseeching of a loving heart that draws another towards itself, and by the very incitement of gratitude compels us to delight in doing the bidding of the One who has saved us. I ask you to remember that here; because I am to speak of what I know will appear to the natural man a most distressful and unpleasant part of the Christian's life. We shall not be doing our duty to God or man until we really bring forward the darker side as well as the brighter—the brighter as to the all-provision which is in Christ Jesus; and the darker, because of our natural instincts to shrink from the call to suffer with Him. But there is no hope of being glorified with Him unless we are PREPARED TO SUFFER WITH HIM.

When the Apostle says here "we beseech" it is a very striking word. He is taking to himself the office of the Paraclete. Twice already in this Epistle he has said that we exercise the office of the Paraclete, by virtue of the Holy Ghost given to us. We have not spoken so much perhaps about the Holy Ghost in this Convention lest we should differ from one another. But let us never forget that it is the Holy Ghost that is the power for serving God and for holiness. The Holy Ghost, says Paul, has already been given to us as the earnest of our inheritance, as the power of God in our heart. Then he says that this Holy Ghost, having come as the Paraclete, makes use of us, as epistles of God, by whom the paraclesis, or the exercise of the privilege and power of the Paraclete, may be carried on in the midst of the world. This paraclesis has three different departments: to convince the world of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment; so to convince them of their sin in each case by our lives, that they shall learn to know, from the holiness of Christians, what sin means; to convince them of righteousness, by showing what God has given to us, and is working in us; to convince them of judgment as having passed away from us, that they shall long for the refuge that God has bestowed upon the believer, and enter into the rest which God has granted unto us. Again and again the Apostle seems to refer to this, and to dwell on it, as if it were the joy of his heart to become

A PARACLETE TO OTHERS.

Now, he says, as a Paraclete, "we beseech that ye receive not the grace of God in vain." Therefore the whole of what is coming seems to hang upon what he has thought of as the grace of God. You will remember that in the second chapter of the first epistle he says, "The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned." Then he opens the third chapter by saying he is compelled to speak to them as carnal. He could not trust them yet as spiritual, though he longed to do so. Why? Because they were living in a carnal state, not only in the matter of fornication, but because of their internal strifes as believers, and contests as a Church of God.

Have you ever thought of these three stages? There is first the natural man, who lives for his senses—what we should call the self-life; who has, no working of the Spirit at all; who is incapable of discerning anything spiritual, and knows nothing but the exercise of the action of nature. Then the Apostle speaks of them as carnal, not as natural. Therefore it is possible for a man who has received the Spirit, or a Church that has received the Spirit, to be carnal. They are delivered from the natural, in one sense; they have entered into a certain spiritual enjoyment, but they are not altogether given over to the Spirit. "I speak to you as unto babes" that can only drink in milk—that is the exercise of one's carnal appetite. There are many people who come to conventions and keep drinking in, but never work for their Lord—never come to the point where they shall be strong and active. It is a blessed thing to be a babe, as Peter says, taking in the sincere milk of the Word, to grow thereby; but how many never seem to think of growing.

WHAT A LOT OF DWARFS

we find in the Church of God, having no aspirations after real growth. The Apostle is saying to them, that they must grow till they become such men as to be faithful stewards; then as stewards they shall glorify God their Saviour in all things.

Then we come to the condition of being spiritual. It is that we may be made spiritual that we gather here. God has told some that they are not only living carnally in the sense of merely drinking in, but that they are living lives of the flesh in its lowest state, in some things; nursing sins which they hardly thought were sins; God is dealing with them about the meaning of the word sin. Thank God if He has taught us what the deeper meaning of sin is. We say we are called to convict the world of sin. We shall never convict the world until God has convicted us. Then, perhaps, we shall begin to see the power of righteousness, and to exercise the principle of judgment.

But Paul is saying that they must become spiritual. In this second Epistle he is answering objections raised against his own work. On one side the Judaizers seem to have charged him with being lax in his morality, because there was a man in the Corinthian Church who had fallen into th most degraded form of sensual sin, actually takin away his own father's wife. The Apostle says th very heathen would never permit such a degradatio of humanity. Yet the Judaizers seem to say that is because of his laxity of doctrine that such an iniquit was possible. He is proceeding to answer then when, on the other hand, there is the charge of th Corinthian Church itself that he was over-exact i punishing the sinner—in giving the man over t Satan for the destruction of the flesh, forgetting thi man is human. So he proceeds to answer thes over-tender Corinthians, still carnal and low, and t show that his ministry as to sin was upright on ever side. Towards the Judaizers he would show thi the principles of the Christian are infinitely highe than those under the Judaic or Mosaic dispensatio because the former sought simply to exercise the privileges or duties in the stern keeping of the lett of the law. He wants to show that the true Chris tian has a wonderful which makes it impossible for a man but to wr with sin; and while they might be ever so tende towards the sinner when repentance is sought, ye the Church must exclude any man who is guilty o living according to the rules of the flesh, while th sin continues.

Having said a good deal in the second chapte about offering to help the poor fallen one, th Apostle in verse 8 beseeches the Church to "confir their love towards Him." I cannot dally over thi word love; but has it ever struck you that why th Apostle wrote so much to the Corinthians wa because he wanted to teach them the true principle of love? They had knowledge, utterance, wisdon gifts; no church of all he addressed by letter ha so many gifts; and yet they were utterly lacking i love; so he says, "I beseech you confirm your love. I call upon you, as a Paraclete, to show love to th sinner. But how? Here he turns away to explai the principles upon which alone the Church of Go could act towards sinners. There is a ministratio given by God through Moses which He calls law o letter; that was glorious, but after all it had n glory when compared with the ministration of th Spirit. What is this ministration of the Spirit The Gospel whereas the law really brought death out of wha appeared to be life. The law comes to a man an says, Live, when he is apparently alive and capabl of judgment and duty and service. It condemn him so that it brings him into a condition o absolute death. The Gospel comes to the man wh knows he is dead and offers him life out of death But while the Gospel brings life from death, Pau shows in chap. iv. that this life is one in whic the natural man and even the carnal man is to b brought into the positive experimental condition o death—"bearing about in the body the dying o the Lord Jesus, that the life also of Jesus may b made manifest in our mortal flesh." Short of thi he says, we shall never satisfy the criticisms of th Judaizers, or the so-called tender Christian, wh thinks he loves, but does not understand the tru principles of love. There must be, first, death fro what is called natural life willingly undergone, i the person of Christ, at the cross of Christ; the there is to be death in life, so that we are willing t be always apparently dying and yet we live.

In order to persuade men to accept this alon condition of true spiritual life, he says in the clos of the 4th chap. and the commencement of th 5th, "I want you to reason out the motive powe for this wonderful life." There is

A GRAND SET OF MOTIVES.

First, we are looking forward to the glory; our eye are to be fixed on the eternal, and that will keep u from groaning over the temporal. Then he say Look at the judgment seat; that is a secon motive. We shall all stand there to receive th things done through, or by means of, the body. Go will close the account. There is a third motive— the constraining love of Christ. And, lastly, as motive power, he speaks of the Gospel of the Cross God sent his Son Jesus Christ that He might reco cile the world to Himself, and to us He hath com mitted or entrusted the ministry of reconciliatio "as though God did beseech"—not "you," that put in here. It is of great importance to noti this as laying down a universal principle of the e ercise of Gospel privilege. We pray, or beseech, i Christ's stead, Be reconciled. That is the un ersal law of our lives. We are to go about and y to the sinner outside—the natural man; to the nner inside—the carnal man; to every man who has er sinned, to every backslider, to every uncon-erted soul, "Be reconciled to God," "as though od did beseech through us."

A STRIKING INCIDENT.

I do not know if I have ever mentioned here an ident in my life. My father-in-law, the late Lord stice Lush, told me a strange circumstance in is own life. He was engaged at Westminster all, in the old days when the Courts of Law re situated there. He saw in the further corner Westminster Hall a legal friend of his, Serjeant ilkins. He went up to him and found him in ars. He inquired what the sorrow was—whether had had news of any trouble. "No," replied the rjeant; I am glad to see you, for you will help e. I am fifty-six years of age. I have heard e Gospel long, but never as just now when the court I heard a voice, as it were from heaven, ying, 'As though God did beseech, I pray you reconciled to God.'" Again the man burst into ars. "Brother Lush," he said, "it is wonderful, onderful—God beseeching the sinner. I always ought I must beseech God; now I have seen od beseeching me; oh, Brother Lush, it is onderful love." The man died a few weeks after, y father-in-law having seen him every day. As r as the human mind could judge, he was brightly ady to leave the world. It was this ministry of conciliation ministered to him direct by the Holy host.

Then the Apostle breaks out in chap. vi., "We lso beseech"—as though God did beseech—that ye eceive not the grace of God in vain." Whatever e condition of any soul here, I am commissioned, mply as a speaker, instructed, as one hopes, of the oly Ghost, to beseech that you carry not out from is tent at the close of the meeting tween your soul and God; but to enter into the rfect peace which He has provided through Jesus rist our Lord. We are an ambassador for Christ; reconciled to God. "He hath made Him to be for us, who knew no sin, that we might be made e righteousness of God in Him." That is the oly Ghost's work of conviction; so now it is as a raclete that we beseech—Receive not the grace God in vain.

Then there is that striking application in the cond verse, "Now is the accepted time." Here ul applies it to the Christians as well as the orld, for every moment of their lives. I do say to y such one, listening to God's minister now: y dear friend, now, now, NOW is God's accepted me; now is the day of salvation from that awful se lying upon your soul, that awful weight ighing down your mind. The apostle prays, seeches; makes everybody look to see what is e matter. I wish I could put the looking-ss of the Holy Ghost in front of a good any of you. I do not know what you the audience think of us on the platform, t I often think, looking down, What can we do to ake the Christians look a bit brighter, as though ey had got something good from God? I wonder lother we are traducing our Lord in this matter. appen to have the lumbago very badly; I pray d to make me look cheerful and to bear up under If there are 500 of you here who have got the mbago there would be good work for the chemists. t us ask the heavenly physician to a great many Christians in these conventions. member, beloved friends, we are not to receive e grace of God unto emptiness; we are to begin rking it out.

In the third verse the Apostle may be said to eak to ministers of the Gospel. I wish we did t use that word for a special class of people; we erly destroy the bearing of God's truth. You are nisters as much as we are. It is a false idea is, of thinking that only those on the platform are nisters; of putting them on a platform they were er meant to occupy, and which they do not orn. Never expect anything from a white-ckered parson which you do not expect from a loured-tie sinner. If you confess your sins to e, I must confess my sins to you. Therefore, member we are here as brethren in one body, nisters serving one Master.

Let us look at the word in this third verse. What the point with regard to this ministry? "Giving no offence in anything." I know the Apostle is speaking to himself and his brother preachers; but in the eleventh verse he applies it to the Corinthians, and therefore I take the liberty of applying it to the Church at large. "That the ministry be not blamed, but in all things approving ourselves as the ministers of God." I want you to realise before you pass from here, that your life is to be a consecrated one in the true sense; it is to be CONSECRATED TO MINISTRY.

Let me refer to two or three texts. "The Lord Jesus Christ came not to be ministered unto, but to minister" (Matt. xx. 28). "Many women were there beholding afar off which . . . ministered unto Him" (Matt. xxvii. 55). It is the same word. "He that is chief, as he that doth serve" or minister (Luke xxii. 26). "They made Him a supper, and Martha served"—ministered (John xii. 2). And most important of all—"If any man minister to Me, let him follow Me; and where I am there shall my minister be" (chap. xii. 26).

What is this ministry? According to its true derivation it means carrying one into the dust and making one to be a willing slave. That is the idea, and no other. So that when you call your minister "the head man in the parish" you utterly mistake the whole idea of his position; you ought to say he is "the servant of all men." Paul knew no higher title than to be called the slave of Jesus Christ, and for their sakes, the slave of all men in Christ Jesus. If this is the idea of the Christian ministry, it will be applicable to every child of God who has realised the grace of God, and has received not the grace of God in vain.

We are called to minister. How? Look at the details. How are we to commend ourselves; how shall we live when we go home from this convention? The words group themselves into described by Bengel as being the general, the suffering, and the self-applied or voluntarily incurred conditions of life. First of all, "in much patience, in afflictions, in necessities, in distresses;" what another writer calls gravis, gravior, gravissimus—heavy, heavier, heaviest. They are internal trials, that may come entirely from within or from an external cause. There may be trial or burden of the soul, as one thinks of the world and of one's duty or privilege towards the wicked.

Then there are external trials—"in stripes, in imprisonments, in tumults"; you are to have much patience as the world lays those things upon you as they did on Paul; "in labours, in watchings, and in fastings"—these are the self-incurred trials of the Christian life. Where the soul is longing for the salvation of others it will bring itself willingly into labours, watchings, and fastings. Until you have received the grace of God and the power to be patient under such trials, never talk about your fine Christian life. Do not go home and say, "I have entered into blessing." I have heard speaking of that already. Oh! brethren, it is too solemn a thing to be blessed of God to talk like that. What we are bound to say is this: "I never saw the grace of God until I went to the Convention; when I saw it, it crushed me to the very ground with a sense of my impotence, and lifted me up with the grandeur of my Christ."

But the ministry is not only to be in much patience. Look at the next set of words, showing what a power you will have; "by pureness, by knowledge, by longsuffering, by kindness, by the Holy Ghost, by love unfeigned, by the word of truth, by the power of God." I do not think you need be afraid now; if that is not provision enough, what do you want? What next? "By," or "through," as the Greek word means—"through the armour of righteousness; through honour and dishonour, through evil report and good report." These are the three spheres of the Christian life and testimony. The armour of righteousness is to be exercised and used—that is against the devil. Through honour and dishonour—that is from the world. Through evil report and good report—that is the sphere of the Church.

TELLING TALES ABOUT ONE ANOTHER;

making little of one man, and making another into a god and a hero. "Oh, you divine being; what a beautiful speech!" Then when you get round the corner, saying, "Did you hear that wretched Mr. So-and-so? Did you ever hear such a horrid speaker in your life?" By God's grace, my brother, my sister, you are to go through the heavenlies in the strength of the armour of Christ's righteousness; through the world without caring whether they honour or dishonour you; through the Church without caring whether they spread a good report or a bad report.

Go on to the next. Here the word is "as," and we have nine strange comparisons. "As deceivers and yet true; as unknown, and yet well known; as dying, and, behold, we live; as chastened, and not killed; as sorrowful, yet alway rejoicing," and so on, till it ends with this: "As having nothing"—that is a nice pauper—"yet possessing all things." It is good to be a spiritual pauper if you always turn to the Father's treasure; and the Father is guardian of all the treasure, so you need not be afraid to look for a supply.

is a word that some fathers say to their sons, and not very wisely always. God says to his children, "Oh, my children, spend freely." I remember the case of a gentleman who had taken a wife from a lower position in life than himself. He put to her credit £5000, but he found at the end of the year she had spent only £50. He said to her he was sorry to find she had scarcely drawn out anything at all. "I was so afraid of poverty coming, and that we might not have anything after twelve months." I fear we are very like her.

Paul says, "Now, then, O ye Corinthians, our mouth is open unto you, our heart is enlarged; now for a recompense, be ye also enlarged." This is the Christian life, and this is what God wants of us.

I must close with only a word or two about the latter part of the chapter, where, strange to say, the broadening out seems to be restricted. "Be ye enlarged," but then he turns round and says, "Be not unequally yoked with unbelievers; what link is there between God and Belial, between Christ and the world? Come out and be separate." Yet he has just said, "Be enlarged; do not be straitened in your own bowels." Yes, come out; but keep in,

KEEP CLOSE TO GOD.

The nearer you are to the great Fountain-head the more you will be able to draw out of your treasures. Do not go down to the level of the world, or draw from that. Keep to the fountain-head where the clear water is; keep close to Him and draw from Him every day and all the day.

I am invoking you to a life of ministry with this blessed assurance, as one great motive power: the Father in heaven has promised that if you will only keep close to Him He will receive you, and will be, in the deepest experimental sense, a Father to you. I have often asked people to tell me what the fulness of God means, and they say they know little about it; others tell you they feel flooded with the unknowable love of Christ. I have asked in vain at almost every convention for the last ten years, "Will anybody tell me the least meaning of being filled unto all the fulness of God?" I confess but I want to. It is a grand promise, that if I keep near to the fountain-head and ask the Holy Ghost to fasten me tightly to God, the vessel will, as it were, have the power to receive and to give out a fuller and fuller measure of the grace of God as He deigns to use me. Are you willing to be thus used and to feel, as it were, everything going out, so that we have to say, We have nothing, and yet we possess all things. "Having therefore these promises"—that God will receive us and be a Father to us and that we shall be his sons and daughters experimentally—having these promises let us at the close of this Convention be truly consecrated; let us kneel down and say, "Lord, cleanse me from all filthiness of flesh and spirit, that there may be the perfecting of holiness in the fear of God."

I DO NOT UNDERSTAND IT AT ALL;

AN IRISHMAN, in the columns of The Temperance Record, contends that a passionate, insatiable love for spirituous liquor is a besetting sin of the Irish people.

THE TRAMPS' MISSION seeks to bring those outcasts under the healing influence of the Gospel by supplying libraries for their exclusive use in the casual wards. The report shows that the Mission has been enabled to furnish 271, but there are still 376 unions unsupplied, and united effort is needed to extend this work. No less than 920 letters have been received from workhouse officials reporting beneficial results from the Mission. The secretary is Miss Susan E. Barnett, 2, Eldon-villas, Battledown, Cheltenham,

GREEN FAIRIES.

By Mr. William Luff.

I did not see them in England, Scotland, or Ireland, yet I was not very far away when I saw them. Who can tell me where I was?

"Wales." Yes, you are right. I was there for a holiday, and had gone for a long walk, when I was caught in a heavy storm of wind and rain. So I folded myself up as small as possible under a moss-covered stone wall, and, with my umbrella over me, watched the driving clouds. It was there I saw my green fairies, not butterflies, beetles, bees, or flies, but—

"Moths." Yes, little green oak-moths, that kept flying about in the rain, until the large drops knocked them down in the mud. I was going to say—

"Silly fairies, to come out in such weather," but I thought they might call me equally silly.

Once, each moth was a little caterpillar, living in an oak-leaf, which he rolled into a tent, secured by a silken rope. In this they dwelt secure, for if a bird looked in, the little fellow would drop out at the back window, and swing by his slender cord, thus hanging himself to save his life. The bird, finding no one at home, would go away, and then the inmate would climb back.

In these early days the wingless fairies were comparatively safe, like many dear children in Bands of Hope, Sunday schools, and sheltered homes.

But the caterpillars turned to moths, left their leafy retreat, and with new clothes went forth into the world. Then their dangers began, for the ground all around me was strewn with their fragile forms, their happy existence ended in mud and filth. How like many dear young people: they have new spheres, new dresses, new powers, but also new dangers.

How helpless and frail were the fair creatures in that terrible storm! The drops soon laid them low. "Drops," little drops, hurl many a fair life into the gutter. The lad, the lass, leave home, and are powerless before the influences that sweep down upon them.

Nor could the beauties get up again. No more flying in the sunshine, for they were fixed in the mud; they might struggle, but they could not deliver themselves. We cannot save ourselves from sin; we may try, but trying will not set us free.

As the rain continued, the ruts in the road became little rivers of muddy water; into these some of the dear fairies fell, and were hurried along toward the dirty ditch. What a picture of the bad habits into which many fall, and by which they are sped along to destruction.

What grieved me most was the fact that others did not take warning by the fate of so many victims. Fairy brothers, sisters, cousins, were dying all around, yet out flew more and more, only to share the fate of the earlier ones. It reminded me of men and women; they know others have perished through drink and other storms, yet in their weakness they venture out, and too often fall and perish.

Poor little fairies! I almost had to get out my pocket-handkerchief and dry a tear, but as I looked round I saw some were wise; they were hiding in the moss-covered rocks, dry and safe. Young people, do not venture out in the storms of life. Hide in Jesus. Abide in the Rock. Say,

> So sinful, so weary, thine, thine would I be,
> Thou blest Rock of Ages, I'm hiding in thee.

Are you out in the world, away from home, in danger, but not yet smitten down into the mire of open sin? Be like one of my little fairy-moths. It flew under my umbrella, and into the warm shelter of my hand, as I grasped the handle with my open fingers. Did I pinch it and cast it in the mire? No, I loved it for its faith, and would have kissed it, only its mouth was too small to find. Fly to Jesus! He loves to have weak ones trust his strength. "In the shadow of his hand hath He hid me" (Isa. xlix. 2). What a lovely hiding-place, near his heart.

> When the storms of life are raging,
> Tempests wild on sea and land,
> I will seek a place of refuge
> In the shadow of God's hand.

But was there no hope for the perishing ones all around? Reaching a dry piece of grass from under the wall, I put my hand out into the rain, and held the grass to a struggler in the mire.

"Catch hold, little chappie," I said.

And he seemed to understand my language, for he grasped it.

"Now hold tight, my good fellow," and he did, as I lifted him to a mossy cleft in the rock. I almost fancied I heard him say, "Thank you," as he wiped his dirty toes on the dry moss. Cannot we do this for some human fairy?

> Rescue the perishing, care for the dying,
> Snatch them in pity from sin and the grave:
> Weep o'er the erring ones; lift up the fallen;
> Tell them of Jesus, the mighty to save.

How He puts forth his hand to uplift the fallen one, however small! My hand only got a few raindrops upon it: his hand was covered with drops of blood to save us. Who will not thank Him for reaching out so far and down so low?

As I watched, one other incident completed the picture. I saw an ugly old black ant dragging off a poor beautiful dead fairy. She had died in the mire, and now this horrid creature was taking her away to his dark hole. It made me think of what Jesus said in Luke xvi. When the poor beggar died, angels carried him to heaven; but the rich man, who died in sin, had no angels to carry him. The devil took him to hell. Dear young fairy, we hardly like to mention such a dreadful truth, but it is in God's Word. Death is not the end. Those who die in sin must have their souls carried away by demons to a black hell. Let Jesus save you from sin now, and you need not fear the future.

CHILDREN'S SCRIPTURE UNION.—Portions for week ending September 2:—August 27, Matthew xxv. 31-46; 28, xxvi. 1-13; 29, xxvi. 14-30; 30, xxvi. 31-46; 31, xxvi. 47-58; September 1, xxvi. 59-75; 2, xxvii. 1-14.

A MISSIONARY HYMN.

Who are these that leave their home,
Friendship, kindred, comfort, love,
While they seek the sheep that roam
From the Shepherd's fold above?

These, whose noble enterprise
Bears them o'er the tossing wave,
Seeking precious merchandise
From destruction's grasp to save.

Some go forth with sword in hand,
Praying while they bravely fight;
Never yielding, strong they stand
In Jehovah's glorious might.

Women, too, with willing feet,
Into dark zenanas go;
Hand to hand the foe they meet,
Sickness, ignorance, and woe.

Lo! one falters in the fight,
Overcome with weariness;
Gracious Father, let the sight
Move thy pitying hand to bless.

Fill, O God, those lonely lives
With thy Spirit's might and power;
For the joy that Jesus gives
Is their only earthly dower.

Let thy mighty arm uphold,
Give them strength to toil for Thee;
Let thy tender love enfold,
Until they thy glory see.

SLEEPING IN JESUS.

"I believe in the Resurrection of the dead, and the Life of the world to come."

"Our Nellie," a bright girl of fifteen, lay dying. Her friends stood weeping at her side. With a heavenly smile she said, "What are you all crying for? Why don't you sing?" Then in a clear sweet voice, she sang "There is a Friend for little children" through to the end. Soon afterwards her happy spirit winged its flight to the Friend "whose love can never die." How often, amidst the storm and stress of life, her dying words, "Why don't you sing?" have cheered her sorrowing friends!

Farewell, sweet flow'r, soon hast thou drooped and faded,
Leaving the fragrance of thy holy life
To soothe us as we journey, worn and jaded,
O'er life's rough way, and mingle in the strife.

Closed the blue eyes that once were brightly shining,
Placid the brow, so worn with pain and care,
Stilled is the heart that never knew repining,
Silent the lips so often moved in prayer.

We know thou art not here, for in a brighter,
A purer world thy spirit is at rest.
Rememb'ring this, our burdened hearts grow lighter;
We mourn on earth, but thou in heav'n art blest.

No more life's heavy burdens can oppress thee—
Sickness and sorrow, weariness and pain.
No chilling doubts or fears can now distress thee.
Oft didst thou weep—thou wilt not weep again.

So kind, so good, thou wert to all around thee—
Home is so dark now thou hast left our side:
Ah! we have lost thee, but thy Lord has found thee
And borne thee safe across the swelling tide.

We lay thee low within the narrow grave—
The silent grave we hoped to fill before thee,
Leaving thee where the weeping willows wave
And softly sob their plaintive requiem o'er thee.

The breaking heart—the home all desolate—
The lonely life sore stricken and forlorn;
They are but ladders to the golden gate
Where she rejoices in th' eternal morn

For sorrow sanctified is Heaven's guerdon—
Gold purified and purged from earth's alloy;
Trust on, tried soul, for He who sends the burden
Says, "They that sow in tears shall reap in joy."

Sleep, sister, sleep! as we must soon be sleeping,
Sleep on, belov'd, "the weary are at rest,"
Beyond the sounds of sorrow and of weeping,
Safe sheltered on a Saviour's loving breast.

At home—at rest in glory everlasting—
A light Divine streams through "the gates ajar,"
Its cheering beams upon our pathway casting
A radiance from "the Bright and Morning Star."

Safe, safe in port—in his own likeness waking;
Sister, we know that thou art happy now:
Safe where the radiant dawn of heav'n is breaking,
Safe with the victor's crown upon thy brow.

Farewell, dear sister, till our meeting yonder—
Till we, too, cross the swiftly-flowing river:
A few more chequered years on earth we wander,
And then we meet to part no more for ever!

HINTS AND HELPS.

By John D. Gilmore.

ABIDING PEACE.

Carefulness for nothing; prayerfulness for everything; thankfulness for anything (Phil. iv. 6).

WALKING STRAIGHT.

"Let thine eyes look right on."—Prov. iv. 25.

Look on to a wonderful person (Heb. xii. 2); a prepared place (Jno. xiv. 2, 3); a blessed hope (Titus ii. 13, 14); a remarkable day (2 Peter iii. 12); a glorious change (Phil. iii. 20, 21); a heavenly rest (Heb. iv. 9); and a rich reward (2 Tim. iv. 8; Phil iii. 13, 14).

RICH TOWARD GOD.

Luke xii. 21.

To be rich in the best and truest sense: You must realize God's love toward you (Rom. v. 8; 1 Jno. iv 16); accept his unspeakable gift (2 Cor. ix. 15); accept his unsearchable riches (Eph. iii. 18); cultivate repentance toward him (Acts xx. 21); exercise faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ (Acts xx. 21); be rich in character, which is beautiful to Him (1 Tim. vi 11); and rich in good works, which are pleasing to Him (1 Tim. vi. 18). "God is able to make all grace abound toward you; that ye, always having all sufficiency in all things, may abound to every good work, being enriched in everything to all bountifulness."—2 Cor. ix. 8—11.

NOTES ON DAILY READINGS.

SUNDAY, AUGUST 27.—PSALM XVII.

A consciousness of innocence breathes through the opening verses of this Psalm, which we, who have learnt from Christ a deep sense of sin, can hardly understand. Who of us can say that though God has visited us in the night, He has found no transgression? And yet there is a secret in these words that we may well avail ourselves of—namely, that it is by the words of his lips that we are kept.

It is not enough to know that God loves us. The heart of man cries out that He should show the marvels of his loving-kindness, especially in the direction of keeping. The man who says that he has kept himself now pleads to be kept as the pupil of the eye, and as the nestling beneath the hen's wing. How exquisite that anticipation of the work of Christ, putting Himself between us and peril, even though that peril cost Him blood!

What a picture of the hate of men, ringing the saint around with their hungry eyes, or lurking in secret places. We can see them in their pride, and self-satisfaction, and worldly success. But the soul that loves God holds unhindered fellowship with God, and anticipates the time when it will wake up satisfied. Their portion is here; his yonder. They are satisfied with children; he with God. They leave all when they die; but when he dies he goes to all.

MONDAY, AUGUST 28.—PSALM XVIII.

We cannot imagine a more beautiful expression of love to God than in this eight-fold description of what He is to the soul (1, 2). No Christian soul in its loftiest moments can do better than repeat this marvellous invocation.

What a past lay behind David! Those cords of death and Sheol; those floods of ungodliness. There was nothing for him but to cry, and God could do no other than come to deliver him. The advent of God to his servant's side is compared to a thunder-storm gathering and breaking. The clouds dark and thick; the rising wind; the black pavilion; the pouring water-floods; the rattle of the hailstones; the flashing of the lightning; the laying bare of the ocean depths as by earthquake. And all because one poor saint was in trouble, as when the Lord saved Peter out of the storm on the Lake of Galilee.

David attributes his deliverance to the integrity of his heart (20—24). We will rather take our stand upon our acceptance in Christ, yet there is much truth in the thought that our attitude towards God will determine God's dealings towards us. God's way is perfect; Oh that we might always dare to speak of it as such, trusting Him to make our way perfect also. And out of all the deliverances of the past springs the assurance that God will strengthen for all future trials and conflict, and will put down beneath the feet of those that trust Him all rebellious power that lifts itself against them.

TUESDAY, AUGUST 29.—PSALM XIX.

The silent message of the heavens, day and night, without speech or language, yet unmistakable, is the beautiful theme of the opening words (1-6). There is an evident protest here against the idea that sun or moon should be objects of worship. They are only messengers telling the glory of their Maker. But sometimes one turns from this literal rendering to think how those heavens image forth the Church, whose silent and spoken witness should be for God; whilst Jesus Christ may be compared to the bridegroom-sun rising out of the grave, and rejoicing to run with strength the course of redemption, covering the circuit of the heavens, and destined to irradiate with heat every part of the earth.

But more wonderful than the glories of nature are those of revelation! They are perfect, i.e., flawless; sure, i.e., absolutely certain; right, i.e., pointing the straight road; pure, i.e., more brilliant than the sun; clean, i.e., pure and holy. And see what the Word of God will do for the soul that bathes in its sacred floods! And pray day and night that you may come to desire it more than gold, and to find it sweeter than the droppings of honey.

WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 30.—PSALM XX.

This Psalm was written as a battle-song. King and people have presented sacrifice, and offered prayer, and are answered by the voice of the priest or priests who speak the name of God, and breathe out prayers which carry with them the assurance of their answers. Is this your day of trouble? God will answer thee, and send thee help, and give thee strength. He cannot forget the offerings and sacrifices of those that love Him. The heart's desire which He has inspired He will grant. The course which He has inwrought He will fulfil.

In response to this assurance, the king and his people break into song, "We will triumph." And they go further; in opposition to the chariots and horses of the foe, they set up their banners in the name of God. They know that Jehovah will save his own, and will answer them from his holy heaven. Make much of the saving strength of God's right hand. Salvation is his special prerogative. Addressing Him with the words with which the Psalm closes, the soul, on the morning of a fight, or even in the midst of the conflict, may cry, "Save, Lord, let the King answer us when we call." The constant recurrence of the word salvation in this Psalm strikes a note of hope. There are difficulties in all lives, as formidable as horses and chariots to Israel, unpossessed of either; but greater is the Lord of Hosts, who is a man of war, and rides in the chariots of his salvation.

THURSDAY, AUGUST 31.—PSALM XXI.

This Psalm follows naturally on the preceding. In the former, prayer had been offered for the warrior king as he went forth to war, but now in the opening strains of this (1—7), the priests of the temple, and perhaps the people, celebrate his victory. Ah! tried and conflicting soul, as surely as thou hast uttered thy prayer for salvation, thou shalt utter thy thanks for it. Was it asked that God should grant thee thy heart's desire? (xx. 4). It shall be said "Thou hast given him" (v. 2).

How admirably do these sweet words describe, not only the case of the Church militant, but also that of the Church triumphant! Think of those whom you have loved and lost awhile, and then say of them vv. 2—6. Oh when will that day come, when of us too those words so exuberant in their triumph will be true? Let us ask that the Holy Spirit may give us the first-fruits of their enjoyment here and now.

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 1.—PSALM XXII.

Our Lord seems to have repeated this Psalm to Himself as He hung upon the cross, and there is no part of Holy Scripture which so completely delineates the emotions that swept through his heart in those mysterious hours. It has been said that the Psalm falls naturally into two divisions (vv. 1—21 and 22—31), of the former of which "Thou answereth not" is the keynote, and of the latter "Thou hast answered me." We are reminded in the one of the great darkness that brooded over all things, and in the other of the breaking light of the ninth hour. And if we suffer according to the will of God, we, too, may have to say this Psalm in its entirety. But, as surely as we begin with the forsakenness we shall end by declaring God's righteousness.

We often ask why. The answer is not always vouchsafed. But never let us cease to believe in the holiness of God. Roll thyself on God. Tell God the full measure of thy complaint. He knows all, but He likes thee to tell Him all; and when He has answered thee from the horns of the wild oxen (21 R.V.) then call upon brethren and congregation to join in thy glad praise. It is helpful to read these closing words into the lips of Christ, as He speaks them from the throne of his glory and triumph, and assures us that God does hear, that the meek shall be satisfied, that those who seek God shall praise Him.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 2.—PSALM XXIII.

As a brook among the hills, making music through the year, and refreshing weary and thirsty wayfarers, so these words have spoken to the heart of many: of the peace of the fold, of the limpid lake, of the green glen, of the cool of overhanging rocks, of the comfort of protectorship, of the home, where the spread table, and the anointed head, bespeak the day's work done, and mirror the complete rest and satisfaction of the soul. Then, taking every similitude, the Psalmist flings the necklace of pearls at the feet of Christ, declaring that this would be the condition of soul for all who knew his voice, and followed Him as their shepherd.

Every tense may be rendered by the present. "I do not want; He leads me; He makes me lie; He refreshes; He guides; I fear no evil; they follow me." Not in the days that are to be, but to-day. Not in some scene which is yet to unfold or in some distant future, but here and now, if only thou wilt take Him from this moment to be thy Shepherd, and wilt commence to obey his lead, and trust his watchful care.

THE LETTER GUILD.—Having seen great benefits resulting to young girls from the "Letter Guild" to which I belong, may I, through your columns, say how pleased I should be to write to any young person, who from loneliness or any other cause would be glad of such a help?—Yours truly, DOORSTEP GIRLS.—For some few years an earnest lady has been doing in North London a quiet useful work among the poor and sorely neglected girls who go from door to door to earn a few pence by cleaning the doorsteps. Last year she sent out some girls to service, and more might be got out were a little help forthcoming. A small home for training is much needed. Particulars may be had of Mrs. R. Brown, 128, Wilberforce-road, Finsbury Park, N.

INTERNATIONAL S. S. LESSONS.

SEPTEMBER 3.

Paul Shipwrecked, Acts xxvii. 30-44.

Golden Text, Psa. xlvi. 1.

The journey toward Rome commenced at Cæsarea, and the places touched during the voyage, and the general course taken, may be indicated on the map. Luke, the historian, accompanied Paul, and to him we are indebted for this very graphic account. Aristarchus was also with him (2, with xix. 29). Julius, the Roman centurion, had charge of Paul and other prisoners.

The journey was a very eventful one, and lasted for over two months. Paul the prisoner proved himself to be more valuable than either the owner or the captain of the ship. When matters were at their worst God sent an assuring message to him, and through him to all on board (20-26).

This lesson takes up the narrative after the storm has raged for fourteen days (27). To cast anchors out of the stern was an unusual course (29), yet it was wise; if the ship should drift, she would have her bow to the shore. Lord Nelson, after reading this chapter, followed the same course at the Battle of Copenhagen with much success.

30-32. The shipmen, i.e., the sailors, including officers and crew, made a despicable attempt to save their own lives, even though all the rest should perish. The pretence under which they acted makes their conduct the worse. The real reason for their attempt is that they did not remember, or did not believe God's message through Paul (22). Yet, after so much of what he had said had been fulfilled, were they not without excuse? Do not some men make attempts to save themselves because they do not believe the word that God has spoken? It was Paul who discovered the attempt and defeated it (31). The fact that God has promised the life of all who travel with him does not make him negligent of proper means. God's purposes do not render man's effort unnecessary. The loss of the boat in which the sailors hoped to be saved; was the means of saving their own lives, and securing them for the service of others. The story is an interesting picture of how God often deals with men for salvation. The boats in which men seek to save themselves, and which God has to cut away, are self-righteousness, amendment, prayer, good resolutions. Until these are gone men will not trust the word of God.

33-38. The returning day revealed two hundred and seventy-six (37), faces white with hunger and with fear, looking eagerly towards the unknown land. For fourteen days they had "fasted"—i.e., they had not had proper food. Paul's counsel that they should "take meat" would have been useless if he had not been able to remove their fears by the renewal of the promise that all should be saved (34), and to set them the example (35). There was much common sense in Paul's religion. His care for men's souls did not make him unmindful of the needs of their bodies. By giving thanks before them all (35), he showed that he was not ashamed of the God he served, and invited them by his example to the service of the same God.

39-44. Everything depended now on their being able to drive the ship into the creek which appeared on the shore. The anchors were no longer needed, and were therefore "cast off" (40 R.V.); but the rudders, which had been secured when the vessel was anchored, were now unloosed, that they might direct their course; and hoisting the fore sail (R.V.) to the wind, they made for the shore. The ship was destroyed, but the word of God to Paul was fulfilled, and the lives of all were saved.

Practical lessons are numerous when life is compared to a voyage. (1) It is not accomplished without storms. (2) It can only be successful as God is allowed to direct it. (3) It may require the sacrifice of what would otherwise be deemed valuable. (4) Although its success is secured by the promise of God, it requires care and diligence on our part.

MR. JUSTICE HAWKINS, speaking at the Birmingham Assizes, said he believed that no less than three-fourths of the crime of this country was committed by people more or less under the influence of drink, or for which drink was directly or indirectly responsible.

POPLAR.—A series of very successful anniversary meetings were held last week in connection with Grundy-street Mission School, Poplar. The anniversary address on Monday evening by Mr. Galt, from the text, "Feed my lambs," divided thus: 1st, Lambs; 2nd, My lambs; 3rd, Feed my lambs—produced the immediate and visible result of three new teachers added to the staff of the school. The records of the year contain accounts of quite a number of conversions of scholars.

Education and Missions.

An article on this subject by Dr. A. J. Gordon, of Boston, appears in the current Missionary Review of the World. He takes for his text the following statement made by Rev. Maurice Phillips, of the London Missionary Society: "The only organised opposition which Christianity has yet had to meet has been from the efforts of the Hindu graduates of our universities." The notion (says Dr. Gordon) that "the heathen must go through some propædeutic dispensation of civilisation to prepare them for the Gospel" seems to be inveterate, and only to be cured by the teaching of dearly-bought experience. We are dealing here with an old and persistent error—the error which, in its application to missionary policy, Pastor Harms characterised as "a yoking of the horses behind the wagon." Legalism says, "Do that you may live." The Gospel says, "Live that you may do." Human wisdom says, "Educate men that they may regenerate society." Divine wisdom says, "Regenerate men that they may educate society." The most disastrous heresies have sprung evermore from inverting God's order and putting that as last or secondary which He has made first and primary.

As to education missions—That higher education, the study of the arts and sciences, constitutes any preparation for Christianity or gives any necessary bias toward the acceptance of the Gospel, we cannot believe true. It certainly does not in America. Why should it in India? On the contrary, we know of thoughtful Christian fathers who cherish considerable dread as to what the university course may do in unsettling the faith of sons and daughters who already believe. For example, the study of philosophy and biology, as now generally conducted, seems to be fraught with not a little peril to young students. . . . The great commission under which we act contains two significant words, "disciple" and "teaching." The one is imperative and primary; the other is participial and secondary. Each is followed by "all." The first all is unlimited—"all nations." The second all is limited—"all things whatsoever I have commanded you." No missionary is in danger of getting beyond the bounds of his preaching commission, for that is unbounded; but one may get beyond the bounds of his teaching commission, for that covers only the commands and doctrines of Christ. Philosophy, biology, mathematics, and physics—we know not how to include these under the specification of the great commission, and therefore we know no reason why missionary agents should be employed to teach these sciences. It no doubt sounds petty and narrow to say this, yet a return to the simple terms of the original commission has often been found to work wonders. To drop all secular teaching and to turn the whole force of missionary men and missionary resources upon the direct work of evangelising the heathen would constitute an immense revolution in present methods.

But is the statement of Mr. Phillips, which constitutes the text of this article, borne out by the facts? In order to present the opinion of one competent to judge of the question, we transcribe an interview held with Rev. William Powell, of Nursaravapetta, India, for many years a devoted and successful missionary among the Telugus:—

"Mr. Powell, you have seen the statement of Rev. Maurice Phillips with reference to the opposition of the educated Hindus to the Gospel. What do you say of it?"

"I perfectly agree with it. Of course there is other opposition—notably that of the priests; but I concur that the strongest organised opposition which we have to encounter comes from Brahmins who are being or have been educated in our Christian high schools and colleges."

"Can you give examples of such opposition?"

"Yes; while preaching at Madras, one evening in November, 1889, I was interrupted by a band of students from the Christian college of that city, who flung quotations from Bradlaugh and other infidels into my face, to the effect that Christianity is a fraud and Christians deceivers. After striving in vain to persuade them to desist, I was obliged to call in the police to prevent their breaking up the meeting."

"Is it common for students in the mission colleges to express such opposition?"

"Yes; not long ago six graduates of the Christian college at Madras, on receiving their degrees and taking leave of the principal, made public exhibition of their contempt of Christianity by tearing up their New Testaments and trampling them under their feet."

"And yet these students had been educated at the partial expense of the mission which maintains the college, had they?"

"Yes: they receive special consideration in reduced tuition, paying only about half what they would have to pay in the Government colleges. Therefore they are virtually aided by Christian funds in getting their education."

"Do you believe that education in India is contributing largely to the conversion of the heathen?"

"I do not. It is enough to say that in some Christian colleges there is not known to have been a single conversion for more than twenty years."

"Do you think that higher education in any way predisposes the hearts of the heathen toward Christianity?"

"Most decidedly not. It rather fills them with pride and conceit, and, as a consequence, with hatred and contempt of the Gospel. I have found that the same boys who have listened eagerly and respectfully as I have spoken to them in their villages, after being two years in a Christian school have hooted me as I have been preaching, and done their best to prevent the people from listening to me."

"Do you think that native preachers need to be highly educated in order to cope in argument with 'the subtle, metaphysical Brahmin'?"

"By no means. I have one preacher, Rev. Kundla Subbiah, who was formerly a cowboy. He has been educated in our theological school, with a good grounding in the common branches and thorough Biblical training. He is one of our most powerful preachers, and can gather hundreds at any time to listen to him. I have frequently heard him close in with learned Brahmins who have interrupted his preaching and so completely worst them in argument that they have been driven from the field amid the derision of the spectators. But his success is due to the fact that he is 'mighty in the Scriptures,' and not at all that he is mighty in metaphysics."

"How far would you have missions go in the work of education?"

"I would confine education for the most part to Christians, making the Bible the primary and principal study. If, in order to meet the Government requirement, a school must devote five-sixths of its time and attention to secular topics, I would prefer to forego Government aid and carry on the school independently."

What, then, shall we say to these things? This, certainly, that the method outlined in our commission is the best method; preaching the Gospel first and educating in the doctrines of the Gospel secondly. Missions are not called upon to erect barriers to their own success by raising up a class of educated opponents to that gospel which they preach. If one holds a true Evangelical faith before beginning his career of high literary and philosophical study, he may, by the grace of God, hold it to the end. But the chances of gaining him to that faith after the mind has been thoroughly pre-empted by human philosophy are certainly lessened. Therefore to educate men in order to convert them, to promote high culture as a matriculation to a lowly faith in Christ, seems to us something worse than a mistake.

Breton Evangelical Mission.

Tuesday, August 15, was a high day at the Orphanage at Tremel—the breaking up of the schools. The chapel was well filled by English visitors, the village folk, and a few parents to hear the children recite portions of Scripture, and some secular pieces; all were very much impressed with the happy faces of the children.

A new boys' school-house is being built, but funds are needed for its completion. It is a great want, as there is very little accommodation for boys, and it is here they must be trained if they are to be evangelists to their own people. A week ago there were eight baptisms at Convalles, and on Sunday six are to be baptized here, two of these are preparing to be schoolmasters. Are there not some whose health prevents them going to India or Africa, who could devote themselves to this work, where the climate is bracing, and health is gained, not lost? Help is needed to open out new stations as well as for increased effort at Brest and other places. £6 a year supports a child in the schools.

A Visitor.

PAKEFIELD CONFERENCE.

The fifteenth annual Conference has been held in the quiet village of Pakefield, near Lowestoft, for the promotion of growth in the grace and the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ. It was a season of much profit and joy to residents and visitors in the neighbourhood. The village is privileged to have a true Christian pastor for its clergyman, and much prayer had been offered that the speakers who had been invited might come in "the fulness of the blessing of the Gospel of Christ."

The Conference was commenced by a service in the church, when a helpful sermon on the intercession of Christ was preached by Rev. George Everard, of Dover. During the two following days meetings were held—morning, afternoon, and evening—in the parish schools, the rector, Rev. L. Price, presiding throughout. He pointed out in a preliminary address that, as in the past, so in the present, there is an enormous amount of religion which has nothing to do with Jesus Christ except in name. There are some who lay stress upon a part of his work, such as his incarnation, which is a great and glorious truth; but his incarnation never saved the world. This deliverance was wrought by his death alone. "We were reconciled to God by the death of his Son." By his incarnation, obedience, death and resurrection, He was made of God wisdom to meet our ignorance, righteousness our guilt, sanctification our defilement, and redemption to "bring us to God." Thus "we are complete in Him." Hence the work of the Holy Ghost is to take those great facts and "show them to us," and, by faith, to make them conscious and personal realities to us. The result of the reality of this faith is conformity to the example of the life of Christ in his love to God and man.

Rev. R. Graves Walker gave two addresses during the conference. The first was on Christ's coming in its significance and characteristics, in which he said that Christians were not merely the creatures, but the sons of God; and that though they may be but infants at present, they are destined to grow into the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ. He showed that the significance was the necessity of God to carry out his own purpose, which was to reveal Himself. In his second address, which was full of deep spirituality, the speaker dwelt on the way in which the death of Christ produces holiness in his people. He remarked that the death of Christ covered our past, and identified us with his entire future.

A powerful address on behalf of foreign missions was delivered by Rev. G. E. A. Pargiter, who has been for seven years head of a C.M.S. college in India. Canon Ripley spoke on the Scriptural evidence of the love of the Holy Spirit. He explained how the love of the Spirit appears in the conviction of sin, conversion to God, justification and sanctification, and his revelation of the things of Christ to his believing people, thus showing not only the love of Christ, but also the love of the Spirit to the children of God. Other speakers were:—Rev. C. Leathes, on Eph. iii. 16, showing God's method in the great plan of redemption, which, he said, was first conversion, then quickening, then strengthening to resist sin and bear the cross, to perceive the truth, and bring forth fruit unto God; Rev. H. J. Thwaites, on 2 Chron. xxix. 30, 31, drawing many lessons from the cleansing of the temple in the days of Hezekiah, the consequent passover, and the joy that followed; Rev. J. E. Rogers, the new vicar of Great Yarmouth, on Rom. x. 10, 11; and Rev. T. W. Thomas, who has lately been appointed to St. Barnabas, Cambridge.

The final meeting was pitched in the note of praise, for the blessing for which prayer had been offered had been realised during the days of conference. Practical words were spoken by Rev. George Everard on Jesus as our great example in life as well as our peace with God.

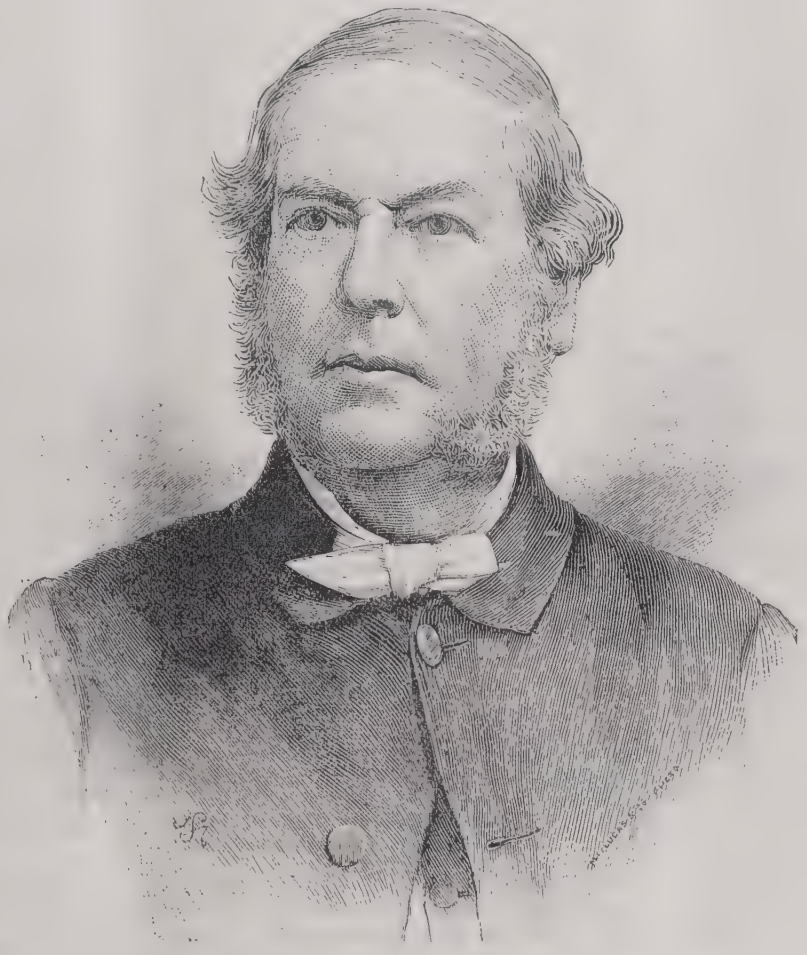
AN INTERNATIONAL ANTI-ALCOHOL CONGRESS was held last week at The Hague, representatives being present from all parts of Europe and America. Dr. Heemskirk, a Minister of State, and sole survivor of the first Dutch Temperance Society (founded in 1842), presided at many of the meetings. The topics discussed at the six sittings were: (1) Alcohol in relation to physiology and hygiene; (2) Moral suasion; (3) Movements for the promotion of temperance; and (4) Legislative methods dealing with intemperance.

The Late REV. R. D. ROBERTS,

BAPTIST PASTOR, LLWYNHENDY, SOUTH WALES.

AMONGST the many illustrious Welshmen who have followed the highest of all callings, the subject of our sketch deserves an honourable place. Rev. R. D. Roberts was born at Llanberis, in Carnarvonshire, in 1820. At the time of his death, in May of this year, he was therefore seventy-two years of age. His parents were persons in lowly circumstances, and this fact explains his being called upon at an early age to contribute towards the support of the family. Chiefly for that reason, his advantages in the matter of education were of a very limited character.

The bent of the future minister's mind seems to have manifested itself at a very early age. At eighteen, his qualifications were so evident that the young man was looked upon as a likely candidate for the ministry. He never underwent any course of special training. Collegiate education was a luxury in those days. This disadvantage, however, was one which nearly all the Welsh ministers of the early part of the century had to bear. In spite of drawbacks, Mr. Roberts managed to read and digest a considerable quantity of theological learning. Andrew Fuller was a teacher who influenced him much.



In his twenty-fourth year he became pastor of the church in which he had been brought up. Here he spent three successful years, but removed at the expiration of that period to Llanfachraeth, near Holyhead. During his stay there he came into considerable prominence amongst the Baptists of North Wales, and his fame in the Gospel seems also to have reached the churches of the southern part of the Principality; for in the year 1856 he proceeded on a preaching tour through the three counties of Brecon, Glamorganshire, and Carmarthenshire. This was in itself evidence of the young minister's popularity. These preaching tours were prominent features of Welsh religious life, and only men of considerable pulpit power were accepted for them.

The young North-Walian seems to have created a favourable impression, for, soon after his return home, three calls followed him from churches in South Wales. Mr. Roberts accepted the call from Merthyr Tydfil, in Glamorganshire, and entered upon a pastorate of some six years' duration. During this time his services were much in demand for religious gatherings all over the country. In 1862 Mr. Roberts again changed his sphere of labour, and removed to undertake the pastoral charge of Zoar Church, Llwynhendy, Carmarthenshire. This connection lasted for twenty-five happy and fruitful years, and was only severed owing to the ill-health of the pastor. The name of the village to which he removed, from henceforth became inseparably connected with that of Mr. Roberts.

His eloquent presentment of the story of the Cross attracted large congregations, and in six years' time it was found necessary to enlarge the chapel so as to provide sitting accommodation for 1000 people. In the same year the church at Zoar erected day-schools, at a cost of £700. Soon after the passing of the Education Act these schools were handed over to Government control. By way of extension, in 1874 a schoolroom was built at a place called Bryn, at a cost of £300. The progress of the church itself was also most marked. When Mr. Roberts undertook the pastorate the number of members was 109. When he retired in 1887, the number had reached 650. During his twenty-five years' connection with the church he baptized some 750 persons. A few years after his advent to Llwynhendy, upon one notable occasion seventy-eight persons were baptized at one service.

During all this period Mr. Roberts' popularity as a preacher continued unabated and undimmed. His services were in constant request for religious gatherings of all kinds. In the course of his long ministry of over fifty years' duration this eloquent servant of God preached over 13,000 times. On several occasions he preached as many as eighteen times in one week. Nearly every Welsh Baptist pulpit in the Principality had been occupied by him at one time or another.

In 1887, owing to failing eyesight, Mr. Roberts was led to resign the charge of the church, with which he had been connected for a quarter of a century. In spite of infirmity, however, he still continued to fulfil engagements for preaching in various parts of the Principality, and his preaching continued undiminished in vigour and power. Indeed, it may be said that his influence grew with advancing age. For the last few years, Mr. Roberts had suffered much from cancer of the eyes. Last December bronchitis made its appearance, and added greatly to the sufferings of the aged servant of God. During the last few months his sufferings were very great, but were borne with uncomplaining patience and resignation. Death came on Monday, May 15 of this year, and released the war-worn veteran of the Cross from his pain and suffering.

Were we asked to give a short but comprehensive description of the departed minister, we could not do better than say of him as was said of Apollos, he "was an eloquent man, and mighty in the Scriptures." These two qualities were the basis and secret of Mr. Roberts' greatness and popularity as a preacher. Like Timothy, he had known the Holy Scriptures from a child. It was said of him that if every copy of the inspired Book were to be destroyed, he could supply from the treasure-store of his wonderful memory the whole of God's Word. But the truths of God were not merely impressed upon his memory; they were engraved upon his heart. His wonderful eloquence, therefore, was not mere ease and fluency of language, but it was the overflow of experimental knowledge. Sometimes, when preaching, he would be quite carried away by the intensity of his feelings. Upon such occasions he would continue for an hour or more, and his eloquence would be as a mighty torrent carrying everything before it.

ENGLISH HOSPITAL, JAFFA.—Recent letters from Jaffa report a serious outbreak of fever there, whole families ill with it, and deaths numbering fourteen to twenty daily. Over 2000 out-patients were treated at the English Hospital during the month of July, and eighty sufferers admitted. Now the wards are closed for cleaning and repairs, while the nurses take their much-needed rest, but Miss Newton has bravely determined to keep the Medical Mission open through the summer. The debt still presses heavily, and sundry repairs are necessary to the hospital after the exceptionally severe storms of last winter.

Summer at Northfield.—IV.

THE CHRISTIAN CONVENTION.

For the two weeks following the Students' Conference, Northfield assumed almost its normal quiet. Almost, but not entirely, for a few visitors remained to enjoy the little town in its native simplicity. For these, Mr. George C. Needham gave a Bible reading each day, occupying the first week with studies of Old Testament characters, and in the second opening up some parts of the Epistles of St. Paul. These afforded food for thought during the restful hours which followed, and were perhaps more thoroughly digested than some of the equally thoughtful addresses given in the busier weeks preceding.

Now once more the one long "street," avenued with maple trees, and its tributaries, are peopled with strangers; again the rumble of teams and "church waggons"—to say nothing of rolling clouds of dust—pervades the highway, while familiar hymns are borne upon the gently stirring breeze. Every house and cot is filled, and as for "The Northfield," the majestic hotel crowning a knoll at the head of a minor valley, its capacity is strained to the utmost to accommodate its share of guests.

On Tuesday evening, August 1, Dr. A. J. Gordon, of Boston, assumed the leadership of this the eleventh annual Conference, Mr. Moody being unable to leave Chicago for a few days. He himself, however, had only just come from there, having spent a month helping in the special Gospel work being carried on around the World's Fair. He came laden with messages from Mr. Moody to his friends, paramount among which was this: that he hoped the gathering would be largely occupied with Biblical teaching of a doctrinal as well as a practical kind, and requested that special prayer and praise should be offered for the Chicago work.

Accordingly, Dr. Gordon, in a few well-chosen words of welcome, pleaded for an increase of charity (love) and truth, holding the truth in love, and loving in the truth. Doctrine, he said, is like the music score, which must be written before the music can be heard. Let the diapason of love be as broad as you will, provided the score is written by the Great Musician. Doctrine is as essential as is the structural anatomy of a horse, but it must not be dissociated from life, nor life from it. We do not think of the bones of a living animal, and when a Church is strong and healthy in the Lord the doctrine takes care of itself. It is only when a Church is lean that doctrine comes to be deemed offensive. It is the life that "tells," but a holy life must be founded upon a solid doctrinal basis.

It is the desire of Mr. Moody and all concerned that the Northfield platform should be firm in its adhesion to sound doctrine, and it was not unnatural that Dr. Pierson, who had just returned from his temporary occupation of the late Mr. Spurgeon's pulpit, should, when his turn came to speak, declare his love for that simplicity of Bible truth for which the Metropolitan Tabernacle's great pastor had so earnestly contended. No one would ever expect to find Dr. Pierson on the "down grade," nor is it likely he will ever be suspected of "trimming" or be heard to give forth an uncertain sound.

Much has of course been made of the musical element. With Mr. Sankey as precentor, the singing was bound to "go" while he has also voiced some of the old and new favourites which have carried blessing from his singing to so many hearts during the last twenty years. At the organ Mr. Stebbins presided, having come from the Chicago campaign for a brief rest (?). Very heartily was welcomed the presence of Mrs. Stebbins, who for two years past has undergone intense suffering; and it was quite like old times to see her standing by her husband's side, albeit leaning upon a stick, and joining with him in the expressive rendering of Gospel song. Then, too, the highly-cultivated contralto voice of Miss May Whittle was a rich addition to this part of the worship. Duets were also given occasionally by Mr. and Mrs. Baker, blind evangelists from Boston, and by other friends.

One of the leading features of each day has been a Bible study by Dr. Gordon upon giving a survey in retrospect and prospect of the times and seasons—so far as disclosed in the Word of God—of this world from Adam until Christ shall deliver up the Kingdom to his Father. But as the series of studies is not yet complete, I will give them a place in my next instalment of the Conference report.

Among the earlier speakers, Rev. A. C. Dixon, Baptist minister of Brooklyn, gave two very stirring addresses, one upon 1 Pet. ii. 1-5, and another upon Ezek. xxxvii. 3. The first dealt with spiritual growth as indicated by St. Paul. The same rules must apply to a church as to an individual, inasmuch as the Church is but the multiplication of individuals, as the forest is composed of trees, or the State made up of its citizens. The taste (v. 3) and the desire (v. 2) must be regulated by the admonitions in v. 1, which themselves go very far to the root of practical daily life, both in its private and public aspects. The elements of a "spiritual house" built of "living stones" (v. 5) were then presented in detail, in which the duties, responsibilities, privileges, and dangers disclosed by the succeeding verses were considered one by one. There is no life in a stone, and though the sculptor chisel the semblance of life upon the marble, it is but a statue, cold and dead, at the best. Nor can life be evolved. The natural evolution of stone is toward decay. Life, then, must be imparted, and can only come from God. Somewhat similar in part was one of the lessons deduced, in Mr. Dixon's second address, from Ezekiel's vision of the dry bones. He also dealt with considerable force with the command that the prophet should bid the dry bones hear the word of the Lord: "Behold, I will cause breath to enter into you, and ye shall live." It is not our business to adapt the Word to the bones, but the bones must be adapted to the Word. They do not come to us, we must go to them; and while we bemoan the indifference of men to eternal things, we must go to them with the word of the Lord if they are ever to be made to live.

"THE HEADSHIP OF CHRIST"

formed the theme of a very powerful discourse from Dr. A. T. Pierson. The following passages (Col. i. 15—18; ii. 2, 19; Eph. v. 23; iv. 15, 16) collated would read somewhat thus:—Christ was the image of the invisible God; is the head of the body, head over all things to the Church which is his body, the fulness of Him which filleth all in all; that in all things He might have the pre-eminence; from whom all the body, fitly framed and knit together through that which every joint supplieth, according to the working in due measure of each several part, maketh the increase of the body unto the building up of itself in love, and increaseth with the increase of God. If we are members of his body, of his flesh, and of his bones, He is the Saviour of the body."

Thus we have one magnificent conception in which are five leading thoughts:—Image—He is the image of the invisible God. Pre-eminence—that in all things He might have the pre-eminence. Headship—head over all things to the Church, which is his body. Increase—maketh increase of the body and increaseth with the increase of God. Fulness—the fulness of Him that filleth all in all.

Dr. Pierson then, with the aid of the blackboard, described the physiological characteristics and functions of the head, as related to the body, showing in a peculiarly interesting way that Christ fulfils the same offices to the Church which is the body.

Here are a few of his thoughts:—

What pencil and chisel are to the artist, metaphors are to the Holy Spirit, and when the Holy Spirit speaks of Christ as the head, he uses probably the most magnificent figure that could be used to represent Christ.

If any one here doubts the deity of Jesus Christ, I would ask, how can absolute pre-eminence be ascribed to Christ over all things and over all beings in heaven and in earth, if he is not God?

If you receive the Spirit, submit to the Spirit, embody the Spirit in your life, then Christ is practically head over the Church, and controls the Church; and if you grieve and offend the Spirit, and cause him to withdraw, Christ is no longer practically the head. I have spoken of the fact that all the senses are located in the head; besides this, the organs of speech are located there. The organs of speech, the organs of mastication, and all the senses are resident in the head, and the most delicate sense of touch is in the lips. . . . If you want to understand the headship of Christ and the importance of Christ as the head, think of what the head is to the body, and think of this, that all your spiritual sense depends on Christ. If you see the truth, it is through his eyes; if you hear the Word of God, it is through his ears; if you scent the flowers of paradise, it is through his nostrils; if you taste the beauties of the age to come, it is, as it were, through his organs of taste. Speech, mastication, sight, hearing, taste, all are in the head, and so, as the head is over all things to the body, so Christ is to his Church. And so you get an idea of the increase of the body all depending on the head...

There are some physiological facts which I think are not known generally, although they are rather familiar to readers of medicine. Did you ever know that muscles have been known to slough off the human body because they lacked vital connection with the brain, because the nerves were destroyed? A gentleman was telling me in Edinburgh that he had known the large muscles of a working-man to absolutely slough off because the nerve connection with the brain was destroyed. What does your continuance in the body of Christ depend upon? It depends upon its connection with the head. Let that be destroyed, and you will have to slough off the body. So we are to understand that the head is a fountain of motion, sense, vitality, and emotion, and that the body is nothing but the channel through which the force resident in the brain flows and exhibits itself.

There is no work of man that exhibits skill, knowledge, taste, or refinement, that is a proof of wisdom and intelligence and power, but it is the fulness of the brain, it is the fulness of the head, it is an exhibition of the power that resides in the head. A poem like Milton's "Paradise Lost," or Dante's wonderful discourse on purgatory, what is it? It is the fulness of the brain. What is your life at its most beautiful estate? It is the fulness of Christ. If you have love for a soul, unselfish, sacrificing love, what is it? Nothing but the fulness of Christ. You have learned to love by standing before the Cross, where the grandest exhibition of love was made that has ever been made, so that if there is anything Christlike in you, it is the fulness of Him: if there is anything that is truly beautiful in your character, it is the fulness of Him; for there is no service which you render to humanity or to God but it is the fulness of Jesus Christ. The origination of all power, and all skill, all intelligence, all wisdom, all sacrifice, and all generosity, is in Him. He is, therefore, above you all, and in you all, and through you all.

This address, following closely upon one by Rev. G. W. Folwell, of Philadelphia, upon "The Glory of Christ" (2 Cor. iv. 4), formed a fitting conclusion to a session devoted to the consideration of Christ as Lord of all.

Rev. George C. Needham, who, it will be inferred, is fast regaining robust health after a period of prostration, gave some helpful and instructive expositions of

THE PRIESTHOOD OF CHRIST.

One occasion had especial reference to the cleansing of sin as typified by the Levitical cleansing of the leper. If a man had leprosy, he was brought to Aaron or unto one of the priests to be examined. Now the priest had to be very careful in his examination, for if the man should chance to have leprosy, he would sin against the community if he pronounced him clean when he was not, and would sin against the man if he banished him when he was clean. So one who has the leprosy of sin must present himself before the Great Priest for a priestly examination. Therefore, the first thing is priestly examination.

The priest's verdict was conclusive, so also is Christ's, and there are very few who like to know that they are unclean, that they are unfit to remain in the community. None are righteous, no matter how good they are, and there are a number of illustrations given in the Bible to show the position that we hold to God. The second is priestly excommunication. All lepers must live out of the city, and nothing brings them back until they are told by the priest that they are clean. It is hard for a sinner to come to the conviction that what God said of him is so, but when he is convinced that there is nothing whatever good in him, he is in a position to hear the Gospel. So we want to bring the sinner to the legal conviction, for an unpardoned sinner will always have to be without God.

On the other occasion Mr. Needham grouped his thoughts around Heb. v. 1—10 and vii. 1—28, exalting Christ in the threefold character of mediator, intercessor, and advocate, and expounding the similarity of his priesthood with that of Melchisedek.

Rev. A. S. Gumbart (Boston) gave a "word study" of the 23rd Psalm in panoramic form, inviting attention to the Divine pictures suggested by the various sentences, phrases, or words in this beautiful psalm. In graphic style he presented to the mind such scenes as these: Want; a rich pasture; a restful stream; restoration (e.g. of the prodigal); a country highway; the rod and staff of the Oriental shepherd; the royal banquet; and the attendance (or pursuit) of goodness and mercy. Each of these features was delineated with an artist's skill, until the grand old psalm seemed endowed with fresh life in its mission of cheering fainting souls with the assurance of God's eternal care.

A sermon delivered in the church on Sunday morning (August 6), by Professor Merrill E. Gates, president of Amherst College, also stands forth prominently as one to be remembered. His subject was Peace (Is. xxvi. 3; Rom. v. 1; John xvi. 33). It was characterised perhaps less by originality of thought than by its clearness as an exposition of evangelical truth. As such it was well worthy of note, and Dr. Gates's position in the educational and social world invested it with especial force and value. He is a man of deep spirituality, and one who lives and moves in the presence of the King. It was expected that his voice would be heard again on succeeding days, but unhappily he was called hurriedly away on Monday to attend a fellow-professor, who had been very seriously, it was feared fatally, injured in a railway collision. This unlooked-for event cast a gloom over the gatherings, while earnest prayer was offered for the recovery of the sufferer.

Speaking of catastrophes, I may mention here that during a thunderstorm of unusual severity (that is, judged by an English standard), the seminary barns were struck by lightning, which resulted in the

of the buildings and contents, which included all the summer's crop of hay, several wagons, and other property to the value of ten or twelve thousand dollars. It was therefore with some point that the evening session closed with the hymn, "Saviour, breathe an evening blessing," with its solemn verse beginning—

Though destruction walk around us,
Though the arrows past us fly.

Among the many visitors to the Convention, a special interest attaches to the presence of Miss Fanny Crosby, from whose heart and pen have emanated so many of the Gospel hymns which are now known the wide world over, including "Safe in the arms of Jesus." She has never had the sight of her eyes, but her mental vision is more than normally clear. In a brief address, pathetic in its simplicity, at one of the meetings she said:—"Each succeeding year seems to bind me more closely to this beautiful village of Northfield, which rests so tranquilly among the mountains. God's peace hovers over it and in this sacred house. How grand it will be when we meet in that land where we shall never part! Mr. and Mrs. Baker (the blind singers mentioned already) do not regret that we cannot see. We have our mind, our intellect. We can picture every face, and best of all we have our faith centred in the Rock of Ages. Do we regret our lack of sight? No, for when we enter the pearly gate the face of our Lord will be the first on which we shall ever have gazed. Oh, how small is the sorrow of this world compared to the joy of that meeting face to face."

Miss Crosby closed with the following original poem:—

Some day my earthly house will fall,
I cannot tell how soon 'twill be,
But this I know—my All in All
Has now in heaven a place for me,
And I shall see Him face to face,
And tell the story—Saved by grace.

Some day the silver cord will break,
And I no more as now shall sing;
But, oh, the joy when I shall wake
Within the palace of the King!
And I shall see Him face to face,
And tell the story—Saved by grace.

Some day, when fades the golden sun
Beneath the hazy tinted west,
My blessed Lord shall say, "Well done!"
And I shall enter into rest,
And I shall see Him face to face,
And tell the story—Saved by grace.

Some day; till then I'll watch and wait,
My lamp all trimmed and burning bright,
That when my Saviour opes the gate
My soul to Him may wing its flight,
And I shall see Him face to face,
And tell the story—Saved by grace.

THE MISSION FIELDS.

In my report of the Students' Conference last month, I said that not a year passed without some of the "college boys" volunteering for foreign missionary work. Nor is this general convention to be considered behind. English readers know how, at Keswick, of late years the missionary meeting is one of the brightest features of the Convention, while, as a practical outcome of consecration, numbers find their way to the dark places of heathendom. Here a whole day is given to the missionary cause, the meetings being addressed by those who have been or are still engaged upon the mission field.

Dr. B. C. Atterbury, for fourteen years a medical missionary in China, describing the sphere of work in which the Lord had placed him, upheld the necessity of reaching the children (of whom 16,000 are daily taught in the mission schools), since it is to them we must look for the future conversion of China. Of course ladies are invaluable in this work, being admitted to the interior of homes to which the male missionary has no access. The Chinese girls are every bit as intelligent as the Chinese boys, but after they have been continually told they have no souls, forbidden to read, and made the slaves of their families, and of the families into which they are married, what wonder that they become more stupid than an animal? It is to reach these that the need exists for faithful, patient, and loving women as missionaries.

Visiting, preaching, teaching, and medical work are the chief methods employed. The speaker gave some very touching instances of the grateful devotion shown by some of the patients who had been healed of their maladies, as showing what an open door the art and practice of medicine and surgery afford. Professionally, he had not found it a success, inasmuch as he had no leisure to keep abreast with the developments of medical discovery, but what a success it was when it was a means of bringing heathen souls into the liberty of the kingdom of God, and how amply rewarded the missionary felt himself to be!

Rev. Thos. Gulick followed with a sketch of work in Spain, in which he laboured for eleven years. The Spanish tongue, he said, is spoken to-day by more persons than any other European language. To an American audience this is particularly important, on account of the vast multitudes of Spanish-speaking people in South and Central America, while the fact cannot be overlooked that it was the generosity of a Spanish Sovereign that enabled Columbus to undertake the voyage which resulted in the discovery of this continent. He indicated the darkness of the people in those parts of Spain where the Romish priests hold sway, and asked prayer for the 10,000 converts worshipping in the Protestant churches in that country.

Then came Dr. David Downey, of the Baptist Telegu Mission of India, established in 1836. His was a thrilling narrative indeed. More than once had the home committee been on the point of abandoning the work on account of its apparent sterility, but each time something turned the tide of judgment in its favour. The last time it was that heroic answer of the venerable Dr. Jewett who, just returned from the country itself in broken health, when asked by the committee, "Brother Jewett, what do you say—shall the Telegu mission be abandoned or reinforced?" replied, "Well, brethren, I do not know what your mind is, but if the Lord restores my health, I am going back to live, and if need be to die, among the Telegu people!" What reply could they give than this—"Ah, well, then, we must at least send a man over to give you a Christian burial!"

But that happened thirty years ago, and "Brother Jewett" isn't buried yet! He was spied by the speaker among the audience, and called up to the platform—a decrepit and aged man, but strong in the Lord and in the power of his might, a veritable "father in Israel," whose hoary head only awaits the crown of life, the promised reward of faithful service. Dr. Downey went on to tell how in a remarkable manner, and in manifest answer to prayer, Dr. Jewett had been enabled to secure a house (built by a Government official for his own use) for a missionary centre on the very spot of ground for which he had for years been praying, the money coming from an old classmate in Boston, whose heart the Lord had touched to lay aside a certain sum, though at the time he did not know for what purpose. Just after doing so he received a letter from Dr. Jewett which made his course clear as to its disposal.

These Telegus were the lowest stratum of Hindu society, ignorant and poor to the last degree. The caste feeling was so strong that they always had to stand aside to let a Brahmin pass. But now it is the Brahmin who stands aside, such an elevating effect has Christianity had upon these once trodden-down people. After the crisis referred to above, Dr. John E. Clough and his wife went out and took possession of the house Dr. Jewett had purchased in 1865; a great revival broke out, the sowing of many years turned to harvest, and within a year an almost incredible number of converts had been baptized on definite confession of their faith.

Next fall, Dr. Downey with his wife and three children hope to return to this work. They will spend a short time in England in September, and I hope some of my readers may have the opportunity of hearing his inspiring story for themselves.

In the afternoon, Rev. Josiah Tyrell, for forty years a missionary among the Zulus, astonished his hearers by showing how widespread they and their kindred races were, and by telling of the wonderful change wrought in the lives of many who had learned the truth among them. He mentioned especially a converted chief, who preached in a church which he had built for 5000 people, living a consistent Christian and consequently civilised life. At the conclusion, Mr. Tyrell's daughter gave specimens of Zulu music to an appreciative audience.

Dr. Reynolds, of Turkey, acknowledged that the work among the nominally Christian Armenians—for work among Turks is not allowed—is very discouraging, and that the opposition is now much greater than formerly, though, on the other hand, evangelical ideas and the Word of God were permeating the native churches. When the cholera invaded his district the help he was enabled to afford not only opened many hearts to his message, but even the churches, where he, a Protestant missionary, was permitted to speak from within the chancel on the prevention of the epidemic; and at Christmas time they were actually invited to the church to hear an evangelical sermon. Of the present condition of Turkey, Dr. Reynolds could not speak as he would, or his return would be prohibited, but he urged the American people to force their Government actively to protect the citizens and capital in that land for mission purposes.

Rev. Henry Fairbank, of India, showed how that the most rigorous caste of India, that of Brahminism, was steadily giving way in the face of European example, and that to-day men did half-openly what not long ago would have incurred the direst penalties. These men can only be reached through the women, who rule them till ten or twelve years of age, instilling every notion of religion into them, and always wielding untold power; for this reason Zenana work is the most hopeful in India. An intelligent Mohammedan had recently remarked to him, "We are not afraid of your schools, or of your preaching, but we do fear your Zenana Mission." No work is so quiet, or for a long time likely to be unsuccessful, as this, but none has a brighter prospect.

Dr. C. A. Nichols, of Burmah, testified as to the wonderful latent capabilities of the Karens, and as to their sympathetic hearts and ears. Their religion, Buddhism, is a device to put the human heart to sleep, and it has very nearly succeeded. One of its features is that it has permitted them to retain somewhat of their primitive demonology, with their ancient traditions, and among these was one of a lost white book, which had prepared an entrance for the Gospel messenger. The first convert, sixty-five years ago, was a man who had committed twenty-seven murders, and now there are nearly 30,000 Christians in 100 churches supporting their own pastors and village schools, with colleges teaching in four languages up to University standard. How little we understand the intellectual capabilities of these ancient races! The words "native" and "heathen" should be blotted out; they have gathered so much that is false around them. The bulk of the Karen Christians are consistent in their life, and ardently maintain the Sabbath. The chief spiritual results in Burmah have been gained, not through missionaries, but through their 10,000 native workers, living the truths of the Gospel, holding their church-members to the very highest standards in Christian morality. It is this personal contact that tells, and if we do not meet the heathen as man to man, as heart to heart, as fellow-sinner to fellow-sinner, we will never reach him. The initial difficulty is to get him to acknowledge himself a sinner and in need of life, and when a Karen goes into Buddhism it is seven times harder to reach him.

In the evening the subject of the day was again resumed, the session being opened by Rev. W. M. Upcraft, of Western China. He objected to the distinctive terms, "home" and "foreign" missions, contending that wherever Christ is should be his children's home, and that if they enlarged their borders sufficiently no foreign land would be so distant as not to be within the radius of "home." He had gone to the Chinese in the love of Christ with the idea of brotherhood, determining to have close contact and fellowship with them. Accordingly he adopted the native dress, and testified to the success which this method had achieved in winning their hearts.

Then followed Dr. Post, of Syria, who, in a most able and powerful address, showed what the present position of Islam was—a mighty system stretching from China to Morocco, an arch, as it were, with Christianity beside the keystone. When Buddhism has been vanquished, when the Chinaman confesses Christ, we shall yet have to cope with Islam, a religion whose title means resignation, implying peace with God. Picturing the domestic life of Islam, Dr. Post remarked that it is so wedded to slavery, so intertwined with it, that it cannot exist without it. The mother of every Sultan of Turkey is a slave, and the Sultans there can wed none other than slaves. The position of women throughout its society is that of ignorant slaves, and their early marriages preclude all possibility of mental development. The speaker—a medical man of high repute, by the way—had known a grandmother of twenty.

Islam to-day numbers 200 millions, not barbarians, but people with a history, of Persian, Greek, Hebrew, Arabian, Chinese, Hindoo stock, of the best races of the world, occupying territory four times larger than China and three times larger than the United States.

"I do not believe that our age of civilisation possesses the seeds of longevity; that depends upon our virtues, and upon our Christianity. If we lose our religion, our aggressive Christianity, all is lost. Islam does not dream of forcing us to accept its teachings, but it dreams of converting us, and it is going to be to convert them to Christ. Yet I believe that many a Christian will rise at the last day from Mohammedan graves."

Then the speaker, now returning on pressing business only the third time in thirty years, made a bold and stirring appeal to the Christians assembled to stay the waste caused by divisions at home—several churches in towns of 10,000 people. "Brethren, these things ought not so to be. You cannot expect your petty pittance to find favour with God and convert the world while this continues, with all your light and your progress. We are not doing our duty towards the Mohammedan world. In the name of these dying ones I implore you to find out the reason of this on your knees, in your prayers before God."

Some concluding words came from Rev. Dr. H. C. Mabie, of the American Baptist Missionary Union, who had spent three years recently in visiting various mission stations. He strongly supported Mr. Upcraft's position, and maintained that the grace of God in a man which could induce him thus to come down to the social level of a heathen in order to raise him up, was part of the same grace that was in the Lord Jesus, who for our sakes became poor. Let those who deem it wrong consider the example of our Lord, who laid aside the garments of his Father's home and, assuming the form of sinful man, came and lived amongst sinful men in order to open to them the way to heaven.

Thus closed one of the most important days of the Convention. The following morning Mr. Moody occupied the platform, and at this point I shall hope to resume my report next week. G. E. M.

African Missions Visited.—9.

BY MR. D. A. HUNTER.

KIMBERLEY.

From a missionary point of view, the great interest of Kimberley centres in what are known as the "compounds." These are large enclosures extending over several acres each, and surrounded with rough corrugated iron sheds, where live the natives who work in the diamond mines. When they are admitted they become voluntary prisoners for at least three months. Many of them remain in longer, or after a holiday return for a second period of service. The high wages earned, ranging from 20s. to 30s. per week, attract natives from nearly every tribe south of the Zambesi. In these compounds there are opportunities of giving the Gospel to strangers from afar, and most remarkable and cheering are the instances one comes across in which men have accepted Christ while in the compounds, learned to read, and returned to their own home and friends to tell them the wonderful story of the Cross.

Sunday is the day to see the compounds at their busiest, for during the week half the men are working in the mines on the day shift, and the other half on the night shift. I obtained the necessary pass from the De Beers Co., and went in to be present at the compound service on Sunday afternoon. It was a strange sight that met me as I got within the big gates. Some two to three thousand Africans, clothed in the most motley rags one could imagine, were thronging the enclosure. At one end a war dance was in full swing, while many were driving a busy trade in gambling with dice. One man had just lost £5. They stake their hard-earned money with the utmost nonchalance. Two good features I must mention in this compound life. There is good hospital accommodation in case of sickness or accident, and no intoxicating liquor is allowed within the gates.

Presently the missionary rang a large handbell, and taking out his French horn, began to play a hymn. This attracted a goodly number, who gathered round us, and right in the midst of all the bustle and din a service was carried on. One could distinguish the Christian "boys" (they are all called boys, irrespective of age), for as they came up they bent a moment in silent prayer, and sat down with Bible and hymn-book in hand.

The address was delivered in one dialect and translated into another by one of the natives, so that most could understand, and as I watched their faces, for I could not understand either dialect, I thought of the far distant kraals where these strange words would be repeated as good news to those who know nothing of a Saviour's love.

There is a schoolroom in each of these compounds, where work is carried on during the week, but of course much of the teaching is necessarily fragmentary, owing to the boys often staying only three months, and only being able to attend every alternate week when they are working on the night shift.

JOHANNESBURG.

The roundabout journey from Kimberley to Johannesburg occupied about forty hours; whereas, by a direct line, the distance would easily be covered in ten hours by a moderately fast train.

Johannesburg is now the centre of business activity in South Africa, and one cannot but marvel at its rapid growth, when one remembers there was no such place seven years ago. Fine hotels and handsome shops have sprung up, forming streets that would do credit to an English county town; and luxurious residences are already to be found in the suburbs, while building operations all around seem to be the order of the day.

Whence this rapid growth? you say. Johannesburg is literally built on gold. The Witwatersrand, or "Rand" (pronounced Rant), as it is usually called, is a ridge nearly 5500 feet above sea level, and extending some sixty miles east and west. Johannesburg is right in the middle of it, and along the ridge are forty-eight gold-mines, in which are wrested from the earth its hidden treasure. During the great boom, which ended in a crash some two years ago, the excitement was tremendous. Shares went up to greatly inflated values, and many were badly nipped, and are still suffering from the crash.

The mining is now settling down to a regular industry, which gives promise of permanency for at least half a century (experts put the time as much longer), and thousands of natives as well as white people find employment on the mines. The output of gold this year from the "Rand" will run to about five millions of pounds sterling.

I am sorry to say that work is carried on seven days a week, so that numbers of young Englishmen and colonials, not to mention natives, have no day of rest. Might I urge all Christians who are shareholders in these mines to take this matter up? You do not wish to derive an income from Sunday work, and to be made richer by depriving others of their day of rest? Then, will you not make use of the voting power which your shares give you to put this matter right? It may detract from your dividends a little, but, if need be, rather reduce your giving than take money which is soiled with Sunday labour.

There is a grand opening in Johannesburg for what I shall call—for want of a better term—private Y.M.C.A. work. A few Christian families settling there, and keeping open house on Sundays and several evenings during the week for young fellows, would be as lighthouses on a rock-bound coast. Hundreds of young fellows come out to push their fortunes, and have to put up with miserable rooms and much roughing on account of the high cost of living. Drinking-bars and billiard-saloons are open in great profusion, and have a large clientèle; but for the young fellow who wants to keep out of these, and who longs for a bit of home life, and a little social intercourse, there is no provision. A friendly invitation to such, assuring him of a welcome every Sunday evening for tea, and occasionally during the week, would be an immense boon, and would probably save him from the maelström of worldliness and wickedness on the verge of which he stands.

The Christian family that goes out on such a mission bent need not fear the self-denial entailed. There are many compensations. The climate of Johannesburg is delightful, and so soon as the more ample water supply is provided, and the dust overcome by plentiful watering of the streets, it will be a pleasant place to live in. Moreover, it is a good business centre, where those with private means can command 7 to 8 per cent. interest on their capital, with first-rate security.

Much that I have said about work among natives in Kimberley applies to those in Johannesburg, both on the mines and in the towns. Not only are Africans found from very many tribes, but to anyone speaking Tamil there is a field among East Indians, who are quite numerous. Only a day or two ago a young Englishman said to me: "I am tremendously impressed with the need of Christian gentlemen coming and settling out here." This is my own feeling, and I am confident that if some families would come out in God's name He would greatly bless their coming, and they would find openings in things temporal as well as spiritual which do not often occur at home.

The Caledonian Christian Club.

This Institute finds its utmost efforts taxed to deal with the young men and women coming up to London and pressed out often by dull trade at home. While they are cared for and befriended in temporal things, it is also sought to induce them to unite with some Christian Church. In many ways, and not least in tracing out dear ones lost sight of, the Institute has rendered very valuable service. The objects of the club are thus indicated:—To provide a healthful and attractive Home for young men and women, strangers in London.—Temporary residence and board for fresh arrivals, until situations and permanent lodgings are secured.—Certified lists of safe and good lodgings, and help in securing situations.—Introduction to the churches, Y.M.C.A., and Y.W.C.A.

The headquarters are at 5, Southampton-street, Holborn, W.C., and there are women's branches for Belgravia, Kensington, and St. John's Wood. The latest report shows a debt of some £1000, and to clear this off, a generous friend has offered £500, if the other £500 be raised.

OPEN-AIR WORK AT SCARBOROUGH.

BY REV. R. BALGARNIE.

It may interest the readers of The Christian to know something of the open-air services at Scarborough, which have been continued, without interruption, for forty years. The time for such services is usually on Sunday afternoon, during the months of July, August, and September. They originated in the desire to reach the fishermen who loiter on the sands; during the herring season these loiterers come from all parts of the East and West coasts, extending from Peterhead in Scotland to Penzance in Cornwall. As a rule, fishermen fight shy of ministers of the Gospel, and have, therefore, to be cautiously approached. But they are a class well worth seeking, and when won to Christ become bold and emphatic in their testimony. This was surely the reason why our blessed Lord went to the Lake of Galilee and chose his first apostles there.

As an encouragement to young ministers about to begin open-air work, I may testify that my own personal fitness was small. The demands of my pastorate were heavy, and kindly counsels were offered against it; a throat somewhat delicate, and a natural disposition averse to publicity, also rendered the experiment doubtful. But these difficulties were soon surmounted when the heart took hold of the work. In it I was greatly encouraged by my dear old friend Dr. Newman Hall, who was then earnestly working at Hull. Now I can gratefully say, thank God, I have been an open-air preacher all these years. Physically, it has strengthened me; spiritually, it has quickened me; ministerially, it has extended my influence, and yielded results that fill my heart with wonder and praise.

The beginning of the work was small. Yet, simply judging from the hymn-sheets circulated, I know about 400,000 persons must have been reached; and these not fishermen only, but visitors from all parts of the country. Our meeting-place at first was on the South Sands when the tide was low. The pulpit was a plank, an upturned boat, or anything else that came in the way. No choir or instrument was needed. An open-air congregation makes its own choir, especially among fishermen. Give out a well-known hymn, start a popular tune, put in a note here and there to regulate it, and soon you have hearty singing. Of course, this draws a crowd, while others are attracted to the spot just to see what is going on.

For a service like this no preaching is of use unless it be full of Christ. An argumentative discourse is sure to fail; men are not reasoned into Christianity, but drawn, allured, won. Lift up Christ, and He proves his own Divinity by drawing human souls to Himself. But all open-air addresses should be hearty, natural, pointed, and illustrated. The immediate surroundings by the seaside supply abundant materials for this. The ocean tells of God's unfathomable love; the harbour, of Christ, the refuge from the storm; the lifeboat, of Him who is able to save unto the uttermost; the sands, of the instability of all human merit as a foundation; the advancing tide, of the certain approach of death; the passing ships, of souls voyaging to eternity, and so on. As it frequently fell to my lot to witness shipwrecks, and to help in rescuing the perishing, such experiences were eagerly listened to, and they always told. Take the following as an example. Yonder in the bay, a vessel, driven before the gale, has grounded; the crew are in the rigging, and their cries for help are heard amid the howling tempest. Away the lifeboat dashes to the rescue; it has reached the wreck and thrown the line on board. I see the mariners one by one drop into the lifeboat. One man still clings to the mast, and is urged to let go his hold; at last he too abandons the ship, and is saved. As they are safely landed on yonder shore a shout of gladness bursts from thousands of spectators that all are saved. The point of such a description, furnished on the spot, is at once felt. How often have I beheld the crowd hushed into stillness and listening with tearful eyes, as I told them of the shipwrecked soul, of Jesus as the Lifeboat putting off to the rescue, of the peril of clinging to our self-righteousness, of the absolute necessity of surrender to Christ, of the full salvation to be found in Him, and of the joy in the presence of the angels when sinners repent and are saved. Then follows a hymn: perhaps it is "Jesus, lover of my soul," which is sung with a warmth often thrilling; then a prayer-meeting, which is left perfectly open, and in which Christians of all denominations take part. This is indeed a practical Evangelical Alliance by the seashore. Some of the most touching prayers have been offered there; certainly the most impressive were from the lips of fishermen.

The distribution of religious tracts at the close is an important part of open-air work. No wider or more interesting field could be found for scattering the good seed of the Kingdom. Silent voices are these tracts to speak for Christ where the preacher's voice cannot be heard. Nor is the field confined to England alone. Amongst the audience may be found sailors and fishermen from the seaboard countries of Europe. One can easily see by their stolid looks that they do not understand the address, but when you offer them a tract or Scripture portion in their own tongue you should mark the change that comes over their faces. These gifts are carried off to their vessels, and thence to their distant homes as a memento of these services. This kind of work has also afforded a novel sphere of labour to visitors acquainted with foreign languages. These volunteers follow the men to the boats, and converse with them in their own tongues about Jesus Christ.

(To be concluded.)

A SABBATH IN CORSICA.

BY REV. J. G. CUNNINGHAM, M.A.

"If you receive Miss Brown under your roof, you shall suffer one hundred years of purgatory for every night that you harbour the heretic." So said the priest of M—— to a parishioner who had promised accommodation to Miss Grant Brown when she was coming, by invitation of the Mayor, to hold a religious meeting in the village. We smile at the terrible threat; but the Corsican peasant shuddered, and hastened, at any sacrifice, to cancel the arrangement with Miss Brown. Nevertheless the meeting was held, spiritual songs were sung, the Word of God was read and explained, and a number of Roman Catholics heard for the first time the "good tidings of great joy." At the close of the meeting, one "whose heart the Lord opened" gave hospitable welcome to the stranger who had in winning speech and song published the Gospel-message.

This occurred a few years ago. Many meetings have since that day been held, not only in M——, but also in seven or eight other places in the region of Corsica; the Scriptures and religious tracts have been put into the hands of the people; some have found light and freedom through the Word of God; the yoke of priestly intolerance has been broken; and the lady, whose quiet, self-denying efforts have mainly contributed to these results, has so completely won the goodwill of the people that in many places it is a sufficient introduction to be known as a friend of la demoiselle anglaise.

Complying with an earnest request from Miss Grant Brown and a few interested friends in this country and on the Continent, I went to Corsica in May, in order to visit as many as possible of the small scattered companies of earnest people who, under the guidance of Scriptural teaching, have withdrawn from the Church of Rome. I spent ten days in the island, and addressed ten meetings. I had the pleasure of visiting three towns and five villages, in which I was welcomed by the infant Protestant community as the who had exercised ministry among them. At least five-sixths of every audience (numbering sometimes about eighty or a hundred men) were nominally Roman Catholics, but their sympathies were manifestly with the Protestant neighbours by whose invitation they attended the meetings. I am glad to be allowed to narrate the events of one day—namely, Sabbath, May 21.

Mr. O—— placed the best room in his large house at my service for the two days of my sojourn at M——. He is an old soldier, having a competent income from his shop and two vineyards. He has no fear of priestly threats; on the contrary, he has openly denounced the priest for unscrupulous dealing with ecclesiastical funds, and once said to his face, "Je ne rentre jamais dans l'église d'un flibustier comme vous" ("I will never again set foot in the church of a freebooter like you").

The hour fixed for our first meeting on Sabbath was 2 p.m. This was intimated to the public by a red banner at the hall, on which, in large white letters, the name of the preacher and the object of the meeting were announced. The forenoon was fully occupied in preparation for the meeting and in conversation and prayer with individuals. Among these the most interesting were (1) two young men of piety and talent, Messrs. De Matra and Marinetti, natives of Muro, who have been in Scotland for a time qualifying themselves for the work of evangelists in their native island; (2) a householder in M—— who, some time ago, left the Roman Catholic Church; and (3) a granddaughter of Madame Pietri, the heiress of Corsica's illustrious patriot, Pascal Paoli. This lady occupies still the château of Paoli, but has seen many sorrows. About two o'clock the meeting began. It was attended by fifty or sixty men and a few women (most of these were in the room adjoining the hall). We were within a few yards of the Roman Catholic church, and it was difficult to speak and hear when the bells were ringing; otherwise we were not disturbed.

Notwithstanding her injuries from an accident of the previous day, Miss Brown was at the meeting, and played the harmonium with the hand which was not disabled. We began with praise, prayer, and reading of the Scripture, after which M. De Matra welcomed me in the name of all present, in an address so tender in feeling and so felicitous in expression, that when I rose I could with difficulty command my voice, and my eyes were filled with tears. I proceeded to speak on the words of Paul in Acts xxiv. 14-16: "This I confess unto thee, that after the way which they call heresy, so worship I the God of my fathers." They listened with attention to a somewhat lengthened exposition of our Protestant faith and practice, as the same in all essential features with the religion which the great apostle vindicated at the bar of the Roman governor.

Our evening meeting began at seven. The hall was again filled; and in the next room, beyond an open door, were unseen fellow-worshippers; while outside, when the short twilight gave place to darkness, many drew near to listen. After praise and prayer (led by M. Marinetti), I gave an address upon Gaius (3 John 1, 9) as a model for all Christian workers, because he (1) welcomed the truth—it was "in" him (ver. 3); (2) walked in the truth; and (3) worked for the truth with diligence, charity, and humility. I then intimated that Messrs. De Matra and Marinetti, well known to them all, were ready to undertake the work of evangelists, for which they had undergone a course of special study, and that I had no doubt that all present would gladly unite in commending them to God in fervent prayer for the help and blessing without which all work is vain. As both evangelists had expressed a desire to have their sealed by their public baptism, I administered this ordinance after their profession of faith; and, after prayer, gave them the right hand of fellowship in the name of all present as labourers recognised and welcomed by them in the vineyard of the Lord. Both of them addressed the meeting, stating briefly and boldly the Gospel which they believed and the feelings with which they desired to tell others of the Saviour whom they had found.

When we had again engaged in prayer and praise, the bread and wine for the celebration of the Lord's Supper were brought in, and placed upon the table. I then read the Scriptural directory for the observance of the ordinance (1 Cor. xi. 23), requesting all to take notice that, whereas there is scarcely one point of resemblance between the original Christian institution and the Roman Catholic mass, it is the honest endeavour of Protestants to obey, even in the smallest details, the apostolic rule. Thanks having been offered, and a short statement made as to the things which the Master gives to all whom He welcomes to this feast, I invited those to come forward who felt warranted in making open and deliberate confession of Christ as their only Lord and Saviour. In solemn silence, and with a serious yet joyful demeanour, fifteen men and three women, all of them until recently belonging to the Roman Catholic Church, came forward, and for the first time in their lives claimed a place at the table which the Lord has spread in the wilderness for his own. It was a night much to be remembered by them and by us all. The farewell hymn and benediction were followed by many friendly words and cordial graspings of the hand, until, long after nine o'clock, we quitted the place of sacred fellowship and returned to our lodgings, glorifying God and saying, "We have seen strange things to-day."—Free Church of Scotland Monthly.

UNITED CHRISTIAN SERVICE.

The Glasgow United Evangelistic Association.

A marvellous illustration of the practical value of unity in aggressive Gospel service is supplied by the new report of this Association. The work is extensive and far-reaching, and has proved wonderfully fruitful. It is described as evangelistic and ameliorative. Including maintenance of the Bible Training Institute for Christian workers, about £11,000 per annum are required to carry on the whole operations, and for all this no personal appeal is made, the Lord's people being told the facts of the case, and left to consider their duty and privilege. The noon prayer-meeting and the fellowship meeting may be regarded as the battery in which are generated the force and motive power which vitalise the whole operations of the United Association. We can but notice some of the leading features. As to the

CENTRAL OR TENT HALL,

Mr. Napier records with thankfulness that some measure of revival has been granted during 1892, making all hearts to rejoice. This has been specially the case in the summer work, and also in Gospel Temperance work; yet not limited to these, as the Free Breakfast work has also participated in the blessing. Regarding this part of the Tent Hall work, about which many still are somewhat doubtful, and which certainly presents peculiar difficulties, Mr. Napier says:—"The work has been large and full of the deepest interest—many professing salvation, and many sent to Homes of Rescue or Shelter. From various causes we can only follow the cases imperfectly; but we continually find instances of blessing emerging from many and unexpected quarters.

"The total attendance at the Free Breakfast during the year, exclusive of visitors and workers, has been 59,100. The larger attendance of men than women still continues, this being accounted for by the number of men who come from the lodging-houses—a feature in our social life which we think requires much consideration, the tendency being to disintegrate and break up family life. Among the women a sad feature is the large number of young girls verging on womanhood, many evidently leading immoral lives. Special effort has been made on their behalf, and Miss Campbell, the matron of the Girls' Home for Temporary Help, has been of great assistance by her personal presence, and readiness to take to the Home at once such girls as may have been found suitable.

"At the Gospel temperance meetings the attendances have continued large, and the results have been most encouraging. The open-air meetings have been held daily throughout the year, and have been often very largely attended. We have abundant evidence of blessing following our open-air work. Singing the Gospel, whether by our own or other choirs, and occasionally by individual singers, has continued to hold a large place in our meetings, and always with marked evidence of blessing."

AT BETHANY HALL

the tide has been continuously and steadily rising, and at no previous time have there been more marked tokens of the Lord's presence and blessing. The attendance at the ordinary week-evening meetings is now as large as it used to be when special evangelistic services were being held. And there seems to be no meeting without spiritual results, sometimes of a very remarkable kind. "Since God," as a worker puts it, "through Brother Logan, came among us, drunkards, gamblers, fighters, etc., have been brought to a knowledge of the truth as it is in Christ, and are now, glory be to God, workers amongst us." Now, these results are not due to the meetings alone. It is evident that much of the blessing comes from persistent house-to-house visitation, accompanied with leaflet distribution and invitations to the meetings. In this work over 150 are engaged every Sabbath afternoon, who meet together for earnest prayer before going to their assigned districts. Over 4000 tracts are distributed, week by week, by these faithful men and women, and the monthly meeting of this large and hearty band of workers is a never-failing stimulus and joy. A minister says—"We have during the last year gathered a goodly number into our church fellowship who give as their spiritual birthplace Bethany Hall. I am within the mark when I say that over twenty have, within the last four months, joined our church who still attend the Bethany meetings, and most of whom are earnest workers in connection with your Mission. I have been delighted, in visiting their homes, with the tone of warm-hearted Christianity with which I have been brought into contact, and with the power of a believed Gospel to make hearts and homes happy." In the western quarter of the city, the Mizpah Hall continues to be a centre of blessing. The work of the Mizpah Band continues to be prosecuted vigorously, and if the enrolled membership is somewhat less than that of the previous year, through the needs of other Christian work to which many of its members have been drafted off, there has been no diminution, but rather increase, in the amount of work done, both in the open-air, in in-door services, and in deputation work. The work of the "Rescue Wing" has also been carried on with vigour and with encouraging success. Those engaged in it feel that no Christian work produces happier results for the energy expended than does theirs, and they say there is room for many more workers.

Allusion is also made to the important forward movement in the inauguration of under Mr. John Anderson. That this work has not been begun a day too soon, the fact that 357 enrolled themselves in the evening class abundantly testifies. Its most promising commencement calls for great thankfulness to God, and earnest and sustained prayer for its prosperity; for it is impossible to estimate the blessing to, and the enlargement of, the whole evangelistic work that may be reasonably expected to come through its instrumentality.

During the year just closed the large number of 251 young women, ranging from fifteen years upwards, have been sheltered for a brief period in the Girls' Home. Many of these have been entirely friendless, or have had friends so utterly regardless of their welfare as not to deserve the name. Others have been out of work, in actual want, and in danger of taking that fatal step which, in too many cases, presents itself as their only resource, but which proves the ruin of both body and soul. Others, again, have been strangers in the city—girls who have run away from home; domestic servants travelling from one part of the country to another; homeless wanderers picked up at the free breakfast on the Sabbath mornings; young women from the police-courts, the prison, and, in some instances, the streets—in short, gathered from that apparently hopeless, and yet singularly hopeful, class who are standing on the dividing-line between respectable poverty and blank self-abandonment and despair.

There is besides all this a special carrying on orphan homes at Saltcoats and a holiday scheme. The amazingly rapid growth of the Fresh-air Fortnight scheme, during the eight years of its existence, from the thirty-two in 1885 to the 6131 last year, makes one wonder "whereunto this will grow." But it is safe to predict that grow it will, for no scheme has so commended itself to all classes of the community. The lantern mission, as it is termed, which, during the winter solstice, takes the place of the fresh-air work, has been vigorously prosecuted this winter. The Poor Children's Sabbath Dinner, which for many years has been the largest Lord's-day gathering in the city, has again taxed the energies of its band of enthusiastic workers, who find their chief joy in ministering to neglected little ones. During the past nineteen years 10,810 poor children have been helped to a better way of living through the visitation of these workers and the friendly relations of the Tent Hall Inquiry Committee with the various charities of the city. In the four Day Refuges 882 of the most neglected and hungry children have been fed and clothed during the year.

Those interested in this very remarkable work will doubtless secure copies of the informative report by writing to the secretary, Mr. J. B. Miller, Christian Institute, 70, Bothwell Street, Glasgow.

THE CHILD is the child of the State, of its country, of humanity, as well as the child of the father and mother unto whose care it is God-given.—Phillips Brooks.

SCHOOLWORK is not the mere teaching of a book; it is not the mere collecting of children for an agreeable hour. It is a moral and spiritual force; a fragrance that gladdens; a breath that gives health; a touch that quickens into life; it is a Divine atmosphere in which young souls thrive.

THE HAPPY VALLEY, LLANDUDNO.

Our sea-coasts cannot furnish a more interesting scene than at the "happy valley" on occasion of the children's services. A visitor describes what he saw on a recent Sunday afternoon. The place is a natural amphitheatre, a deep-curved recess in the Great Orme's Head opening on a grand sea view. As if on constructed seats hundreds of people occupied the rocky strata jutting out from the grass and yellow gorse, looking down on the verdant level arena, shut in by the semi-circle of hills and the sea.

The centre was marked off for the children. Boys on one side and girls on the other were seated on the warm, dry turf, in their bright Sunday dresses, surrounded on all sides by crowds of adults, who numbered some two thousand, while the children amounted to about five hundred. By word of command the children stood up and sang, then sat down again on the grass, constant change of attitude keeping them attentive and interested. Singing was alternated by brief, practical talks, capable of being "understanded of the people" little and big. Meetings were announced for every day, with afternoon teas to boys and girls on the Orme's Head. A sheet was held at its corners by four young men, into which many contributions were thrown for foreign and general work of the Children's Special Service Mission by departing visitors.

When the children's meeting was over an open-air preaching service was held on the beach. Dr. Newman Hall said he was reminded that nearly fifty years ago, and very frequently since, he had preached on the same spot. He spoke of Christ's open-air preaching, and took for his subject the great parable of the sower, which Christ delivered on the shore of the Sea of Galilee.

Illustrative of the blessings which often attend open-air services, he referred to one held at sunrise on the top of Snowdon many years ago. Intending to sleep in the hut there, he had mounted half-way when drenching rain obliged him to descend; but, sunshine returning, he seemed compelled to go back, and once more climbed the steep. As he lay on the shelf-like bed he was awakened by the beautiful anthems of Welsh quarrymen coming up for the specially clear view they confidently expected. The speaker had perched himself on the top of the cairn that he might enjoy the scene in solitude; but being recognised he was urged to descend. He refused to preach—God was speaking in that memorable sunrise—but a hymn was sung, and he offered prayer on that high altar of Nature's God. All seemed deeply impressed with the real presence of the Hearer of Prayer. About one hundred Welsh people were there, and about twenty English.

Two years after, at Penzance, he was accosted by a young man, who said, "I was on Snowdon—then ungodly. I there gave myself to Christ, and am a Sunday-school teacher." A year or two afterwards the preacher was walking near Snowdon, when a man, driving a cart laden with cheeses and a live pig, pulled up and offered him a lift, which he accepted. He sat beside the driver, who had recognised him, and said, "That service on Snowdon was the beginning of a revival in the churches round, and fifty of the people were converted at that service." The preacher said that he had given no address, he only offered prayer; to which the driver replied, "Yes, sir, and they were Welsh-speaking people and did not understand a word you said." The speaker added that he could repeat this fact without ostentation, for the work was so evidently not his own, but God's only.

The Savoy Alps.

Through the kindness of Mr. John Cory, a large number of Bibles and Testaments have been distributed in the parish of Bessans, high among the mountains and glaciers of Savoy. An excellent collection of French literature has also been placed in the hands of the schoolmaster, who during the winter lent the volumes to the villagers, by whom they were much appreciated.

In the same neighbourhood, and through the kindness of the same gentleman, Bibles have also been placed in the Refuges on Mont Cenis. The long winter of seven months, during which it is impossible for women and children to venture out, makes the possession of the Book a great boon. Some good fruit is already known of in Bessans. E. WORK IN WEST AFRICA.

The following extracts are from a letter by Rev. D. F. Wilberforce, a Christian African chief on the West Coast of Africa, to the secretary of the Freedmen's Missions Aid Society, 18, Adam-street, Strand, W.C. The letter is dated Danville, Impereh, July 4:—

"When I returned from America in 1878, I visited my relatives in this Impereh territory. I found that my people kept no Sabbath, worshipped no God, except the ant-hills that were supposed to represent the spirits of their dead ancestors. I determined then to do something for my people, but I felt at the time that my inexperience necessitated my stay at Shaingay, Sherboro'; and then I felt I could better serve my people at that time by continuing in the work I was then engaged in.

"I obtained from my people the site of my late grandfather's town, and in 1881 erected a mission house with the first money earned. When the house was completed, some friend in America, hearing of my enterprise, promised a small amount to enable me to employ a teacher. . . . I have started a few coffee trees, so that in a few years to come we will be able to get some money from coffee to help on the work. The first house erected was made with the native material, hence did not last long. I began the erection of another more substantial house of stone, which I obtained on the spot. The house is not quite completed. If you and my good friends in England will send me fifty pounds, it will enable me to complete the house, and so afford accommodation for my family and a home for the girls we expect to educate. I make this as a special and personal request.

"Now with regard to my plan. My object has been all along to make this an educational centre, industrial and literary. West African educational institutions have had one great fault in their educational system. Boys have been taken into mission schools, and girls, too, kept as wards of missions till about of age, and then sent out with a good education to make them good teachers or preachers. But as God chooses his workers, and all men do not feel called upon to be teachers or preachers, many have not succeeded, to the discouragement of their teachers and benefactors.

"My idea is, while the boy is going through school he should take, as a part of his course, apprenticeship in some trade or handicraft, so that when he goes out of school he will not be the dependent creature he sometimes turns out to be, because he has not a post as clerk or some other employment which only requires headwork. We in Africa, to be made whole men, need to have head, hand, and heart educated.

"Manufacturers of tools might be asked to give sets of tools. We pay here 5d. and 6d. per pound for rough nails; our boys can learn to make nails as good, for the use of the mission and to sell. A set of tools for a tin shop would be of benefit, and a few trowels for stonework. I believe this to be the kind of education we need; I write as an African—from an African's view of things.

"As to school-houses, for the present, one school is all we need in connection with my work. A good home for boys, to accommodate a goodly number (the girls will live with us) taken from various tribes and sections of country, is my idea. The education of children of different tribal relations in the same school under the same religious influences will help in the future to bring about a change of feeling between people of different tribes, and so insure peace and goodwill.

"A house for boys can be built for a small sum—built of sticks and clay, but covered with corrugated iron, will give us a house that will last many years. £25 to £40 would build and furnish such a house. We need a good school-house here; I can build one, one story high, for £200. I give these figures because you ask for them, but we will have to build as we have money."

THE REPORT OF THE EPSOM COLLEGE, just issued, explains, with reference to the allowance of beer to the boys (to which we called attention some time ago) that "beer is given in all public schools. The beverage provided at the College is good and wholesome; only about 40 per cent. of the boys drink it, and it is thought advisable not to withdraw it compulsorily, but to leave the question to the discretion of parents."

THE UNIVERSITIES CAMP.

As a friend of the officer in command, Major Liebenrood, I had the privilege this year of paying two short visits to the camp at Bishopstone, near Seaford. The idea, I believe, originated with two Cambridge men, Revs. C. H. Clissold and S. Power. It is distinctly a work for Christian ends. The dozen or more officers (including a doctor and chaplain)—Christian men mostly from our Universities, each of whom is in command of a tent—make it their aim to influence the boys for spiritual good. Many of the lads themselves are decided Christians, and so are a help to others. The whole thing is carried out on the lines of military discipline.

A certain number were told off each day for orderly duty to wait on the rest, a duty ably and willingly performed. Between meals, parties are made up for boating, bathing, fishing, cycling, cricket, etc. In the morning there is a short quiet time for prayer and Bible reading. In the evening all mustered at eight in the large tent, and an hour was given up to music. Amongst the hundred assembled, there was considerable musical talent.

At nine, cocoa and biscuits were handed round; after that came a serious time, when one and another of the officers would give a straight talk, calculated to win for Christ those who were unconverted, and to help on their way those who had already started. After this, in their respective tents, the officers had another opportunity for a few words and prayer, before turning in for the night. Lights were put out at 10.15, pickets were out all night on watches of two hours each, the boys being very eager to volunteer their services. The idea of the gathering is to show these young fellows that to be a soldier of Christ is a manly as well as a happy course of life, demanding a conflict and endurance, yet affording true happiness now as well as a sure hope of glory hereafter.

I found the chaplain, Rev. E. B. Bradley, a genial and muscular Christian, able to set a good example at cricket as well as in the Christian life; and it was pleasant to see amongst the officers one who rowed in the Cambridge University eight this year. Indeed, one could not wish to meet a nicer set of friends than the officers there assembled. I shall not readily forget the two prayer meetings that I had the privilege of attending, when, summoned by bugle call, the officers met in Major Liebenrood's tent, and, one after another, offered up earnest prayer to God for his blessing on the effort.

Two other camps were held at the same time, one at Beaumaris and one on the Yorkshire coast. These camps are self-supporting, each individual paying his subscription to the expenses fund, and any surplus is handed over to some charity for the young. Should anyone interested in boys desire further information it will be supplied on application to Rev. S. Power, 57, Jeffreys-road, South Lambeth, London, S.W. VISITOR.

THE CONNELLAN MISSION.

The report of this Mission amongst Roman Catholics states that three agencies are employed to open the minds of Irish Roman Catholics to pure Christianity. In the first place, The Catholic was established in January, 1891, and has since steadily grown in public favour. The Editor, as an ex-priest of the Roman Church, can pick out the weak points in the enemy's armour with a success which no person ignorant of the inner workings of that Church could reasonably hope for. In the second place, Gospel meetings have been held. The Dublin meetings have been conducted during the winters of 1892-3 in the Central Hall, Westmoreland-street. Addresses were delivered by Rev. T. Connellan, by his brother, and by other converted Roman Catholics. Generally speaking, the hall is crowded, more than ninety per cent. of the audience being Roman Catholics, and most gratifying results have followed. Similar meetings have been addressed up and down Ireland, and in many of the cities and towns of England and Scotland. In the third place, Mr. Connellan has gradually drawn around him a band of devoted converts from Rome, who, having tasted for themselves how sweet the Lord is, hunger and thirst to bring the glad tidings of salvation home to their Roman Catholic brothers and sisters. These employ their leisure moments in visiting among Roman Catholics, speaking to them of the Saviour and his perfect atonement, and trying to gather them in to the Central Hall meetings. The secretary is Mr. Joseph Connellan, 18, Bachelor's Walk, Dublin.

NOTES FROM NEW ZEALAND.

Signs are not wanting of an abundant blessing resulting from the visit of Rev. G. C. Grubb and his party to this colony. In Wellington two of God's servants set apart Friday night to wait on God in prayer for the young men of their city, and continued thirteen months without seeing a single answer. After Mr. Grubb's visit this little meeting gave place to a united gathering, where God's servants of all denominations meet each week to pray for a revival. During the Christmas holidays one of the young men paid a short visit to Dunedin, and saw God's work among young men there. During Mr. Grubb's mission in that city, Mr. Millard, one of the mission party, had called a meeting and suggested that the young men begin open-air work for Christ. A mid-day prayer meeting was started, with an attendance of fifty; and a young men's mission organised, with a membership of forty-five; and open-air work was commenced, followed by an after meeting in the Y.W.C.A. Hall. God richly owned and blessed the work; many were converted, especially church-goers, who attended these meetings after their own services.

The young men were invited to hold a mission at Port Chalmers, which resulted in a number of conversions, nineteen young persons joining one church. Missions were then held in many of the surrounding districts, and in each case good results followed. The active membership has grown to sixty, and God's work is carried on with unflagging zeal.

The sight of this work deeply stirred one young worker, and he returned to Wellington with a heart on fire for Christ, determined to organise a mission band. God blessed his efforts, and a few young men have formed themselves into a band to labour for God. Open-air meetings are held, and services conducted in the Mission Hall, scarcely a service passing without some soul being won for Christ. God has laid the Spirit of prayer upon these young workers, and has led them to wait on Him at an early morning prayer meeting; rising by candle light on the cold wintry mornings, they meet at 6 o'clock in the hall and cry to God for a revival, especially among the young men. The lasses at the Salvation Army garrison hearing of this have started a similar meeting in their barracks. Already they are praising God that there is "the sound of abundance of rain."

In other parts of the colony God is raising up similar bands to work for Him. Glad news has come of a revival in the Native College at Te Aute, Napier, where the boys seem on fire for Christ, and much blessing has followed the Mission of Messrs. Klein and Edwards in Gisborne. During the past three years God's people have been crying for revival, and throughout this colony the same prayer is continually ascending.

Seamen's Rest, Marseilles.

MR. C. E. FAITHFULL issues an occasional paper, "Here and There," giving notes of the work at Marseilles, and illustrating the daily opportunities of service among seamen of all nations coming to the Rest. The formation of the first French Seamen's Temperance Society is reported, and bright testimonies borne to the power of the Gospel.

June 19.—Had a good word with a petty officer of the squadron, who accepted a New Testament with evident pleasure, though he refused at first. 25.—Had a peculiarly interesting time at the hospital with seamen of six different nationalities; but was pained that the foreigners did not receive more care. The meeting this evening was very good; four men arrived who had been away for ten months; they gave a sad account of the loss of four of their shipmates by yellow fever. 27.—There were five different nationalities at the meeting this evening; still all heard, in language they could understand, of the "wonderful works of God." July 4th.—M— who seems near salvation, and has long interested us, took the pledge to-night; he is undoubtedly convinced of sin, but not yet converted; as his line of steamers come and go regularly, we often see him. Many who are similarly situated form quite a band of habitual attendants.

During these last four months 8323 visits have been paid to the Rest, divided according to nationality, as follows: French, 6486; English or American, 348; Scandinavian, 454; German, 290; Belgian or Dutch, 126; Italian or Greek, 293; Spaniard or Portuguese, 202; Russian, 43; Swiss, 81.

EASTERN TURKEY.

The twenty-ninth annual meeting of our Eastern Turkey Mission was lately held in the city of Bitlis, there being present four delegates from Mardin, three each from Erzeroum and Van, or, including children and our own mission circle here, twenty-five in all. Think of how much must be crowded into these eleven days of business and diversion, if it were to comport at all with life in civilised Christian lands where lectures, concerts, conferences, etc., pursue society-lovers and literary connoisseurs almost ad nauseam.

Bitlis is a unique old town of an early generation, having a population about 35,000, two-thirds of whom are Moslem, but nearly all of the Kourdish race, while the remainder are Gregorian and Assyrian Armenians, Protestants, and a mere sprinkling of Roman Catholics. Little change has probably taken place in this old town hidden away among the Taurus mountains, save that it may have decreased in size, since the time when Moslem devotees thronged this pass in their yearly Hegira towards Mecca, most of them coming on from Persia, though improvement in navigation of late years draws them round by Trebizond now.

If we cannot boast of built roads, nor of much that is modern, save the crudest style of humanity, still we have quite a leafy bower about us in the gardens that are abundantly supplied with pretty good water.

The condition of the times and country in which we live rather militates against the propriety of having a meeting this year; and yet, on many accounts, such coming together was more important than ordinary times. What is to be the outcome of present environments? How are we to do anything like aggressive work? Are we to change some of our methods, or what is to be done on the premises, are becoming serious questions. Poverty, oppression, and misrule are so pressing the people to the wall that ordinary principles of self-support cannot be put in force, while our Society is tiring of carrying such heavy burdens for the work of the land for now upwards of fifty years.

This is a land rich in natural resources, but, as some of the people often remark to us, "It wants a master who will care for its highest interests." The "Sultan of Sultans" who sits on the Bosphorus has no idea of the terrible state many of his possessions are in, through this part of his dominions, or he would see that something is done at once. In parts of our Vilayet anarchy largely prevails, so that our Vali pasha is forced to take the field, in hopes of securing order. In two provinces scores of lives have been sacrificed in fights, while plunder and outrage, murder and oppression, are of frequent occurrence. Oh, for justice and good government! Only that our pasha is wide awake to the situation, and prompt in action, we fear a worse state of things would result. Gospel Worker.

The Belleville Mission in Paris.

Some years have passed since I spent a week in the midst of the varied and most important works which have, under the direction of Miss de Broen, introduced a measure of light and spiritual blessing into a locality which has always been proverbially seditious and irreligious. A short visit to Belleville has again served to confirm my convictions with respect to the work. The income of the Mission, however, has fallen off to such an extent that the most prominent part of it—the Medical Mission—has been suspended for a year. But the whole apparatus is there and in order, and with adequate means it would at once be put in motion.

At this time of the year, except the direct evangelistic work at the Iron-room, there is not much going on. The monthly meeting of Christians, which takes place at the Orphanage, is maintained, and at this I had the pleasure of being present. Two expositions and addresses were given by the veteran evangelist, M. Vanderbaken. I spoke briefly to the assemblage. The rest of the time was occupied by singing hymns and a succession of fervent and devout prayers from both male and female members. I had expressed the hope that the Medical Mission might be restored. They caught at this, as if it afforded an assurance that this would take place. It was touching to hear some of them pray, as if this their great desire would be attained: speaking of it as the centre to which they had been drawn by God, and where they had found health for their bodies and health for their souls.—Yours truly,

Paris, August. (Rev.) A. A. Isaacs.

FOR HOME AND FATHERLAND.

The greatest evil that confronts the American people is the saloon power. It controls municipal and national aims, and its influence is spreading vice and immorality throughout the land. In this nation the women have long since been asking for a hearing in the affairs of state and national import, only to hear that the men were able to guide their own affairs. The agitation has at last become of such importance that they must be heard, and ere long heeded, for every element of decency demands it.

Equal rights are ensigns of true civilisation; woman is no longer considered the inferior of man, she stands as his equal. She is perfectly intelligent, and full of powers that cannot be questioned, powers that yield a blessed influence among men. Every illiterate male citizen in the United States has the power to cast his ballot, while the women of the country are compelled to withstand the outcome of their vote.

Woman is grandly coming into the front ranks in America; before another decade passes us into another century, she will have been casting her ballot for a number of years, provided rot and rumism do not control. At the next national convention of one of the great political parties this important matter will receive attention; in the meantime the women are making a grand campaign that is receiving the plaudit of great and good men. When once the ballot is in their hands the saloon power will cease, and the nation will be nearer its Christ. All thinking people know that the only way to stop vice, immorality, and crime is to stop the cause, not to punish the effect. When the women vote, a great percentage of crime will cease, and purity will arise from the bed of subjection. Mothers are crying for help; wives are heart-broken enough; the Gospel implores all to live a pure life; why not bring about that purity?

TRACT DISTRIBUTION IN CHINA.

Dear Sir,—I have returned from a journey in the province of Kwang-si, one of the two provinces in China in which missionaries have, as yet, been unable to get a permanent footing. The people in many places still entertain strong anti-foreign feelings, and the appearance of the "foreign devil" is a good opportunity for displaying the same. Once or twice we were reluctantly obliged to leave off selling books and retire to the boat on which we were travelling, owing to the opposition of some unruly ones in the crowds, who had made up their minds to give us all the trouble they could and when other means failed resorted to the usual one of stone-throwing. On the other hand, we found places where the people were quiet and friendly, and readily bought books.

I was accompanied by Mr. Reeves, of the International Missionary Alliance, who hopes to begin work in the province in a few months, by travelling on the river and visiting different places for longer or shorter periods, as the people are willing to listen to the Gospel. No doubt, in time, some place will be found where a mission centre can be established. Will your readers pray for this province especially, that it may be thrown open to the preaching of the Gospel and that labourers may be sent forth to take possession for the Master?

I cannot bring forward any new pleas as to the value of tract distribution, nor are they needed, for every Christian worker, whether at home or abroad, must be aware of its value in aggressive Christian efforts. The National Bible Society of Scotland has agents and native colporteurs in nearly every province of China continually engaged in circulating the Word of God, and having permission also to circulate tracts. As, however, no funds contributed for Bible circulation can be expended in the purchase of tracts, we must depend for the latter upon other sources. Surely there are some of the Lord's stewards who will gladly avail themselves of such opportunity for evangelising, by means of books and tracts, the "millions" of China who are yet "without Christ and without hope." Our secretary is Mr. W. J. Slowan, 224, West George-street, Glasgow.—Yours in the Master's service,

Frederick R. Johnson.

Dear Sir,—I have just returned from a delightful holiday tour in Morocco; but my visit to that mysterious land has been much more than a holiday: it has been a revelation of a life and of a need of which the mass of our fellow Christians have not the slightest conception. I ask permission to commend to the prayers and practical help of your readers the work of the North Africa Mission, whose operations I have been quietly studying during the past few weeks. It has been an inspiration to meet with such self-denying workers as Mr. Patrick or Dr. Jerry and the lady missionaries who incessantly serve their Master in this dark country. Until quite recently, North Africa, which is enveloped in Mohammedan darkness (a darkness almost denser than that of heathenism, if that is possible), has been neglected. The "North Africa Mission" has eighty workers in the field, but what are these for the evangelization of this immense territory? Hundreds of workers are needed, and money is needed for their work.

To my intense sorrow I found that the Tangier Hospital had been closed for five weeks for lack of funds. Over 500 people were turned away from the doors, some of whom had travelled two, three, and four days' journey. Surely God's stewards at home will not allow this shame to be repeated. Nearly 6000 out-patients received advice and medicine last year; £100 per annum is needed for drugs alone.

Mr. Patrick has been much encouraged in his work among the Spaniards. The priests are at their old work of persecution, and things have been rendered difficult, but, despite all, the work is being blessed. Mr. Patrick wants to open missions at Ceuta and Melilla among the Spaniards, for whom, at present, nothing is being done. Will your readers earnestly pray for our friends the missionaries, and any who are disposed to help may send to Mr. Glenny, Linton-road, Barking, Essex, the hon. secretary.—Yours faithfully,

Lewisham. F. C. Spurr.

Bible and Colportage Society of Ireland.

Notwithstanding political unrest, the work of this Society goes on steadily, the agents keeping aloof from all parties, and devoting themselves to their missionary labours. The colporteurs now number 25, who report 97,886 families visited, 2,637 Bibles sold, 2,072 Testaments, 1,440 Douay Testaments, 48,214 books, 107,987 total number of sales, and 38,648 tracts distributed; while, in addition, at the Derry Depot 11,000 Bibles and Testaments and 282,457 books have been sold. Full details may be had of the secretary, Rev. Thomas Lyle, Rosevale, Knock, Belfast.

From the many delightful extracts and incidents given in the new report of the Society we select the following:—"I have," writes a colporteur, "had a good many interesting cases. A young man who was much given to drink used to leave his home and wander through the country, working for a few days here and there, and then drinking what he had earned and coming home every now and then almost in rags. Happened to come in this state shortly after I came here, I got into conversation with him on several occasions about his soul, with the result that he has come out on the Lord's side and been consistent for the last nine months, giving every confidence that he is really united to Christ. Other two young men who professed to embrace Christ as their Saviour, from several conversations I had with them, have also given evidence of the genuineness of their conversion by their changed life and walk. A married young man and his wife, on whom I have been in the habit of calling, and who are Roman Catholics, have regularly bought good books and read them, and they have got a Bible and read it constantly for themselves. I really believe that they are trusting in Jesus as their Saviour, and have passed from death unto life. I know they hardly ever go to chapel.

"I have access to a good many Roman Catholic houses, and have never been harshly treated, although in many cases I have been politely turned away without getting into their houses. I feel sure that by using tact and care there are few Catholic houses but could be opened to us. Looking back over the past years, I could give the names and addresses of nearly twenty Roman Catholics who gave up Romanism and embraced Christ through the instrumentality, under God, of your colporteur."

NEVER FORGET that temperaments vary just as much at five years of age as they do at fifty. The shy child is crushed by what merely amuses the bolder; and the wound is not easily healed.

CHICAGO NOTES.

From a Correspondent.

You will be pleased to hear some inside news from this seething world-centre of attraction. If ever in the history of this great metropolis there were giant wrongs and struggles for the right, it is just now.

This morning a report comes through the papers that fully one thousand saloons have been forced to suspend owing to the hard times. Mr. Moody remarked the other day that the Lord may be taking this very way to show us into a better life, even if we have to live on a crust and dig for daily food, in order to break the rum power. And he shouted with all his might, "Let it come!"

The Methodists held a big camp meeting at old Des Plaines Camp Ground; Mr. Moody and Rev. John McNeill were specially invited, and given the best hours. The crowd was great, the day fine, and the celebrated evangelists in their best spirits. Mr. McNeill had never been to a Methodist camp meeting before in his life, and things seemed a little strange, but for tent service he had a special liking. The singing was splendid, and the volleys of responses from the warm-hearted worshippers were quite inspiring. Our Scottish brother had great liberty, and carried the hearts of his vast audience with him in his splendid Gospel sermons. Mr. Moody, so well known to us here, did us all good, and pressed the call for decision in receiving Christ with good results.

The second encampment of the North-Western Branch of the Salvation Army closed last night at Lake Bluff. It was a wonderful gathering and full of enthusiasm. About 250 of the Army were present. It took one thousand dollars to meet the expenses. This was contributed by the large audiences. On the last Sabbath fifty professed conversions were reported.

Some good will come out of the management of the World's Fair. The Sunday question is practically closed, for exhibitors have pulled down the curtains of their exhibits, and the total attendance is so small as to be far below the actual cost of continuing open on the Lord's Day. It is estimated that 40,000 people attend the special meetings held by Mr. Moody and his helpers on the Sabbath, and even some of the hotels have services once during that day. A great circus announced three attractions, two for pay, and one, at 2 p.m., free, conducted by Mr. Moody. The morning and night attractions failed; but 5000 people could not get in to hear the evangelist at 2 p.m. Verily, a tide is coming in for the better.

We look for a good outcome from the Religious Congress about to assemble. All the great religious bodies will be represented, and ample rooms have been provided, where, free of charge, anyone can go in and hear the presentation of the theories for the salvation of man.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOUR NOTES.

The Christian Band at Pembroke Chapel, Clifton, has been converted into a C.E. Society.

The Christian Endeavour Societies continue to increase in this country. Last week the 700th branch was formed.

The C.E. movement makes good progress in Natal, and at Pietermaritzburg the societies are flourishing and active.

In a Philadelphia Church the C.E. Society has undertaken to carry on the Congregational week evening prayer meeting during the summer season.

The Independent of August 17 gives portraits of the founder and officers (American) of the Y.P.S.C.E., and a detailed account of the movement generally.

Dr. Reuen Thomas has a very high opinion of the C.E. movement. In a note received from him he gives his opinion thus:—"The C.E. movement has done great good in bringing into more intimate Christian relations the young people of our congregations, in giving them suitable opportunity for expressing their thought and feeling, and of co-operating together in various organised ways tending to promote Christian growth and a more active Christian life."

Christian Endeavour is gaining ground in New Zealand, where there are forty societies with 1000 members. The Auckland Union, containing fourteen societies and 580 members, has recently held a united Convention in the Tabernacle. In Wellington there are only four societies. After much prayer a union was formed, and at the first annual consecration meeting held last Sunday, an abundant answer to prayers was realised. There was not sufficient time for all who desired to give their testimonies to rise when the hour for closing arrived.

THE Y.M.C.A.

Mr. A. K. Dearden, of Hull, was introduced as general secretary of South Shields Y.M.C.A. at a large meeting of members held on Monday week.

The Bayswater Association has been going in thoroughly for open-air work, and lately most excellent services have been held at a busy corner.

The second holiday excursion for this year, organised by the Derby Y.M.C.A., was attended by about sixty-four members and friends, who had an enjoyable trip to Howesford.

Through the kindness of the president, Mr. W. S. Oakden, the members and associates of the Burton-on-Trent Y.M.C.A. had a very enjoyable garden party at "Stanton," at the residence of Mr. Lewis Barber, an ex-president of the Association.

Mr. W. A. Davidson is "holding the fort" at the Cornhill Association, E.C., while Mr. Hughman, the secretary, is absent on holiday. Mr. C. A. Furse, of the Camden Town branch, is to take the place of the late Captain Warren at the Cornhill Association as honorary co-secretary. Mr. Furse has been holding services at Whitby with much success.

The first Y.M.C.A. ever started in Brazil has just been organised in Rio de Janeiro by Mr. Myrom Clark, who has been sent out for this work by the Y.M.C.A. of the U.S.A. The members so far are almost wholly drawn from the Brazilian churches. The Association, which has every promise of success, has already secured good rooms in the Rua da Assemblea, No. 96.

An urgent plea, signed by Dr. Nevius and other well-known missionaries, has been issued for some volunteer to take up special work on Y.M.C.A. lines for business men (natives) in Chefoo, where, as an open port, temptations to sin are great, and on the other hand considerable facilities for service exist. Mr. J. A. Stooke, C.I.M., Chefoo, North China, will be glad to give information on the subject.

The Association at Leamington Spa has had much help and encouragement in open-air work in the villages around. Large and appreciative audiences have assembled, and have pressed the band to come again. On Lord's days excellent meetings are held in the Y.M.C.A. rooms, and though Satan has tried to raise an opposition it has graciously been turned to good. The other work of the Association goes on steadily.

On Sunday week at the close of the afternoon Bible class lesson an interesting ceremony took place at the Cheltenham Association rooms. Mr. F. W. J. Butler, a hard-working member of the Association, was leaving, to enter the Pastor's College, and the opportunity was embraced to testify to Mr. Butler the esteem in which he is held. The general secretary, Mr. Masters, on behalf of the class, wished Mr. Butler "God speed."

Between fifty and sixty members and friends of the Bradford Association were present at a special conference which was held on Monday week, to consider the affairs of the organisation. The treasurer, Mr. Edmund Lee, said that there was at present a debt owing of about £200. Mr. Edward Priestman, president, said that if there were any suggestion that the Association was doing so little good that it ought to be abandoned it would be a great discredit to the town.

At Poona, the missionaries arranged for a series of lectures in English for educated natives in the Anandodbhava Theatre on the Sunday evenings in July. These meetings attracted much attention, and were attended by about 400 persons. Mr. Robert Wilder, Revs. J. F. Gardiner, Bombay, J. Terrance, Poona, J. E. Robinson, Poona, and Robert McCann gave lectures. On Sunday, July 23rd, Mr. McCann spoke on "Young Manhood, its Needs and Aspirations." Seldom has he addressed a more attentive and interested audience; when reference was made to the ravages of strong drink at home, and the advisability of their remaining total abstainers, it drew forth loud applause.

Armenian Prisoners in Turkey.

The following is from the Times Parliamentary report of Monday evening's proceedings:—

Sir R. Temple asked the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether any representations could be made to the Porte in the cases of the Pastor of Gemerek, sentenced to imprisonment, and believed to bear a high character, also of Dikran Gulbankian, a student awaiting trial at Angora; and whether the Sultan's clemency could be solicited on behalf of several graduates of the Marsovan College, who were understood to have arrived at Constantinople, before they were scattered and sent to distant prisons.

Sir E. Grey: The sentence on the first-named prisoner has been reduced already from fifteen years' penal servitude to six years' detention in a fortress. Inquiry will be made as to Dikran Gulbankian. Representations on behalf of some of the prisoners already sentenced have been made to the Porte. Further efforts must depend upon subsequent information.

SWINDON EVANGELISTIC MISSION.

This work was commenced thirteen years ago as a branch of the Evangelistic Mission, and has, throughout the succeeding years, been greatly prospered of God. The hall, which seats some six hundred persons, is full on Sundays, and often crowded. The Sunday School numbers three hundred children, and the Bible-classes for young men and women are well-attended and thoroughly appreciated. A large proportion of those attending the services are connected with the Great Western Railway, particularly those in the carriage factories, where ten thousand men and boys are employed in the manufacture of the rolling stock.

The time has come when the Director of the Mission, Mr. C. Russell Hurditch, has decided that the work must no longer be dependent for support in the same measure as heretofore upon the general funds of the Evangelistic Mission, and required such change to be made as would render it locally self-supporting. This led to much prayer and conference on the part of the principal workers at Central Hall, with the result that it was determined to act on the suggestion made by the Director, and endeavour to raise a fund for the purchase of premises, and invest it in the names of three local trustees, in order to continue the work on the same unsectarian evangelistic lines as hitherto.

The property, which is freehold, with the furniture, cost over £1,200; and the Director offered the local committee the option of purchase for £900, including the existing mortgage of £550, with a proviso that if subsequently sold by the trustees, the balance of £300, or such sum beyond the £900 as it may realise up to the amount of £1,200, should be paid over to the London Evangelistic Mission. The present market value is in excess of this, as the central position it occupies has been greatly improved since the Mission was commenced, the ground opposite having been cleared, and elegant municipal and other buildings erected thereon.

The work is in every sense important and the workers thoroughly united, and they could not endure the thought of its being discontinued. The proof of this is found in that those connected with the hall, who are only working people (nearly all with very small wages), have promised £150 towards the amount required, and have undertaken the responsibility of meeting the working expenses, which average about £4 10s. per week. Mr. Wm. Brown, who has for eighteen years been associated with Mr. Hurditch in evangelistic work, and has had the oversight at Swindon for the past two years, has consented to continue his superintendence of the Mission. He may be addressed: Salopia, Victoria-road, Swindon.

A Unique Prayer Meeting.

Mr. Robert M'Cann writes from Poona: One of the most remarkable features of religious life in this city of Poona is the weekly union prayer-meeting. It is almost half-a-century since it was established, and yet it shows no signs of decay with its advancing age, but is as bright, cheerful, and well attended as in the days of its early youth. The Free Church of Scotland missionaries, who were the pioneers in mission work here, commenced the meetings, and after some years it gradually assumed its present character, which is most thoroughly cosmopolitan and interdenominational. These missionaries are still responsible for the arrangements, and the meetings are held in their neat little church on Thursday evenings. The meetings are conducted in turn by missionaries and others of the various churches; a short address being given, and much of the hour spent in prayer and praise.

One Thursday evening in July the meeting was conducted by Rev. D. O. Fox, of the American Methodist Episcopal Mission; there were about seventy persons present. The following analysis will show the thoroughly representative character of the gathering: there were missionaries from the Church of England C.M.S.; Wesleyan, Methodist Episcopal, Free Church of Scotland, Established Church of Scotland, Irish Presbyterian, Canadian Presbyterian, Congregational, Brethren Churches, also Young Men's Christian Association, Zenana and Medical Missionaries. No less varied were the professions; three colonels, captain, lieutenant, and a large number of soldiers; city magistrate, head of Archæological Department, military chaplains, missionaries, native pastors, native catechists, teachers, band of orphan girls, many children and native Christians. Even the nationalities were numerous: of British, English, Irish and Scotch, of Americans, Canadians, and citizens of the United States; Indians, Eurasians, Hindus, and Parsees; Australians, and a Somali from Africa. Such a union, in the face of the powerful Brahmin element here, cannot be without a marked influence. In the native Church no less cordial is the feeling in favour of union amongst the members of the various branches of the Indian Christian Churches.

"A PERFECTIONIST SNARE."

Dear Sir,—Mr. Millar, in his reply to my letter of a few weeks ago, unintentionally does me injustice in two points. In the first place, he takes it hardly that I should, as he says, "compare honoured servants of God with Jesuits." I did nothing of the kind. I suggested a resemblance (which I did not emphasise) between a doctrine held by Mr. Thomas Cook and by others and a Jesuitical doctrine, and I did so as a warning to my brethren, to whom I felt sure Jesuitism was as repugnant as it is to me. I also referred to Dr. Bowman Stephenson's strongly antinomian praise of Jesuits, as illustrating another phase of the same dangerous tendency of thought. Can this be fairly called "comparing honoured servants of God with Jesuits"?

Mr. Millar also objects to my employing the term "perfectionist," as though it were a term of opprobrium. But, in the first place, I had no idea that any of those who think with Mr. Cook would resent the title "perfectionist"; and, in the second place, I thought that the term was fairly applicable to a man who had written a pamphlet to show that Christians can, and actually do, attain perfection in this life. I gladly embrace this opportunity of saying that Mr. Cook is one whom I esteem very highly in love for his work's sake.

I am surprised that Mr. Millar should think the cases of the widow woman and the Corinthian collection at all relevant to the question. The widow woman's achievement was precisely what her intention was, namely, the giving of her whole substance. Therefore, when Mr. Millar asks, "Did this more" (for she cast in more than any of the rich men) "consist in intention or achievement?" the answer is that it consisted in both. Achievement it was, undoubtedly; for she gave her whole living, which none of the rich men did. The principle involved in 2 Cor. viii. 12 is identically the same.

The sincere aim in everything to please God (which according to Mr. Cook, is "the sum and substance of Christian perfection") is not enough; there must be the actual pleasing God. When Saul of Tarsus persecuted the saints, he had the sincere aim to please God ("I verily thought with myself that I ought to do many things contrary to the name of Jesus of Nazareth"); but he afterwards condemned himself as the chief of sinners for this very conduct. Those who killed the disciples, according to our Lord's own words, thought that they did God service; yet it was the devil's service they did. Mr. Millar notices neither of these cases, though I mentioned both in my letter. Is a Christian perfect because his conduct satisfies a test which the conduct of Saul the persecutor would have satisfied?

Mr. Millar also says that my statement touching the subversion of the foundations of morality is not in accord with sound philosophy. If I have shown that it is scriptural, it follows that it is philosophical. Yet, I would again remind Mr. Millar and all who consider sincerity of intention enough, that upon such principles there can be no absolute morality, and no action can possess the quality of rightness or wrongness intrinsically, but only in relation to the actor. One man, with the sincere intention to please God, hazards his own life to save that of a man whom he believes to be a deadly enemy of the Church of God, another man with equal sincerity of purpose racks, mutilates, and burns the man he believes to be a heretic. Both men are equally sincere, and both comply with Mr. Cook's standard of perfection. I am sorry that Mr. Millar should have compelled me to argue a point that ought to be so clear. Mr. Cook's principle, pushed to legitimate consequences, would justify the rationalistic heresy which speaks of all religious worship as very good, if it is only sincere, though I am sure no one could abhor such a conclusion more than Mr. Cook.

No one believes that any conduct can be virtuous apart from a right intention, but my position is that no excellence of intention justifies a man who has followed a course intrinsically wrong.

Mr. Millar's long quotations from Prof. Finney do not seem to help his cause much. As I have not read Prof. Finney's writings, I do not know whether he intended exactly what Mr. Millar thinks he did. Much of his language is certainly not clear; but in any case we cannot bow to his conclusions as authoritative either in theology or philosophy. Some of the statements quoted are irrelevant, such as "Whatever is beyond the control of a moral agent he cannot be responsible for , for I did not mean by "achievement" the achievement of physical impossibilities. I would here point out, however, that those who hold views like Mr. Cook's show a convenient disposition to relegate to the sphere of that for which we are not responsible things for which God certainly does hold us responsible. "Marred and defective service" is sin in the sight of God, because we are not merely responsible to do the will of God when we know it, but we are responsible to know it. Many of our "perfectionist" friends infer the present possibility of entire sanctification (I use their own term without endorsing it) from Paul's prayer for the Thessalonians in 1 Thess. v. 23. To be consistent, they will also infer the present possibility of a complete and unerring knowledge of God's will from Paul's comprehensive prayer for the Colossians, "That ye might be filled with the knowledge of his will in all wisdom and spiritual understanding," a knowledge which would of course effectually preclude sins of ignorance, from which, however, Mr. Cook says he is not delivered.

Mr. Millar says that in condemning Mr. Cook I neglect to take into consideration a most important fact which Mr. Cook brings out clearly in his little book; to wit, that perfect love to God includes and necessitates equal love towards our fellow-men, and, therefore, forbids any unkind treatment (such as persecution) of others in any way or shape. But that "most important fact" lay entirely outside the scope of my letter. I was not concerned with Mr. Cook's theology as a whole, but with his endorsement of a principle which I believe to be subversive of morality, and that in a formal definition of Christian perfection. But I would remind Mr. Millar that, when he insists that persecution is incompatible with perfect love to God, he is inconsistently building again the absolute standard of morality which he just before destroyed; if he had the consistency to stand by his relative morality, he would remember that many a Dominican persecutor has sincerely believed that the burning of a heretic was as much in accord with perfect love to God as the execution of a murderer.

If the Wesleys, Fletcher, Finney, etc., preached "that Christ is a Saviour from all sin—external, internal, past, present, and future," then they preached what all Evangelicals preach. And if they have preached some human error along with God's truth, why should it be thought extraordinary that God has marvellously blessed their labours? To argue from the success of a preacher that his preaching is free from error would be portentous; and it will be enough to remind Mr. Millar that the late Mr. Spurgeon, as well as many others, who, from the point of view of the "perfectionist," must certainly have held error, and who equally certainly have not hesitated to proclaim it from the pulpit, have been the instruments in God's hands of extraordinary blessing to souls.

I would earnestly strive to avoid anything that could appear harsh to any of my brethren; and if in aught I have failed of this object, I trust I can count upon their forbearance.—Yours truly,

Thos. M. Neatby.

Sandown, I.W., August 19.

"RITUALISM."

Sir,—As an "Evangelical" clergyman, I feel bound to protest against an expression in one of your brief paragraphs: "No doubt the Ritualistic contention is unassailable, that the formularies of the Church of England in many parts give force and substance to the teaching they advance." I cannot understand how anyone who has read Archdeacon Farrar's two articles in The Contemporary on "Sacerdotalism" and "The Undoing of the Reformation," can say that the "contention of the Ritualists is unassailable." Men who wish to pervert the plainest language, and the most carefully-expressed definitions (except in mathematics) can always do so. Otherwise we should not have had so much discussion even on our blessed Master's words, "Hoc est corpus meum." Are we to find fault with Him for not giving us a closer definition? Is it fair, then, to bring a charge against the Church of England, because some men do not take its Articles and Prayer-book in the "plain, grammatical sense"?

Bournemouth, August 21. J. E.

Dear Sir,—In a "Note" in The Christian of August 17 the following words occur: "Surely it is high time that Evangelical Churchmen should agitate strongly for such a revision of the Prayer-book as shall bring it into line with the plain and accepted teachings of Scripture."

Some of your readers may, perhaps, be interested to know that such a Prayer-book, revised in a way eminently calculated to meet the reasonable wishes of Evangelical church people, has been in use in the Reformed Church of England for several years.—Yours truly, Edward T. Reed, Minister of Reformed Church of England.

NEWS COMES FROM INDIA, through the secretary of the Army Temperance Association, that Lieutenant Wingfield has accomplished the remarkable feat of walking 650 miles in twenty-six days, most of the time being over snow, and never at a lower altitude than 13,000 feet above the sea level, without finding alcoholic stimulants in any way necessary.

POST CARDS.

SOLDIERS IN INDIA.

The news from India just to hand relating to S.C.A. work, is of a most encouraging character. The work is well sustained through the self-denying efforts of Mr. and Mrs. Harington, and God is greatly owing their labours. Prayer is asked that the new converts may be kept faithful, and that doors may be opened for an extension of the work at home as well as abroad. A. H. W.

Soldiers' Institute, Portsmouth.

A HEATHER SERVICE.

The fourth annual Heather Sunday was observed at Peak Church, near Scarboro', on Sunday week. The afternoon service was conducted by Rev. H. A. Scott, of Scarboro', and the evening by the pastor (Rev. Wm. Riley). The congregation brought bunches of purple heather gathered from the moors above Peak. These were sent the next day to hospitals at Bradford, Bridlington, Norwich, and Wolverhampton.

ON THE SANDS.

At Lowestoft Mr. E. T. M. Dennes, assisted by an earnest band of ladies and gentlemen, is conducting services. The attendance of both children and adults on the sands has been steadily growing. Manifest attention is given to the Gospel message, the workers are much encouraged, and real blessing is confidently looked for. The number of friends who meet daily for prayer is not so large as one could wish, but it is gratifying to see the same faces constantly reappear. Undoubtedly the Spirit of God is working, and eternity will show that Lowestoft has this year been to many the meeting-place of the Saviour and the sinner. Sidney Pike.

ORCHARD BEACH CONVENTION.

To-day, August 9th, the Christian Alliance finished a ten days' Convention at Orchard Beach, Me. The subjects studied were, "Christ the Saviour, Sanctifier, Healer, and Coming Lord," and "The Duty of the World's Immediate Evangelization." Pastor A. B. Simpson arrived at the Convention on Tuesday, from his tour round the world to the mission fields. Rev. Stephen Merrit's addresses on the Holy Spirit were very helpful, and great numbers have entered upon an acquaintance with the blessed Spirit such as they never knew before. His experience of the Spirit's relation and work is such as multitudes covet and many are entering into. Last Lord's Day the annual collection for Foreign Missions was made, and notwithstanding the great commercial anxiety, and the sacrifice of all things God's people have made in former years, God opened the hearts and treasuries, and 30,000 dols. was promised or given. One sister gave all she possessed, 2000 dols., as quite a number have done. Jas. K. Cruickshank.

OUR COUNTRYMEN IN INDIA.

Last week, at the Aldersgate noon meeting, Mr. H. M. Hodder presiding, Rev. Isaac F. Row, of the Anglo-Indian Evangelisation Society, who is about to return to India for urgent work, after a short furlough, gave an impressive address on the great spiritual destitution among planters and along the lines of railway, and the work being carried on, which needs to be greatly extended. The Society, he said, is practically the Railway Mission of India, and its evangelists are doing much for the employés at stations where there are no churches or chapels, ministers or missionaries.

At many places the people would be absolutely without any public means of grace whatever, but for the occasional visits of these evangelists. Railway mission work is pre-eminently needed in India, and the Society should have the heartiest support of the highly-favoured Christians of the home-lands. The unsectarian and strictly Protestant basis of the Society should commend it to all who desire the spread of the pure Gospel in India. After referring to work among tea and coffee planters and others off the railway lines, Mr. Row said that from a missionary point of view the work is of the highest importance, as our countrymen in India have much influence for good or evil on the native population.

The meeting being a valedictory one, much prayer was offered for Mr. Row and his work, and for more labourers to be raised up and thrust forth to the great field of India. Rev. J. Fordyce (Simla, Cambridge), the general secretary of the Society, was present, and spoke briefly, introducing Mr. Row as one who has special gifts for evangelistic service.

On Monday evening a similar farewell meeting was held in the Martyrs' Memorial Hall, Cambridge, presided over by Rev. J. T. Lang, M.A., and addressed by Rev. Isaac F. Row and others.

Notes and Comments.

NEXT week we purpose giving portrait and sketch of the late Mr. J. D. LCROFT, London Merchant and Christian ilanthropist.

The Armenian Christian Defence Committee ll be thankful to receive contributions from mpathising friends, to defray the remaining bilities in connection with the liberation of ofessors Thoumaian and Kayayan.

Every preacher should get some instruction w to use his voice and his hands. A few mple rules would conserve the former, and event his using the latter like the sails of a ndmill, or when "opening and alleging," ing action appropriate to warning or de-nciation.

While we earnestly contend for the faith, must on some have compassion, making a fference, and others save with fear. We avelled the other day with a nun who had en working among the miners and colliers South Wales, and was evidently full of mpathy for them; a capable, resourceful, d kindly woman. We abhor the conventual stem, with all its evil possibilities of fraud d oppression, but we distinguish widely tween the system with the hierarchy who anipulate it, and the persons who are prisoned in it, in mind, or in body, or in th. We may denounce the one, but we ould seek to win the other.

We recently heard a clergyman of the P.G. preach a sermon highly unsatisfactory some Evangelical hearers, who afterwards pressed themselves indignantly. But an portunity of conversation with him oc-rred, and he was found to be willing and ankful to hear the other side, and admitted at he had never had the Gospel brought so ainly and so closely to him before. In all roneous systems there are the leaders and e led, the deceivers and the deceived. It is ost important to distinguish the latter from e former. They may be scolded deeper to their error, or they may be loved into e truth. The latter is the more excellent ay.

The licensing magistrates are making a good beginning this year. At Folkestone, at Luton, and at Crewe, they have raised points of vital importance, and given evidence that they do not mean to hold their office as a sinecure. They are showing an unwillingness to grant licences that are not needed for the accommodation of the public, and a willingness to revoke such licences as have been improperly used. Some are thinking of granting only six-days' licences, others are rigidly inquiring into the actual interest which the publicans have in the houses which they nominally hold, and how far they are tied houses. Magistrates have only to move boldly and consistently on these lines, and they will confer honour on the bench, and do untold good to the country. They will thus associate the administration of the law with the sense of righteousness in the national mind —than which they can hardly render a higher service.

A child of two members of the Peculiar People, aged seven months, died last week; and at the inquest held on the body the parents admitted that they had not sought medical advice. This was from no obstinate feeling, but from a trust in Christ, and for conscience' sake. Both coroner and jury bore testimony to their good character. Now, it seems deplorable that any of Christ's people should so far misunderstand his Word, and the constitution of things under which they are placed, as not to know that they honour and glorify Him by using all the means He has provided for them for this life and another. Reason is given to be used; medicines, as well as food, are given to be used. It is absurd to suppose that it is right to use food for the preservation of life, and certain foods and drinks for certain conditions of health, but wrong to use medicines for the promotion of health. God provided both. He is glorified in the use of both, but always in dependence on Him for his blessing.

It must have been with a feeling of relief that all right-minded readers of The Daily Chronicle saw the editorial announcement that the correspondence on suicide must cease. We think that it would not be difficult to trace a great deal of evil that has flowed from recent correspondence on such questions as have been raised. "Is life worth living?" naturally proceeds to "justification of suicide." The justification of suicide will give us Paris over again. "Is marriage a failure?" leads to divorce, and divorced and other loose-living persons clamour for loose marriage laws. "Is Christianity played out?" leads to scepticism, and all that flows from it. No doubt there are people to whom nothing is settled and sacred; they question everything. But, for all that, we hope that what is known as "the silly season" will not become the wicked season.

We deeply deplore the murder of the two devoted young Swedish missionaries who have been brutally beaten to death by a mob of furious and foreigner-hating Chinese. Nothing can palliate the cruelty of the crowd or the criminal indifference of the authorities. But for the sake of brethren and sisters who may be exposed to similar peril in days to come, we earnestly remind all missionaries of the Master's marching orders, "When they persecute you in one city, flee ye to another." The Apostle to the Gentiles, obeying this precept, escaped from Damascus, from Jerusalem, from Iconium, from Lystra, from Thessalonica, from Berea. And in this he trod in the steps of his Lord, who again and again escaped out of the hands of the Jews, because his hour was not yet come.

Dr. Kate Bushnell, who, with Mrs. Andrew, has achieved such a wonderful success in exposing the surreptitious action of Government officials in carrying on State regulation of vice in India, said a few days ago that one of the things which God has taught her by this piece of work is the relation between soul-saving work and work for the removal of unjust burdens and demoralising conditions of life. Formerly she thought that work for Christ could only be of the "soul-saving" order; now she sees that if you care to save souls you must undo all wrongs that can be touched. We may go further, and say that only he who is fit for the most spiritual kind of work can well and thoroughly do the other work. Dr. Bushnell and her friend are illustrations of this truth. Had they not been trained by Providence, and filled with the Spirit, had they not been given to prayer, the condition of the women of India would have remained unalleviated, but already the Government is liberating from the vilest of bondage those whom it has wronged.

The French elections have shown that France has not yet got a very sensitive conscience as to the character of its public men. That candidates should have been returned who were notorious for the practice of corruption in State affairs, who have received enormous bribes, is a thing to cause all honest men shame, be they English or French. Like all other countries, France will have to learn that, if her affairs are to be conducted honourably, she must entrust them to the keeping of good men, whose private characters will bear the strictest investigation. The explanation of many a failure in national legislation is the hollow character of the man or men who framed the measures. Complicity with vice, the support of unjust vested interests, and so forth, may often be traced to some "wicked person" who has found his way into office; and such men are always trying to find their way into office, because it pays.

The Pope gave his official recognition and blessing a while ago to the French Republic; but whether he has immediately profited thereby may be doubted. Romanist candidates have not proved successful in the elections. But time is in favour of the astute policy of the Vatican. It has placed itself in a friendly relation to the existing and, for France, necessary form of government; friction ceases; the Church can now get her forces quietly arranged for future struggle. To be a Republican does not now mean to be anti-clerical, because the clericals are Republican. The old fear of the Church has thus been removed, and hence she may find her way back to the benches of the House of Deputies and to Government places. Still, it is more than probable that the politics of the nation will represent the condition of the nation; and if France is at heart mainly infidel and materialistic, she will choose mainly candidates who are of that school.

MASHONALAND.—In a deeply interesting letter to The Times of Tuesday, the Bishop of Derry, writing from Cape Town, gives a history of the relations of Great Britain with the Matabele tribes in Mashonaland. He tells of constant raids by the fierce Matabele, and says: "Somehow or other the few thousands of English in Mashonaland must be freed from an ever-threatening danger, if a vast and splendid region is to be opened up to civilization, to commerce, to Christianity."

The Genealogies of Our Lord.

We hear much of supposed discrepancies in the Bible, but perhaps there is nothing that more clearly shows forth the wonderful beauty of the Holy Spirit's design in the Scripture narrative than when we come upon passages which, at first sight, seem to be at variance with each other, but by careful comparison and study in the light which the Bible itself gives, we find that, instead of contradictions, they present a perfect harmony, a harmony all the more striking because evidently undesigned on the part of the different writers.

Nothing can be drier than genealogies; yet when we know more fully the mind of the Spirit, we shall doubtless find in the driest of these a value of which we had not dreamed, especially when we discover the bearing they had upon Him who was Son of David and Son of man. Perhaps no part of our Lord's earthly history has been studied less than the two genealogies in Matthew i. 1-17, and Luke iii. 23-38, and at the same time nothing probably has caused greater perplexity to those who have compared the two. Sceptics have triumphantly pointed to these two passages as being irreconcileable, while a modern writer upon the subject of inspiration thinks to solve the problem by supposing that the two evangelists had each a different pedigree before him, and either one or both were wrong. A close examination of these two apparently conflicting passages in the light of other parts of Scripture will well repay the study.

Luke alone gives the line from Adam to Abraham. From Abraham to David the lines in both Matthew and Luke are identical, but from David to Joseph the lines are almost entirely different. It can easily be seen that Matthew, who writes of Jesus as King, gives us the Royal pedigree of the heirs to the throne through Solomon, while Luke, whose narrative sets forth our Saviour as the Son of man, gives the direct lineal descent through Nathan, another son of David. But a difficulty here arises. Each line numbers Salathiel and Zorobabel (or Zerubbabel) in the genealogy, while we read in Matthew that "Jacob begat Joseph," but in Luke that "Joseph was the son of Heli" (Eli).

It is exactly here that the beauty of what we might call the Divine mosaic is brought out, when we piece it with other portions of Bible story. Let us set the two lines parallel:

Luke.	Matthew.
David.
Nathan	Solomon
Mattatha	Roboam
Menan	Abia
Melea	Asa
Eliakim	Josaphat
Jonan	Joram
Joseph	Ozias
Juda	Joatham
Simeon	Achaz
Levi	Ezekias
Matthat	Manasses
Jorim	Amon
Eliezer	Josias
Jose	*Jechonias
Ez
Elmodam
Cosam
Addi
Melchi
Neri
Salathiel
Zorobabel

Luke.	Matthew.
Zorobabel.
Rhesa	Abiud
Joanna	Eliakim
Juda	Azor
Joseph	Sadoc
Semei	Achim
Mattathias	Eliud
Maath	Eleazar
Nagge	Matthan
Esli	Jacob
Naum
Amos Mattathias
Joseph
Janna
Melchi
Levi
Matthat
Heli
Joseph
JESUS.

* It is supposed that Jehoiakim was originally inserted here, which would make the number complete according to ver. 17, but that it has been omitted by an early copyist; or, on the other hand, there may have been a Divine reason for not including his name (see Jer. xxxvi. 11-30). The three immediate successors of Jehoram are left out of our Lord's genealogy evidently as a punishment because of his sin in marrying Athaliah, the daughter of Jezebel, who introduced the worship of Baal into Judah, and who, with her husband Jehoram, imbrued their hands in the blood of the seed royal, whom Athaliah sought to exterminate, and their own seed to the third generation was "blotted out" from the record.

A careful comparison of the genealogy in Matthew with the line of kings in the Old Testament will show that the term "begat" has not here the ordinary meaning, but denotes the succeeding heir. Now let us turn to Jer. xxii. 30, where we find that the Lord said of Jeconiah, "no man of his seed shall prosper sitting upon the throne of David and ruling any more in Judah." Salathiel, therefore, could not be his son, but was, as Luke says, "the son of Neri," descended from Nathan. But as he was not in the line of succession, how could he inherit the throne? Light is thrown upon this by two passages in Numbers. In chapters xxvii. and xxxvi. we read, in connection with the daughters of Zelophehad, "of the families of Manasseh, the son of Joseph," that the Lord commanded that when a man died leaving daughters but no sons behind him, his daughters were to be his heirs; but to prevent the inheritance in such cases going by marriage to another tribe, "every daughter that possesseth an inheritance . . . . . shall be wife unto one of the family of the tribe of her father, that the children of Israel may enjoy every man the inheritance of his father." Now, what at first sight seems to be only the solution of a family difficulty, has really an important bearing upon the genealogy of our Lord. Jeconiah had no son who outlived him to succeed him, but in all likelihood he had a daughter, who would be heir to the throne; and as she must marry a kinsman, she married Salathiel, who was therefore not son, but son-in-law, to Jeconiah, and heir to the throne through his wife. Thus the line of Solomon by male descent was broken off according to the word of the Lord to Jeconiah, the heirship being continued through the female, and the succeeding heirs being not of Solomon's but of Nathan's line.

There is nothing at all improbable in the thought that just before the birth of our Lord, when the two lines again meet, "history repeated itself" in the providence and by ordination of God. Jacob, the last man in the line of succession, evidently had no son, so his daughter Mary was his heir. She, in obedience to the commandment above referred to, "was espoused to Joseph," her kinsman, "the son of Eli," of the family of David, who would thus be Jacob's son-in-law, and, like Salathiel, heir to the throne by virtue of his marriage. Thus the Lord Jesus was the Son of David, and heir to his throne both by royal succession and lineal descent, according to the double promise to David in 2 Sam. vii. 12, 13, referred to in Acts ii. 30, "that God had sworn with an oath to him, that of the fruit of his loins, according to the flesh, he would raise up Christ to sit on his throne."

There is yet another striking coincidence, to say the least, at the point where the two lines previously meet. Zerubbabel was, as we know from the prophecies of Zechariah, in a very special manner a type of our Lord. Now, it appears from 1 Chron. iii. 19 that he was not really the son of Salathiel (or Shealtiel, as he is called in Ezra v. 2); he was the son of Pedaiah, and therefore only the reputed son of Salathiel, so our Lord also was only the reputed son, as it is said of Him, "Jesus . . . being (as was supposed) the son of Joseph."

In all the Divine plans there is a deep meaning, and doubtless a closer and deeper study of these genealogies will show us more of "the depths of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God," and cause us to exclaim: "How unsearchable are His judgments, and His ways past finding out! For who hath known the mind of the Lord, or who hath been his counsellor?"

Is Protestantism Decaying?

Such was the question which Dr. Horton, of Hampstead, set himself to answer the other Sunday evening, and his reply, as given in the Christian World Pulpit, was that "in England for a time it certainly is." He does not think that there is much change in the way of converts passing over to Rome; the danger lies in "the progress of the Catholic principle involving the Catholic claim in the Church of England itself." In many hundreds of parish churches the practices of Rome, which occasioned the Reformation, and against which the Reformation was a protest, are unblushingly renewed; "even the title of 'Father,' applied to the minister, is resumed, as if to remind us that we have reached the point where we might reverse the commandments of Jesus Christ." Dr. Horton is especially pained "that when brave and strong men like the Archdeacon of London and the Archdeacon of Westminster, who cherish the principles of the Reformation, attempt to arouse their Church to a sense of the position, they are denounced, not by Rome, but by England, by the papers of the English Church, as if they were traitors to religion. No one can hide from his eyes that the people—at any rate the church-going people—love to have it so." Thus that great event in our history, from which we date the rise of our national power and glory and usefulness, is discredited and its influence undermined.

This Romanism which is returning through the door of the Established Church has in it, as we all know, all the errors and corruptions of heathenism under a guise of Christian truth. Dr. Horton says:—

"It is the great misfortune of Catholicism that, claiming infallibility for the Church, it necessarily embraces every accident and every error of its growth, claims it as the work of the Holy Ghost, and is tied to it and to all the abuses of its past by the very principle on which it rests its authority."

History says that Rome incorporated her errors by deliberate actions of her own; it was no "misfortune." But letting that pass—for we are too glad to see Dr. Horton and other members of the Nonconformist Churches bestirring themselves on this vital question, to raise minor points—we ask how it has come to pass that Protestantism has been so powerful, and that she is now suffering eclipse? To the former Dr. Horton replies:—

"We in England for these 300 years have made it our constant aim to penetrate back into the atmosphere of the Apostolic age to find the authority and Person of the Christ who lived and died upon the earth in the original records. It has been our constant purpose in that legitimate and historical sense to build upon the foundation of the Apostles and the Prophets, Jesus Christ Himself being the chief corner-stone."

Nothing can be more satisfactory than Dr. Horton's acknowledgment of the New Testament as the means through which Protestantism was called into existence, was shaped, and was made a mighty regenerating force. The authority which the Reformers opposed to the authority of the Church was a Book, and by that authority they conquered. Whenever Dr. Horton wants firm ground under him he also falls back upon that Book.

Does he, then, attribute the decay of Protestantism to any decline in reverence for the Book and its teachings? No; he believes that, "if you could get at the heart of the Pope and his agents in this country, you would have them telling you that their greatest hope lies in the rapid Romanising of the English Church, and their greatest help lies in the misguided advocacy of the so-called Protestants. In consequence of the narrowness, rancour, and dogmatism of the various sects, persons of culture stand on one side, equally indifferent to Protestantism and Romanism."

There may be some truth in this, but we would submit to Dr. Horton that he has somewhat missed the point. It is partly because the school of teachers, of whom he is a foremost representative, have shaken the people's confidence in Scripture, that so many of them are turning to a Church which promises them rest. We do not attribute the whole of the drift to Romanism to the Higher Criticism, as it is called, but nothing is more certain than that the decay of Bible authority presages the rise of Church influence. Catholic countries are turning from the Church, because they know how hollow are her claims, how useless her offices; Germany and England are turning to her because, for one thing, they are weary of the shifting theories and tiresome cavilling of men who delight in dissecting the Bible.

EVANGELISTIC VILLAGE MISSION.

This Mission, now in its seventeenth year, is an agency under whose auspices Mr. G. D. Shipley and others carry the simple Gospel into some of the least accessible nooks and corners of our country. During last year work was carried on in the counties of Surrey, Herts, Cambs, Essex, and Derby. Nearly a thousand services were held, indoors and out, mainly among agricultural labourers, colliers, railway men and navvies, in chapels, schoolrooms, mission-halls, barns, and cottages.

In the latest report Mr. Shipley says: "For the last seven years I have been fully satisfied that my object is not to preach the Gospel only to perishing sinners, but to instruct the starving saints, and to interest the people generally in Scripture truth and Protestant history, of both of which little is known or understood except in a very elementary way; this necessitates a longer tarriance than to preach the Gospel on a flying visit across country." For this work a canvas tent is not adequate, but a wooden structure, that could be located in some needy village for a few months, and then removed to another centre, would be a valuable acquisition. Towards providing a capacious movable tent, at a probable cost of about £300, Mr. Shipley appeals earnestly to those who are interested in the moral and spiritual condition of our rural population.

The work of the Mission is unsectarian, and with real urgency is an important place given to Scripture instruction. Mr. Shipley says in his little report:—"There is no lack of Bibles, but a deplorable lack of Scripture teaching; nothing is so much needed in our villages as the milk of the Word that believers may grow thereby. For lack of this they are helpless and unable to defend themselves against the sophistries of Ritualism...It would gladden the hearts of our friends if they knew something more of the many homes made happy, of lives once depraved and vicious now become godly and useful, some at home, others now abroad,—to know of buildings erected, others enlarged or renovated, where large congregations gather from scattered districts. It is often delightful to witness the eagerness with which men and women will cheerfully trudge through mud and sludge of winter, or heat of summer, often after a hard day's work, carrying one or more children, in order to be present at an evening service for Scripture instruction."

Communications for Mr. Shipley should be addressed, Highfield House, Royston, Cambridge.

JEWS IN EAST LONDON.—The Jewish Chronicle states that Mr. F. N. Charrington has, with the consent of his co-trustees, granted the use of the Great Hall in Mile-end-road for holding therein Jewish services on the ensuing New Year Festival and the Eve and Day of Atonement. Owing to the vastness of the structure—the hall is estimated to hold 8000 worshippers—special means will be taken to preserve order and to ensure decorum.

"LUKE NINETEEN."

The following story, which we heard a little while ago, and which now appears in the report of the Evangelisation Society, will be read with great interest:—

Mr. John de Burgh Rochfort, of the Evangelisation Society, conducted in 1891 a fortnight's mission at the Soldiers' Home at Chatham. He had nearly come to his last afternoon, and was considering what should be the subject of his evening address. One subject after another presented itself to his mind, and each in turn was rejected. The afternoon had come to an end, and he was still undecided. He left the house about half an hour before the time of service, and went out to the Chatham Lines—the garrison parade ground—and there, walking up and down, he lifted up his heart to God for guidance. Suddenly the words seemed almost to sound in his ears, "Zaccheus, make haste and come down, for to-day I must abide at thy house," and he at once felt that he had received his subject from God in answer to his prayer. It was long since he had spoken on these words, and, returning to his room, he took a sheet of notepaper, and spent the few minutes that remained before the meeting in jotting down one or two points that he would dwell on in his address. Then he went down to the meeting, and when the time came for him to speak he gave out his subject thus:—"Luke Nineteen, Verse Five. Zaccheus, make haste and come down, for to-day I must abide at thy house." With this as the basis of his address, he preached the Gospel as plainly, as earnestly, and as solemnly as he could, and prayed God to give his blessing.

Nearly a year passed. Again he was at Chatham, and again going to speak in the Soldiers' Home. "There's a man here very anxious to see you," said the lady in charge that evening, as he sat at tea. "He was converted during your last visit to us, and he wants to tell you all about it. There is no question as to the greatness of the change that has taken place in him." Gladly Mr. Rochfort sought the man, and the next day he heard the account of his conversion from his own lips. He had been a soldier, and had been allowed to lodge in the Soldiers' Home, but as he refused to attend any of the meetings or Bible-classes, and was always discontented and grumbling, the ladies in charge had been considering the propriety of telling him that he must get lodgings elsewhere. This had been the case at the time of Mr. Rochfort's first visit. Throughout the mission the man had, as usual, kept away from the meetings, but he felt some curiosity to hear the speaker once, as he had been an officer, and so determined to go this particular night. He went, and took a seat right in front of the preacher.

"Now, sir," said he, "I must tell you that I had been ill a long time, and had been an in-patient of St. Bartholomew's Hospital. They put me in the Luke Ward, and my bed was number nineteen. So I was always called in the hospital 'Luke Nineteen.' I think they hardly knew my proper name, for when the sister has written to me, she has begun her letter, 'Dear Luke Nineteen.' So you see, sir, when you stood up and began by saying 'Luke Nineteen,' I knew it was for me, and I listened to all you said." Yes; and, thank God, he not only listened, but he received by faith what he heard, and in his case it was clearly seen that the Gospel is still as ever most truly the power of God unto salvation. From that night the change in him was unmistakable, and he gave evidence of being indeed a new creature in Christ Jesus. No wonder he now wanted to speak to the friend who had been God's messenger to him the previous year.

What a minute and wonderful supervision the Holy Spirit exercises over the minds and thoughts of those whom He has sent to preach the glad tidings of salvation to sinners, and how personal are his dealings with them, as well as with those in the congregations they address whom He designs to call out and save! Only God could have foreseen that this man would be present on that particular evening, and that he answered to the name "Luke Nineteen," and only He could have suddenly, and without any previous connection, suggested this text, which was the most suitable one in the whole Bible for that particular individual.

RUSSIA.—The Bible Society for Russia during the past year has disposed of 56,559 copies of the sacred Scriptures. The colporteurs have traversed the wilds of Siberia in the prosecution of their task.

ST. GILES CHRISTIAN MISSION.

Mr. Wheatley's new report, just issued, states that "while some anxiety has been felt from time to time in the matter of funds, the various departments of the Mission operations, touching the sinful and sorrowful around us in St. Giles—that is the general Mission work; the poor and neglected children—that is the Sunday School and Band of Hope work; and the friendless and fallen—that is the prisoners, boys, and women's branches, have been sustained with vigour and efficiency."

The general Mission work includes a large variety of effort. There are the Sunday Gospel services in the Mission chapel and at the halls in Seven Dials, Drury Lane, and Brooke-street; also four Sunday schools, two children's services, Bible classes for young men and young women, open-air preaching, house-to-house visitation, prayer-meetings, and lodging-house services. Every day in the week has also its varied engagements at the different centres. The relief work, in view of the misery prevailing in the winter especially, assumes important dimensions, and has been the means of saving many from a deplorable condition.

THE PRISONERS' BRANCH.

The well-known Prisoners' Branch is going on vigorously. Morning by morning, the workers are busy at the prison gates, getting hold of those discharged from gaol, and endeavouring to persuade them to abandon their evil courses. The superintendent's office in Brooke-street sees daily numbers of men and boys who have done wrong seeking a way of escape, and many of them, being practically helped in their time of need, bid fair to do well, and even now very many erstwhile criminals are leading honest and sober lives, owing their all, under God, to the efforts of this Mission.

The following figures show the extent of the work during the past year at the prison gates:—

Approximate number of prisoners released from Holloway, Pentonville, and Wandsworth prisons, all of whom have been invited to our free breakfast	25,745
Number of those who have accepted the invitation and partaken of the free breakfast, and to whom God's Word has been read and explained	19,540
Number of those who have signed the pledge at our breakfast rooms at our advice	5585

How these have been dealt with in order to set them on their feet and give them a new chance in life is indicated by the following figures for the year:—

Assisted to go abroad, 41; sent to sea, 3; restored to their friends, 189; assisted with gifts of money, food, tools, clothes, etc., and by work being found them, 5812; number of convicts who, on their release from penal servitude, have been assisted by the Mission, 407.

Thus we have a total of 6452 discharged prisoners and released convicts who have been helped, warned of the consequences of sin, and urged to flee to Christ.

The Rescue-preventive work among the boys grows steadily as its value becomes more evident. The figures for the year are as follow:—

Admitted in the homes, 467; not admitted, but assisted in finding work, 173; sent to sea, 19; restored to friends, 100; number of situations found, 617; boys now in the homes, 130.

The Mission has now four Homes, and, owing to the great need, have been compelled to rent another, which will admit seventy more boys. The work among women and girls also goes on well, showing a total of 1145 admitted to the Homes for the year.

Many striking incidents are given in the report bearing on all branches of the work, and the director concludes thus:—"We believe in the Gospel of Divine Grace, the only power to save and to keep; but we also believe that it is ours to seek to raise the fallen, and put heart into the hopeless, by rendering them just the special help their circumstances demand. But if we are to help to purpose, we must be supported. We cannot say to these, 'Go and be fed and clothed; go and be honest; endure your sufferings and see your children starve until you find work.' No, we must render help unless these souls are to be left to perish, and if we are to render it, the means must be supplied to us, We say boldly that God has opened wide doors amongst the most hopeless classes, but the work imperatively needs funds, and cannot be carried on without them. Must these be left to perish? Surely not. All who know the actual state of the case, will rejoice to render us prompt aid in doing this great work for the Master's sake." Mr. Wheatley's address is 29, Brooke-street, Holborn.

The Key-Notes of Life.

By Rev. F. B. Meyer, B.A.

THE CHRISTIAN ARMED.

Each Christian has to meet with the powers of hell, in his own life, and in his capacity as a soldier of the Gospel of Christ. It is with the latter aspect of the conflict that the Apostle is specially concerned, in the last chapter of the Epistle we have been studying. We do not question that there is a reference to the personal conflict which each believer has to maintain with the principalities and powers of evil. But the stress laid on the fact that they are the world-rulers, or the rulers of the darkness of this world, is significant of that wider conflict which the Church, and each member of it, is called upon to maintain with the grim hosts of evil that lie unseen behind those systems of superstition, cruelty, and pride, which oppose the Gospel of Jesus Christ.

It is well for us to recognise this supernatural element in the evil by which our work for God is confronted, and often sorely pressed. We have to wrestle, not simply with the stupidity, barbarism, or intellectual acumen of flesh and blood, but with the spiritual hosts of wickedness which are in the heavenly places. If we judge by certain phrases scattered at rare intervals over the page of Scripture (as Daniel x.), we must infer that the nations of mankind are really dominated by evil spirits, that hold them in thrall, and to whom they do homage. There is, therefore, no hope of opposing them successfully by the weapons of eloquence, intellectual debate, social or economic reform. Adapting the majestic phraseology of the Book of Job, we may say: Our spiritual foes count iron as straw, and brass as rotten wood; arrows cannot make them flee; clubs are counted as stubble; they laugh at the rushing of the javelin.

There is no need, however, for us to abate one jot of courage, for in his Ascension all these principalities and powers were put under the feet of our Redeemer; and as we abide in Him, we share his conquest; we are more than a match for the mightiest forces of hell; we walk upon our high places.

But the Apostle makes it clear that we must possess certain personal qualities before we can avail ourselves of the victory or power of the Captain of our Salvation. This is what he means by urging us to put on the whole armour of God, that we may be able to withstand in the evil day, and having done all to stand. Let us ponder this, for to neglect it is the cause of much of the failure of Christian workers. They are not careful enough as to their personal character, and so the devil laughs them to scorn, for by their inconsistencies they cut the sinews of their faith and dissociate themselves from the only source of victory that he dreads. Compare 2 Pet. i. 5-11.

Eph. vi. 14. The Christian Warrior must be True.—The loins are significant of strength, and girded loins represent the opposite of self-indulgence, slothful ease, or carelessness. Hence the need for the girded loin, and our Lord solemnly insists on it as a prime necessity for his servants. "Let your loins be girded about, and your lamps burning, and be ye yourselves like unto men looking for their Lord."

We must gird ourselves with truth. We must be true to the laws of our nature, never overstepping the limits of moderation, never using for self-indulgence the powers which were intended only for the maintenance of the fires of life; never yielding to that worse self which lurks in us all, as the miasma in the fairest landscapes of southern climes. We must be true to God who made and redeemed us; true to our best selves, our noblest ideals; true to those with whom we live, and who are certainly affected for good or evil by our self-restraint or the reverse.

There is the strongest obligation that we should often stand foursquare before the mirror of truth; which is Christ—Christ the Light that lighteth every man—Christ in conscience—Christ in the Word. There is no severer or straighter test than this. With unfailing accuracy we shall discover our true selves, as we come face to face with Him, who is girt with righteousness as the girdle of his reins, and faithfulness as the girdle of his loins. Let there be any obliqueness, or irregularity, or inconsistency, it will be at once and unerringly revealed. No distortion of the inner life can escape detection or condemnation before that judgment seat, whose decisions are ratified by each soul's secret convictions of justice. Would that we were all in the habit of submitting to that faithful scrutiny not the greater matters only, but all the smallest details of our lives.

Then let us, in the name and by the power of Jesus, put away all that has been shown to be inconsistent with his character and claims, and let us submit in everything to his control. It will cost us something. We may have difficulty with our judgment, warped and injured by selfish preference. We may have to contend with our will, reluctant to sign the death-warrant of some favourite habit. We may feel singularly powerless to carry into effect what we know, in our loftiest moments, to be our only safe and blessed policy. But blessed are we, if we dare to catch up the trailing robes of self-indulgence, and restrain them under the cincture of inexorable truth and purity.

Eph. vi. 14. The Christian Warrior must be Righteous.—"Put on the breastplate of righteousness." This righteousness is not primarily that which is reckoned to us, so soon as we believe in Jesus, but rather that personal righteousness which is wrought in us by the Holy Spirit, and in virtue of which our characters are conformed to that of Jesus Christ the Righteous. The Apostle refers to it, when he reminds Titus that the grace of God instructs us to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world. It is the temper we should cultivate and manifest in all our dealings with other men. The breastplate is worn upon the heart, the seat of our affections and emotions. In these especially we must be right.

It is very necessary to remember this. Of what use is it to speak of Jesus to those who are rankling under a sense of our injustice, or are sensible of some glaring inconsistency in our character? The effect of our most eloquent entreaties is neutralised by our deeds, which speak even louder.

What a beautiful contrast there is between the laxity of too many of us and the scrupulous care of the Apostle Paul. How watchfully he exercised himself to have a conscience void of offence toward man as well as God! How sensitive to the least appearance of self-seeking, that he might cut off occasion from them which desired an occasion! How gladly he went without what was in itself lawful lest his ministry should be blamed!

It becomes the Christian to put it beyond the power of man or devil to point to some inaccuracy in life or conversation, and to say: This man belies his profession, and contradicts his own teaching. Rather let us suffer wrong, and submit to overcharge, and give men even more than they can justly claim. Anything of loss or suffering may be cheerfully met, in order that night after night we may wash our hands in innocency, and feel that we have not put a stumbling-block in the path of any man.

This is only possible as we abide by faith in Christ our righteousness. And when we have done our best, we shall have nothing to boast of. We are always unprofitable servants, who have only done what they ought.

Eph. vi. 15. The Christian Warrior must Follow after Peace.—"Your feet shod with the preparedness of the Gospel of Peace." There is undoubtedly a reference in these words to Isaiah's vision of the messengers, who, with beautiful feet, speed across the mountains to proclaim the good tidings of the Gospel. But there is the further thought, that those who carry the Gospel of Peace must tread gently and softly.

If the Gospel of Peace is our message, the peace of God should mantle our face with a holy calm, breathe through our lips like a benediction, and diffuse itself like the dew of the Lord over the parched places of human rivalry and hatred. Ours should be the blessedness of the peace-makers. Our tread should be only in the paths of peace, except when the trumpet of God clearly calls us to war against the sins and wrongs around. "If it be possible, as much as in you lieth, be at peace with all men." So then, let us follow after things which make for peace, and things whereby we may edify one another. The Lord's servant must not strive, but be gentle towards all, apt to teach, forbearing, in meekness correcting them that oppose themselves. Be it ours, then, always to be on the alert to promote peace and love amongst men; not incensed or irritated by their rancorous dealings with ourselves; not catching fire at the flame of their wrath and indignation.

Eph. vi. 16. The Christian Warrior must be Vigorous in Faith.—As each fiery dart, tipped with the flames of hellish hate, comes speeding to the soldier of the cross, deafened by the din and blinded by the smoke of battle, he must catch and quench it on the golden shield of faith, that it reach not his head or heart.

Sometimes a slander will be circulated, for which you have given no occasion; or a venomous speech or article will be hurled at you; or some horrible suggestion will be thrust between the joints of the armour; or some deadly reminder of the sins of the past, which you can never recall without burning remorse. At such times we are tempted to give back, to renounce our work, to withdraw from the battle. And those will certainly yield to the temptation, who are not inspired by the faith that can hand these things over to the compassionate and mighty Saviour, who knows all, but loves better than He knows, and who interposes to cover our heads in the day of battle.

But faith like this is only possible to him whose hands are clean, and his heart pure; who is living in daily fellowship with Jesus, and whose soul is nurtured by daily feeding on the Word of God.

Eph. vi. 17. The Christian Warrior must know God's Salvation in his own experience.—He must be saved from the guilt and penalty of sin before he can proclaim the plenitude of God's forgiveness to the chief of sinners. He must know the Gospel as the power of God unto salvation from the dominion of sin in his own heart. He must be anticipating the consummation of God's purpose in the redemption of the body. As the helmet glistens in the sunshine, so must the crown of the Christian's experience point upwards to heaven, and onwards to the glory yet to be revealed. He must speak that which he knows and declare what he has seen and heard. It is when we are experiencing the power of God's salvation that we can declare it to others, with a freedom and a power that needs no further corroboration. And it is when men see the salvation of God exemplified in our own life and character, that they will be prepared to accept it as indeed the Word of God.

Eph. vi. 18. The Christian Warrior must Use the Two Essential Means of Grace—the Word of God and Prayer.—Add to all the above the diligent use of the Word of God in the culture of our souls, in the preparation of our messages, and in dealing with the conscience of our hearers; and let there be besides the perpetual use of the weapon of all-prayer, and there is no enemy born of hell that shall be able to withstand us, who, in the feebleness of human weakness, are strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might.

THE PEARL-FISHER.

In an account of the pearl-fisheries, it is recorded of one that he died immediately after he had reached land, having brought with him, amongst other shells, one that contained a pearl of surpassing size and lustre.

"A merchant man, seeking goodly pearls."—Matt. xiii. 45.

Death and the pearl united,
Death and the pearl conjoined.
The pearl upborne, the finder
To death's cold shades assigned!

How like the beauteous picture
In Holy Writ revealed,—
The "priceless Pearl," whose story
To hearts has e'er appealed.

Found in the dark deep ocean,
Those mighty depths profound!
Which only One could fathom,
Which only One could sound.

And He, alone, descended,
Amid the dangers rife,
The "precious Pearl" to rescue,
At purchase of his life.

The Christ of God, delivered
Upon the cross to die,
That He, in death triumphant,
Might raise the Church on high.

The "Merchant man"—how lovely!
Amid creation's whirl,
Hard seeking, till he found it,
The precious, peerless Pearl!

Apocalyptic Scenes.

XXIV.

THE LAST TRUMP.

"And the seventh angel sounded, and there were great voices in heaven, saying, The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our God and of his Christ, and He shall reign for ever and ever."

This is the end of the dispensation. For "in the days of the seventh angel, when he shall begin (or be about) to sound, the mystery of God should be finished, as He hath declared (or announced as good news) to his servants the prophets." It is the winding up of the great drama of the present age.

It is the Last Trump! "For the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed." "The Lord Himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God, and the dead in Christ shall rise first; then we which are alive, and remain unto the coming of the Lord, shall be caught up together with them in clouds, to meet the Lord in the air, and so shall we ever be with the Lord."

Oh! most bright and blessed hope! Oh! most blissful anticipation! Oh! most certain and glorious reality! "He that shall come will come, and will not tarry." "The end of all things is at hand." "The day of the Lord will come." "He shall come to be glorified in his saints, and to be admired in all them that believe." "We shall be like Him, for we shall see Him as He is," and "the creation itself also shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the liberty of the glory of the children of God." Hallelujah! "Even so, come, Lord Jesus!"

What are the events that accompany this unspeakably grand and glorious scene? In seeking to gather the answer to this question from the passage, let us observe—first, that the language of symbol and metaphor appears to be greatly, if not entirely, discontinued; and next that the exact order of events is not disclosed. All we can say is that they accompany, or are attendant upon, the sounding of the last trump. The day itself will declare the way and order in which they will follow each other. We can now only briefly notice what is said concerning them in the solemn utterances which are recorded.

1. The omnipotence of our Lord and of his Christ is manifested and exercised, and in the way of execution of judgment. This has occasionally and partially taken place, e.g., in such cases as the Flood, the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, the extermination of the Canaanites, the overthrow of Babylon, of Jerusalem, etc. But these have been exceptions to the general tenor of Divine procedure. God has "kept silence" (Ps. l. 21.) There has been "the hiding of his power" (Hab. iii. 4). "Sentence against an evil work (has) not (been) executed speedily" (Ecc. viii. 11). He has been slow to anger, long suffering, and men have said, "God hath forgotten; He hideth his face; He will never see it" (Ps. x. 11). But He is none the less a God of judgment. "He hath prepared his throne for judgment. He shall judge the world in righteousness." He will be "known by the judgment which He executeth" (Ps. ix. 7, 8, 13). For six thousand years He has most chiefly declared his Almighty power by showing mercy and pity. When the last trumpet sounds He will exert it in judgment.

2. The Kingdom of Christ is manifestly set up. Now are fulfilled all the prophecies concerning the Kingdom of God. The promise of the Father to the Son, "I will give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession," is realised. The triumphant anticipations of inspired Psalmists come to pass. "The Lord reigneth, He cometh to judge the earth. The Lord reigneth, let the earth rejoice." "The whole earth shall be filled with his glory—and—the prayers of David the son of Jesse (shall be) ended." The visions of Daniel have their accomplishment. The four world empires have come to nought, for the stone cut out of the mountain without hands has broken them in pieces, and filled the whole earth. "The Son of Man came with the clouds of heaven, and there was given Him dominion and glory and a kingdom, that all people and nations and languages should serve Him. His dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom shall not be destroyed." "The Lord God shall give unto Him the throne of his father David, and of his kingdom there shall be no end." He must reign. "King of the Jews," "King of the Ages" (Rev. xv. 3, R.V.), "King of kings," "Blessed and only Potentate." He who wore the crown of thorns now comes in glory, and "on his head are many crowns."

3. There are great voices in heaven, and the four-and-twenty elders, representing the Church of God in her completeness, peal forth their jubilant anthems. They rejoice with joy, no longer unspeakable but full of glory. Their beloved Lord and Saviour is glorified; the whole universe trembles with gladness. Sin and pain, and death and crying all come to an end. All things that offend and they that do iniquity are gathered out of his Kingdom. Satan is bound; wrongs are righted; mysteries are cleared up; God's ways are vindicated. It is the time of "the restitution of all things."

Foretold by prophets and by poets sung,
Whose fire was kindled at the prophet's lamp,
The time of rest, the promised Sabbath comes.

The Day of the Lord has dawned, Christ reigns in glory.

4. "The nations were angry." The long warfare of men against their Creator has culminated in universal rejection of his sway. The idea of God, of a controlling power, has become hateful to them. Romanism and Rationalism, Infidelity and Atheism, Agnosticism, and every other form of ignorance of God and of rebellion against Him have prepared the way. As on the occasion when the hatred of men against Divine government, or what they regarded as claiming to represent Divine government, manifested itself in such terrible fury at the French Revolution, so it is everywhere. "The heathen rage, and the people imagine a vain thing." "The kings of the earth set themselves and the rulers take counsel together against the Lord, and against his Christ, saying, Let us break their bonds asunder, and cast away their cords from us." "The floods have lifted up their voice; the floods lift up their waves." There is "upon the earth distress of nations, with perplexity; the sea and the waves roaring." The nations are angry. But "the Lord on high is mightier than the noise of many waters; yea, than the mighty waves of the sea." "He that sitteth in the heaven shall laugh: the Lord shall have them in derision." Their impotent fury dashes itself in vain against the calm omnipotence of God.

5. "Thy wrath is come." Oh! unspeakably solemn word. It is the same as that used by the nation's anger. An angry God! A righteously angry God. Divine wrath is not the fitful outburst of wounded pride, or envy, or uncontrollable temper. It is one of his most glorious attributes, as necessary to the perfection of the character of God as is his love, his wisdom, or his power. God must be angry with sin, because it is essentially contrary to his ineffable holiness. A God who was not a God of wrath against every form of evil, diabolical or human, would be a one-sided, a weak, and imperfect God. He shows it in his works, though men forget it. They speak as if He manifested himself only in the soft sunshine, the blue sky, the balmy south wind, the gentle ripple of the summer sea. They forget the avalanche and the cataract, the lightning and the thunder, the tempest and the earthquake. "Thy wrath is come." It is no longer "the wrath to come." It has come. The wrath of God, like a tornado, sweeps across the scene where long suffering and grace have for millenniums pleaded with men. The heavens are passing away with a great noise, the elements are melting with fervent heat, the earth also and the works that are therein are being burned up. It is "the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men." The destroyers of the earth are destroyed. Thy wrath is come.

6. It is "the time of the dead that they should be judged." The exact stages or order of that judgment are not here revealed. Whether it be only the first resurrection that is spoken of, or whether the expression is meant to include the rising to judgment of the wicked dead described in chap. xx., is not stated. That the sound of the trump of God heralds the former we know from other Scriptures; that the final judgment of the lost must also take place is declared with equal clearness. Here it may be that, as in some kindred passages, the two judgments are spoken of together. So it was in our Lord's utterance: "The hour is coming, in the which all that are in the graves shall hear his voice, and shall come forth; they that have done good unto the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil unto the resurrection of damnation (Jno: v. 28, 29). In one place or another, either at the judgment seat of Christ, the tribunal before which his servants shall stand, or before the great white throne, where the "rest of the dead" must appear, all in their "own order," shall come forth. "The men of Nineveh shall rise": "the Queen of the South shall rise." Tyre and Sidon, Sodom and Gomorrah, will be there. They that "sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt." "In the hour of death, and in the day of judgment, Good Lord, deliver us."

7. "And that Thou shouldst give reward to thy servants the prophets, to thy saints, and them that fear thy name, small and great." Then will take place that unerring discrimination of the deeds done in the body which will display in all its wonderful perfection the omniscience of the living God. Then, when "He will bring to light the hidden things of darkness and will make manifest the counsels of the hearts, then shall every man have praise of God. "The fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is," and "every man shall receive his own reward according to his own labour." The cup of cold water will not be forgotten, for "God is not unrighteous to forget your work and labour of love." "The small," the obscure, the unnoticed, as well as the front rank in the armies of God, "the great," all will have their place, their share, their reward. The works of many may be burned up; those of others will stand the fire. All reward will be of grace; yet He saith "my reward is with Me to give every man according as his work shall be." The parables of the talents and of the pounds will have their fulfilment. Oh, how blessed will they be to whom He shall say, "Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

8. "And the temple of God was opened in heaven, and there was seen in his temple the ark of his covenant." The mystery of God is not only finished but explained. His judgments are not only made manifest, but they are interpreted. The ark of his covenant, that divinely-ordained type of the glory of Christ, will be seen in the temple to which his saints will be admitted. Then will it be seen how the everlasting covenant, "ordered in all things and sure," has been the origin, the foundation, the pledge, and the security of all the dealings and ways of God with men. As Christ is the Ark, so also is He the Covenant (for such is He declared to be in Is. xlix. 8). He is the key to all the mysteries of time and of eternity. He is the Alpha and Omega, the First and the Last.

Oh! wondrous "revelation of Jesus Christ"! Are we nearing that most blessed moment? If the sixth angel has sounded long ago, if the second (or Turkish) woe is past, if the testimony of the witnesses is being finished, if the 1260 years are on the verge of completion, must not the seventh angel be about to sound? Is he not on the point of raising the dread trumpet to his lips?

"Even so, Lord Jesus, come quickly!"

THE DAUNTLESS MUSIC HALL, Lisson-grove, acknowledged to be "the very place" for aggressive Gospel work, as it is in the main thoroughfare, with two good entrances, and seating accommodation for nearly 500 people, has been taken by the West Marylebone Mission, and will be opened on September 29. Some necessary alterations will have to be made, costing about £55, towards which help is desired by James Sprunt, West Marylebone Mission, George-street, Lisson-grove, N.W.

FEMALE ORPHAN HOMES, Tangley Park, Hampton, Middlesex, is an institution which has seen many years of usefulness. The thirty-eighth report shows that of sixty-eight children in the Home at the end of the financial year, nineteen were new admissions. These were selected with care from a large number of applicants. "While not exhibiting crime or degradation, some of the particulars disclosed were not merely touching but terrible. Tales of want, of pittances earned by weak women, of heroic struggles to 'keep the little home together,' are not things of the past in mighty London, and bad times tell sadly upon the poor widow earning her scanty living by office-cleaning and needlework, or in domestic service." At the time of issuing the report seventy children were inmates of the Home. There is sufficient room, however, for 100, and that number would be admitted if funds allowed. The secretary is Mr. J. D. Cooper, 79, Finsbury-pavement, E.C.

Cheapness and Efficiency.

BY REV. J. H. HORSBURGH.

A letter, relative to the pecuniary needs of Chinese missionaries, appeared in your columns of January 26, entitled "Cheapness or Efficiency?" The spirit of that letter I thoroughly endorse, and I appreciate the delicate feeling which prompted it. The writer, whom all look up to and honour as a most conscientious missionary, is afraid, perhaps, lest his own generous conduct (for he regards the mission funds as sacred, and will take nothing for himself) should be construed as a reflection upon others; but, living at one of the open ports, he evidently does not know the conditions of life in Inland China, and is altogether over-anxious about his brethren, who he thinks are well nigh starving on "£50 or £60 a year."

This letter, published, I believe, as a leaflet, though so entirely well meant, is in effect a sweeping condemnation of the greatest mission in China, and must be, I fear, a sad, and quite unnecessary, discouragement to many loving friends who are supporting their own missionary out here, and to others who are planning to do so. It would be a thousand pities if one of the wholesomest and most promising features of missionary awakening in the present day should suffer any check.

Certainly the "cheap" missionaries themselves do not share the views expressed in this letter. Perhaps they rather dread the advent into their neighbourhood of missionaries with larger allowances, lest their work should be thrown back! The whole subject of cheap missions (so-called) is really an important one—much more important than appears on the surface. And without desiring further special reference to the letter in question, I should like to say something about it.

"Cheapness or Efficiency?" we are sometimes asked. I object to the comparison altogether. I maintain it is unfair, and it is not true. For is it not known that our foreign money is regarded by very many of us as a great enemy to the growth of the Chinese Christians, and often as a direct hindrance rather than a help to the efficiency of our work? It is this which lends so great importance to the subject. "Cheapness and Efficiency" will be found in the end, I most firmly believe, to be the truer way of stating the case. But I will leave this point for the moment, and consider the question more generally.

Friends of missionaries often say very kindly, "We believe strongly in carrying on the Lord's work economically, so that with the funds contributed as many workers may be sent forth as possible. But to give missionaries a mere pittance, and to cripple them in all directions, for the sake of saving a few pounds, is no economy, but a grievous waste of valuable lives. And, besides, the work done is inefficient."

With this I cordially agree. To starve a missionary and cripple his work, in order to save a few pounds, is the height of folly. Such a policy would deserve the strongest condemnation. But what has this to do with missionaries in Inland China who receive £50 or £60 a year? Absolutely nothing. And to use such words in connection with them is wholly misleading.

If missionaries in China, who receive £50 or £60 a year, are looked upon as cheap missionaries, and are supposed in consequence to be the victims of such great hardship, that their health is endangered and their work rendered inefficient, I am happy to be able to state positively that this is a complete misconception.

First, as regards health. Instances are sometimes quoted of missionaries who tried to live on a small sum of money, and who quickly broke down in health and had to return home. What saving, it is urged, is this? In reply I should like to say:

(1) Missionaries who do not try to live on a small sum of money break down just as much as those who do. In fact the health of the "cheap" missionaries in China is said to be (and my own observation bears out the statement) decidedly better than that of others; I do not say it is in consequence of their "cheapness."

(2) One may safely guarantee that those missionaries who do break down, because of poor food and general neglect, are not those who are spending £50 or £60 a year upon themselves, but very much less.

And (3) even if it were true that missionaries lost something in health by living frugal lives, it might nevertheless be worth while. Money is often so great an evil—such a direct source of inefficiency in missionary work—that I myself should be more satisfied to live five years in China, and break down in health at the end, if the natives had learned not to look to me for money, than to live ten years and have gathered round me a group of natives, who in one way or another had come to depend on me for their support.

Secondly, it is urged that missionaries who receive only £50 or £60 a year cannot afford to have a proper Chinese teaching, and therefore cannot learn to speak the language, and are practically of little use.

This is a most extraordinary idea. For the members of the C.I.M., who are, I suppose, "cheap" missionaries, are, to say the least, fully abreast of any missionary society in China in their quickness in learning the language, and in their proficiency in speaking it—and this often in spite of educational disadvantages which others probably do not labour under. But, from the beginning, they employ the best teachers!

A Chinese teacher teaches at least two missionaries. Harm rather than good would result if one missionary tried to study with a teacher the whole of his time. In most parts of China a teacher is well pleased to receive from £10 to £12 a year. And though you may get one for less, you will gain not one whit a better teacher by giving more. This sum divided between two is not oppressive, especially when the Missionary Society pays one-half, and thus reduces the individual missionary's expense to £2 10s. or £3 a year. Apart from housekeeping and clothing, this is about the only big expense he has. A missionary who has £50 or £60 a year has every bit as good a chance of learning to speak the language as if he had £500 or £600!

Thirdly, it is said that "cheap missionaries" cannot afford to employ workmen and servants, and therefore much of their time, which ought to be devoted to direct missionary work, is taken up in trivial secular matters.

This, again, is a very strange notion. For who does not know that missionaries, who by force of circumstances find themselves surrounded with workmen and servants, often long for a simpler life, just in order that they may be more free for spiritual work!

Workmen and servants mean ever so much looking after, and take up quantities of time. Moreover, they often become a source of trouble and weariness to the spirit, so that (in spite of many delightful exceptions) most people agree, happy is the man who has to do with fewest of them. Even with the best servants, missionaries are advised by the doctors that it is no waste of time to superintend their own cooking. But I am not aware that missionaries do.

The missionary who has £50 or £60 a year is able to employ all the workers and servants that are necessary. And every employé beyond that means extra trouble, extra anxiety, and a corresponding diminution of the time and freshness available for missionary work. Idle servants, at best, develop into idle Christians.

Fourthly, it is said "some missionaries have aged parents or relatives more or less dependent upon them, and it is impossible for them without a liberal salary to respond to such very natural claims." In this we must all sympathise. It is a matter which may not lightly be passed over nor put on one side.

But from personal knowledge I am able to state that a careful missionary who has £50 or £60 a year, can, without injustice to himself, afford to give away at least £20. And this is, perhaps, as much as he would have been able to spare had he remained at home.

In some cases, however, more may be needed, and I for one feel it is a grievous pity that any good man, who has relatives dependent on him, should be lost to the mission field because in his case the usual allowance would not be enough. No less strongly do I feel it is a shame that any good missionary should be exposed to so great a trial as the knowledge of a beloved parent's want, which, owing to his being in the mission field, he is unable to alleviate.

But, because one man needs £50 or £100 a year extra to send to aged or invalid parents, it is surely unnecessary to give twenty other men, who have no such call upon them, £50 or £100 a year extra too?

If the allowances are fixed on a scale which shall enable a missionary, after amply providing for his own wants, to have a large sum over to send home to dependent relatives, then it is evident that the large majority of missionaries, who have not relatives dependent upon them, will receive a great deal more than they have need of. And the number of missionaries that the Society is able to send into the mission field must, in consequence, be sadly curtailed!

Surely it would be quite easy, and much more sensible, for the Missionary Society to send the £50 or £100 a year to the aged parent, instead of sending out to the mission field twenty times that amount in order that the one parent may be relieved. This is the plan in my own Society (C.M.S.); why not in all?

Fifthly, we are told that a missionary is liable at times to have heavy extra expenses. He may have sickness in the house; he may meet with an accident; he may suffer losses; he may have unexpected claims upon his purse: and, it is asked, if in ordinary times he has barely enough to keep body and soul together, what is he to do in times like these? The imagination easily pictures a sick wife, starving neglected children, a distracted husband, and a dreadful series of acute miseries!

With my whole soul do I sympathise with any brother missionary who may be placed in circumstances in the least degree approaching to this. But the circumstances must be altogether exceptional for missionaries who receive £50 or £60 a year to find themselves in any such straits. And when the circumstances are altogether exceptional, how easy it would be for the Society to come forward and help, as in the previous case of one whose friends were dependent upon him.

Exceptional circumstances should be exceptionally dealt with, and should not, I submit, be made the ground upon which to establish the rule.

I want now to come to the root of the matter, and point out, I think conclusively, that £50 or £60 a year is not a mere pittance scarcely enough to keep body and soul together, as is supposed; but that it is really a very reasonable allowance. For £50 or £60 a year in Inland China, where most of the "cheap" missionaries are, is a totally different thing from £50 or £60 a year in England. I have lately been home, and I confess it would have been a sore puzzle had I been obliged, as a clergyman, to live on £50 or £60! But in Inland China, I say it advisedly, the difficulty would rather be, without extravagance, to spend more than that (I mean, of course, upon oneself).

For, to begin with, £50 or £60 a year mean £50 or £60 a year each, so that a man and his wife receive £100 or £120. And if they have children there is an extra allowance, perhaps of £10 or £12 for each child.

2. The missionary who has £50 or £60 a year has his house provided rent free. He has no rates and taxes, nothing to pay for repair, nor for furniture, no doctor's bills. His travelling expenses are paid for him, as well as all other expenses connected with the Mission. Probably his Society furnishes him with a good outfit, provides him with medicines, and perhaps pays half the salary of his teacher.

If he has children they are educated in whole or in part at the Society's expense. If not, I think they certainly ought to be.

3. In Inland China it is difficult to spend money. There is nothing to spend money upon of any importance. Often one may go for days or even weeks without spending a cash of pocket-money; whereas in England, what with trains and trams, papers, and nick-nacks, and this and that, the pence and sixpences slip through one's fingers at an alarming rate. Moreover, in England there are constant collections and calls of various kinds. In China it is not wise to give away much money. A few shillings go a long way.

4. Then food, wages, clothes, and the whole style of living are so much cheaper in Inland China than in England. A great part of the year two or three cotton garments suffice for clothing, and even winter clothing is far from expensive. From £8 to £9 a year will keep a good servant—food, wages, and all. A sheep costs a few shillings, a fowl a few pence, fish and game a few farthings, and eggs four or five a penny. Rice, grain, vegetables, fruit, lard, oil, spices, are all very cheap. Household utensils, garden utensils, stable utensils, almost everything we buy, are probably much more roughly made than in England, but not one quarter the price. Coal and firing are not expensive, and somehow with our Chinese clothes and Chinese houses, even in winter, we seem to need very little. Of course if we get things from home there is the home price to pay, and the extra expense of carriage. But the longer we live in China the less occasion do we find for sending orders home. The country itself supplies with a full hand nearly all our needs.

But I will not enter into further details. Suffice it to say that £50 in Inland China and £50 in England cannot be compared. When all things are taken into consideration, a missionary in Inland China who has £50 a year is probably in a better position than a man with three times that amount in England, who has his rent to pay and many other expenses which we, fortunately, know nothing about.

In my opinion, to call a missionary in Inland China who receives £50 or £60 a year a "cheap" missionary is a misnomer. He is, perhaps, as well off as his fellows at home, though they are receiving more money.

However that may be, let it be clearly understood that missionaries who have £50 or £60 a year can supply themselves with abundance of good wholesome food, good clothes, good teachers, good servants, and all other necessaries, and have a liberal margin over to give away or do what they like with.

The Position in Madagascar.

I believe it is now some time since any detailed information about Madagascar and the present position of mission work here has appeared in your columns, so that a few particulars on these points may not be uninteresting to many of your readers. Notwithstanding all that has been written about this country, much misconception evidently still prevails as to the actual progress that has been made, judging at least from short paragraphs which occasionally find their way into the newspapers, in which various forms of Christian work that have been in operation for years are mentioned as just commenced by friends newly arrived in the country. I make, therefore, no apology for this attempt to give a brief sketch of our position here to-day.

It is now about ten months since I returned to Antanànarivo (for a fourth period of service) after two years' furlough in England, and it has been very cheering to see the undoubted signs of the advance which has been made during my time of absence.

POLITICAL.

1. First, however, it may be of interest to remark that, Politically, very little change seems to have been made in Madagascar; that is, as far as one can judge, there seems little evidence of any increase of French in the island. There is apparently no alteration at all in the quiet, steady determination of the Government and people generally to hold their own in the management of their own affairs. And while desirous of keeping on friendly terms with the French and all other foreigners, the Queen and the Prime Minister allow of no foreign interference with the government of the country. The "tall talk" in the French Press of a "protectorate" in Madagascar seems simply ridiculous in the face of facts; and the Malagasy appear as much determined to keep the reality of such a thing outside the sphere of practical politics as they were stubbornly resolved to keep such a word as "protectorate" out of the text of their treaty. And so, although English Governments seem quite consented—as far as they are concerned—to hand over Madagascar, together with all English interests in this island, commercial and religious, to the tender mercies of a French protectorate, we owe our freedom of action, and our perfect liberty to work in every way, to the kindness of the native Government, and the confidence of the Malagasy in the disinterestedness of our aims and our labour for them.

The Queen quietly but firmly maintains her right to issue direct from herself the exequaturs of foreign consuls; and, although some French judges arrived in the capital a few months ago, no attempt appears to have been made to enforce their jurisdiction over any but their own compatriots. Indeed, the large staff of French officials in Antanànarivo and the other towns seems absurdly in excess of any actual business they can possibly have to transact.

SOCIAL

2. In Social Matters, and in everything affecting Progress and Civilisation, there appeared to be marked advance during my absence in England. One of the most obvious proofs of this is the increasing use of burnt brick for buildings. About twenty years ago the introduction of sun-dried brick caused a great advance in the construction of houses and churches; but a large number of good, well-built houses of the more durable material may now be seen all over the capital and in other places; while few congregations will now think of building themselves a new church unless its outer walling at least is of burnt brick. Two of the large city congregations are now erecting handsome churches; one of them, that at Anàlakèly, under my care, and from my designs, is now approaching completion.

A mile and a-half to the north of Antanànarivo the new block of buildings forming the Mission Hospital is a conspicuous object in the view from that part of the city, and the wards of this hospital have been constantly filled with patients since the building was opened two years ago. Near the mission centre of Isoàvina, Mr. Peake's station, about ten miles east of Antanànarivo, a very completely-arranged leper asylum is now nearly finished for the reception of a large number of those unfortunates who are subject to that dreadful and seemingly incurable disease, leprosy, which is not at all uncommon in this country.

Since our return a large and more commodious structure has been opened by the Queen, who was formerly a scholar in the school, for the L.M.S. Girls' High School, under Miss Craven's superintendence. This institution is situated in one of the chief thoroughfares in the centre of the capital, and with its numerous class-rooms will accommodate between 300 and 400 pupils. Another new building opened during our stay in England is a Home for Girls, where a number of young women are trained by Miss Gilpin, of the Friends' Mission.

It may also be mentioned that a well-equipped observatory, belonging to the Jesuit Mission, is now completed and in full working order; it is built on a prominent hill, about two miles to the east of Antanànarivo.

RELIGIOUS.

In Religious Matters it is very cheering to be able to report steady progress during the last two or three years. This is manifest, not in any large numerical additions to the crowd of professedly Christian Malagasy, but in the much deeper and more earnest religious character of numbers of our people, especially the young people of our congregations. In many places a real revival and quickening of spiritual life, such as had never been known before—hardly hoped for by some of us here in Madagascar—has taken place. (Within the last week or two we hear of services where 240 professed to find salvation.) And many of these young disciples are showing a delightful enthusiasm in all religious work, which is leading them to devise new methods of reaching their still heathen, or only nominally Christian, fellow-countrymen. Some of these have combined to form a little Salvation Army, and preach constantly in the great open-air markets which are such an important feature in the social life of the Malagasy. One young man has given up his business as a trader, and spends his whole time going from market to market preaching the glad tidings, and trusting to God to supply his own and his wife's needs.

During the past two or three years many Societies of Christian Endeavour have been commenced in connection with most of the older congregations, and although those are sometimes looked upon rather askance by the elder and more conservative people, they are doing much to strengthen the religious life of the young folks, and to direct their energies and zeal in various forms of service for Christ. Sunday schools are also increasing in number; but we sadly need some one full of enthusiasm and energy, who would come out from England or America, and would make it his special work to organise Sunday schools, to teach the teachers, to show how infant classes would be conducted, and to point out the best methods of working the Sunday school. Here is a grand field of labour open to some earnest young missionary. Will not someone offer his service to the Lord for this department of work? Could not the Sunday School Union of England or of America send us the right man (and woman) for this pressing need?

In a recent number of one of our Malagasy periodicals, I notice an article on "Religious Effort, and the Various Organisations in the Capital," in which a list of seven or eight different societies is given. Most of these Fikambànana, as the Malagasy call them, are carried on almost entirely by the native Christians themselves (chiefly by the young people); and it may be interesting to give the titles of these, so as to show what forms religious work is taking among us. There are (1) our Congregational Union (or Isan-ènim-bòlana, i.e. "every six months") of all the churches—800 or 900 in number—in the central province of Imèrina. This is not only a Home Union, but is also the Malagasy Missionary Society for sending native evangelists to the distant heathen tribes of this great island. (2) A society for supplying preachers to the dark and ignorant villages of the central province, and for preaching in markets, etc., as already noticed. (3) An association of medical students, and those who have taken their diplomas, for providing native medical missionaries for needy districts of the country. (4) An Orphanage, having Homes in the capital for boys and girls. (5) A Women's Temperance Society, in connection with the great American women's temperance organisation. (6) An Auxiliary Bible Society, for supplying the Scriptures gratuitously, and at cheap rates, where desirable. (7) And, the most recently formed, a Tract Society for printing and circulating tracts.

PLANS AND PROGRESS.

From these few facts I think it will be seen that we have great reason to thank God and take courage. But we sadly need more help. If we could only get our friends in England to realise the wide and open doors there are before us in all directions, I feel sure we should have more coming forward to take part in this glorious work in Madagascar. Need we be surprised if progress is comparatively slow, when we remember that each missionary here has a district averaging from seventy to eighty congregations, widely scattered over an area bigger than most English counties, and all looking to him for guidance and stimulus and teaching? Besides this, there are several large tracts of country, each as large as Wales, to which no Gospel has yet been preached, and containing many populous tribes who are still utterly untouched by Christianity. In literary work we are constantly, even if slowly, adding to the literature already existing in the Malagasy language. The latest important additions to our books are exegetical commentaries on the Gospel of John, on the Epistle to the Hebrews, and on the Epistle of James. Besides this, I am now engaged on a new edition of our Bible Dictionary, the largest work (910 pp.) we have yet published at our Press; a Concordance of the Malagasy Bible is now nearly completed; and Miss Gilpin, of the Friends' Mission, has now finished the "copy" for a complete Reference Bible for our version of the Scriptures. Bible reading is certainly advancing among the Malagasy; in a very few days the first instalment of 10,000 copies of the new Revised Bible was all bought up, and numbers of the people are looking anxiously for the next shipment of 20,000 copies. We have now a native literature numbering between 50,000 and 60,000 pages (or about 550 books averaging 100 pages each); and with nearly 90,000 children in our schools, and adherents numbering nearly 300,000, we may hope for a continual increase in the number of those who will buy books and will read them.

Our College continues to train and send out men as native evangelists and pastors; and during the session just closed I have commenced a new kind of work in connection with it, which has proved a great success. Feeling very strongly the desirability of utilising still further the resources of our building and all its appliances, I began last January extra classes for pastors and preachers, chiefly those in the capital and its vicinity; that is, for those who cannot give up all their time and attend as regular students every day. About 120 entered their names and bought the different class-books, and although Government service, owing to the hurricanes in January and February, was very pressing, an average attendance of between seventy and eighty intelligent and earnest men has been kept up for five months. This I think very encouraging, and will, we trust, raise the quality and value of the preaching in many of our suburban and country congregations.

I commend this work in Madagascar to the increased sympathy and practical help of our British churches.

THE GREATEST LOVE IN THE WORLD.

A TALK TO CHILDREN.

By REV. GEORGE WILSON,

Literary Superintendent of the B. & F. Bible Society.

"Hereby perceive we the love of God, because He laid down his life for us."—1 John iii. 16.

Whenever I am to see the faces of children before me, I think before I come, What shall I say to them? I listen and wait to be told what I am to say; and I seem to hear the answer. I heard it again last night; it seemed to say to me, "Tell the children about Christ; tell them that God loves them; always tell the children that." That answer seems to me to be clever every time I ask what I should say to the children. The older we grow we seem to understand that that is the best of all things to know.

Suppose you had been living a long time ago in the beautiful land of Greece, from which we have learned so much, and you had seen some girls or lads sitting together; suppose one had said to the others, "Who, of all that ever you knew or heard of, loved the most?" Do you know what the girl or boy would have answered? I think I can tell you. They would have told this story, which I will tell to you as it has been told by one of the greatest writers of Greece, and as it is read to-day in England by many students and others. Let us listen to the Greek girl.

Long ago, in the olden time, there lived a king—young, very rich, very handsome. He had many soldiers and a kingdom, and the love of his people; and, what is far better than all, he had a wife, like himself young and fair, who loved him tenderly.

Well, in the middle of all that, there came one day a voice to the king (so the story goes); and when the king heard it he became cold, and trembled. What was the matter? The voice said: "King, you are young, but you must die, unless you can find someone to die for you; if you can, you may live on." The king's heart began to beat again. "Yes," he said, "I can get some one to die for me, I am sure."

He went away and sought out one of his friends who had been very kind to him. "You have often said how much you care for me; surely you will care for me to-day. Will you lay down your life for me, or must I die?" The king looked into his friend's face and saw—what some of us have seen where we expected love—that it was a love of selfishness. The friend shook his head and said: "Oh, my king, I, too, am young. I have a wife and children; do not ask me to die. I will give you money and many things, but I cannot lay down my life for you."

The king went to another friend, who made the same reply. At last he said: "There is my father; he is a very old man, and has not long to live at any rate. He cares for his son; I will go to him." He went to his father, and said: "I thought I had friends in my kingdom; they have praised me so much. But I find I have no friend who cares about me so well as to save me from death. Will you lay down your life for me?" And the father said: "Oh, my son, you do not know how dear life is to an old man; there is so little of it left. I cannot lay down my life for you." Then the king went to his mother. He was getting frightened, and sad, and sorrowful now. He told his mother the story, but she said, "My son, I cannot." Think of it. Not one of them loved him enough to die for him after all they had said.

By this time the king's wife had heard of it. She went at once to her husband and said: "Why did you not tell me of this? Why did you not come to me first of all? I will lay down my life for you; I will lay it down gladly." Yes, and she did it. I will not speak of him letting her do it; I will only say she did it. And the poet who tells the story has told it so that we can hardly read it without tears. He tells how she went away to the rooms where she used to live, to the chairs where she sat, and to the bed which she used to rest upon. She took farewell of them, and of the servants one by one, and then she went away to die. And the Greek girl who told the story to her companions would have said, "No one ever loved like her—like Alcestis, the king's wife."

Now, my children, have you a story to tell in England as good as that? Yes you have a far better story. There is no story that has ever been told in Greek or English so good as the story we have read a little bit of to-day in the Gospel of Luke, and of which we are told in this verse: "Hereby perceive we the love of God, because He (Christ) laid down his life for us." Do you feel the love of Christ? I hope you do. I wish we men and women understood it better than we do. I am sorry and ashamed to think we are so cold-hearted about it. God has to make us children again in many ways, and to give us much sorrow and trial and many tears before we can understand it. I hope you will know it while you are children, and that as you grow old, whatever you forget, or give up, or doubt, or leave behind, you will never, never leave this behind you for one moment—that the love that surpasses all other love in all the world was not the love of Alcestis, but the love of Christ who laid down his life for us.

CRIPPLES AT PLAY.

Eleven brakes were driven up to Smith's Retreat, Epping Forest, last Thursday morning. Each brake was loaded with children. The children were very quiet, not like ordinary children, for there was no shouting, and none of them showed a disposition to jump over the side of a brake before it came to a standstill. Even when the drivers pulled up their horses the children did not move. The little ones were cripples, and one by one they were lifted from their places and planted on the sward by the willing arms of men and women who have kind hearts. The 300 little cripples were from C. L. Boyer's Drift Children's Mission and Home Cripples' Band. They are called "Home Cripples," as they live not at the Mission, but at their homes, such as they are; Mr. Boyer and those who are interested with him in the Mission believing that they are happier with their mothers, if their dreary existence is brightened by visits of those who are interested in their welfare and by occasional outings like that of last Thursday. Accompanying the brakes was a van loaded with perambulators. These were intended for such cripples as were unable to walk even with the aid of crutches.

Once upon the ground the children fastened their gaze upon the huge mounds of buns, tarts, and other luxuries, with which the front of Smith's Retreat was decorated. But none of them asked questions. They waited patiently, as if accustomed to do a lot of waiting, and to get very little for it. They came from Hackney and Bow and Mile End, and other quarters where greensward is scarce and trees are scarcer, and where bread-and-jam and tea, to say nothing of meat, are not served up for luncheon every day. They acted like little old men and women, and when told that the first item on the programme was luncheon, they made no more fuss about it than if to eat luncheon were rather a bore. Those who could walk took their places at the long tables. Those who could at least sit, if they could not walk, were carried to their places. The "helpers" numbered a score, and they were as tender of the little cripples as if the latter belonged to them. The children ate their luncheon in a matter-of-fact way. Upon the manner of most of them it made no change, so far as a stranger could notice. Others, however, particularly the little hunchbacks, brightened up, and began to talk and laugh like children whose backs are whole. During the afternoon other children came to Smith's Retreat, but the little cripples did not fraternise with them. Other children, they say, laugh at them, and they do not like to be laughed at.

Luncheon having been digested, the children began to amuse themselves, or permitted themselves to be amused, as best they could. For those who were athletically inclined, foot-races, or foot-and-crutch races, were organised. The way some of them got over the ground made the donkey-boys stare. The little cripples looked at the donkeys, but did not intimate a desire to mount any of them. The donkeys looked, apparently, at nothing, as they usually do, and were content to stand and wait for customers that they knew would never come, at least from Smith's Retreat. They were probably astonished to see little cripples on crutches cover the ground at such a pace as some of Mr. Boyer's cripples did.

The little cripples who could not walk were wheeled about in perambulators. This duty was performed by a red-bearded man who worked like a Trojan. The man was not connected with the mission in any way. He is a docker; and he has a weakness for cripples, and as soon as he heard that three hundred cripples were to spend the day in Epping Forest, he hied himself thither, and spent his time in wheeling the little unfortunates through the pleasantest paths he could find. There were six children of one family in the party. Four of them were blind. They were all very small; yet one, a girl, was twenty years old. These six sat in one spot, in the shade of a wide-spreading oak, all day. The two children who could see took care of the four who were blind. One little fellow, who could just walk with crutches, spent most of his time in smiling. Upon arriving at home he crawls to his corner, and lies there quietly, as if he were a dog and the corner was his kennel. A girl who could not walk, and who looked as if she might die at any moment, had been found in a cellar. There she had lain for years, until all colour and almost life had been bleached out of her.

It is impossible for those who enjoy health to imagine the pleasure that even a single day's outing is to such children. The object of the mission, Mr. Boyer said, is to put a little joy into the lives of children who are cut off even from the poor pleasures enjoyed by other children of the neediest classes. They are visited by those who are officially connected with the mission, and by friends who take an interest in it. Little presents, in the shape of toys, are given to them, and sometimes they are clothed. Thursday's outing was given at the expense of Mr. Shorey.—Pall Mall Gazette.

CRIMSON RHODODENDRONS.

"Be content with such things as ye have."—Heb. xiii. 5.

"What pity they are scentless,
These gorgeous blossoms red!"
"We'll take them as God gives them,"
A child most sweetly said.

Thus let us ever answer,
Whatever may befall;
We'll take it as God gives it,
And thank Him for it all.

The lives of some are brilliant
With rhododendron flowers;
Perchance they miss the sweetness
Of honeysuckle bowers.

But David had his mission
As shepherd and as king;
In high estate and lowly,
We all may praises sing.

Contented with the blessings
Which God vouchsafed to give;
In every station seeking
To Christ our Lord to live.

ON THE SANDS.

ILFRACOMBE.

The children's services this year, conducted by Mr. W. R. Moore, are being wonderfully blessed, and are well attended. The usual lantern services are held in the Rock at Wildersmouth Beach, where grand testimony is borne by God's servants to the many attracted by the unique and pretty sight. On Sunday last, notwithstanding a storm of rain, some hundreds were listening with rapt attention to Ned Wright and Rev. G. C. Williamson, who both spoke on "What think ye of Christ?"

THE CHURCH ARMY LABOUR HOMES appear to have the power to draw out the best qualities of their inmates, who have in many instances been tramps, criminals, or inebriates. A week of self-denial was proposed by the executive, and some of these "poor brothers" readily volunteered to chop and make up two hundred bundles of firewood without any remuneration. It is feared that unless funds are forthcoming two of the Labour Homes will have to be closed, whereas others are specially needed in various parts of the provinces.

NOTES ON DAILY READINGS.

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 3.—PSALM XXIV.

This processional Hymn well fits in with 2 Sam. vi., when the procession, bearing the Ark, climbed slowly to the fastness of Mount Zion. It is remarkable that, at this proud moment, the Jewish singer realised that the wide earth and its fulness was not less in God's care than the favoured shrine in which He put his name. All the earth is Christ's, by creation and redemption. Therefore, He waits until it owns Him from the river to the ends of the earth.

The question put in verse to the singers toiling upwards is one that each, who desires to dwell in the house of the Lord for ever, may well put to himself. The one unalterable condition is purity. Hands not foul with money-grubbing or blood; heart sweet and clean; the desires not mounting up after vanity; the lips ever speaking truth. Such a man is blessed already, and will receive even more of that righteousness which He seeks, and which is the seed of the harvest of blessedness. To seek it is to find (6).

The challenge to the gates of Zion, low-browed and needing to lift themselves to make room, may well have been uttered at the gates of heaven on the occasion of Christ's Ascension; and they need to be spoken at the portals of each sinner's heart. Let Him in, He is King. He is strong and mighty, to overcome in thee and for thee. He is mighty in battle, and not one of thy besetting sins shall be able to assert itself against his authority. He shall come in.

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 4.—PSALM XXV.

A Psalm of perennial interest. Its acrostic form keeps it from manifesting or developing any progressive conception, but it meanders in sweet contemplation and trust. Luther put it in his office for the dying.

The previous Psalm told us not to lift our soul to vanity; this bids us lift it up to the Lord. What a beautiful conception, as though we were constantly arising above the turmoil of earth to saturate ourselves in the light and love of God. Such an attitude ensures deliverance, however many be our foes, for we are secure from their reach in God (3). But more than this, we need guidance, forgiveness, manifested love. All these are to be had in answer to our prayer, though we have no plea but his goodness (7), and are ourselves utterly unworthy (8). But our sinfulness and misery constitute our best argument with God, because He is so good and upright.

Be meek, and He will guide. Keep his covenant and testimonies, and thou wilt find all his dealings to be lovingkindness and truth. Fear Him, and He will instruct thee in the chosen way prepared from all eternity for thy feet; yea, thou shalt lodge each night in his goodness as in a pavilion.

Confessing, trusting, fearing, waiting, pleading, looking upward, such is the spirit of the Psalmist. His confidence is in God's name and character. He has no plea but his necessities. And in answer to his cry there is secret converse (14), deliverance (15), forgiveness (18), keeping (20), and redemption (22). O happy soul. Trouble may swirl around thee with turbid, threatening waters, but thou art secure!

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 5.—PSALM XXVI.

There are several similar expressions in this and the preceding Psalms, especially in the references to the Psalmist's walk. He appeals to God for vindication, and asks that he may be tested and tried, with the inference that God will find no cause of blame. We are not wont to use such expressions because of the greater sensitiveness of the Christian conscience, under the light of fuller revelation and of the Spirit of Pentecost. But, at the same time, with respect to the special sin which the Psalmist disclaims of association with the ungodly, we may, and should, be able to lift clean hands and a disentangled heart to God.

Let us beware of men of vanity and dissimulation, of the evil doers and the wicked (5). Let us come out and be separate, not touching the unclean thing. Let us walk circumspectly, not as fools, but as wise. Our hands should be washed in innocency, as the priests' were in water before they entered on their sacred ministry. And then we may freely enter into God's house, holding communion with Him where his glory shines. The more we have hidden converse with God, the more shall we be drawn aside from vain and evil men. We need more of this; not always to pray, or to work, but to commune, to muse, to worship in the inner shrine; and the effect will appear in the holiness and righteousness of our daily life. So will our course be upward, like that of the eagle, which leaves twittering sparrows far below.

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 6.—PSALM XXVII.

The two sections of this Psalm, 1—6, 7—14, are somewhat different in their tone: the one exultant, the other more subdued and pensive. But the heart trusts and waits. What names for God—Light, Salvation, Stronghold of Life, and all mine. And, as though this were not enough, there is blended the reminiscences of past deliverances. Some have even thought that the Psalmist goes back on the defeat of Goliath in his early life. And what God had done, He would do again. Should his heart fear? Should he be afraid, though engirdled by war? Instead of allowing himself to be perturbed by all these causes of dread, he set himself on one thing only—to live in the perpetual sense of God's presence, beholding his beauty, and enquiring in his temple. Let us set our hearts on this also, then we shall be safe. Trouble shall break its waves on God, but shall have no power to disturb the rest of the soul, which, hidden in his secret place, shall spend its hours in song.

Note the repeated seek. These things cannot be had but for earnest effort, and the consciousness of God's love will never make us independent of earnest prayer. God cannot reject or forsake thee, poor seeker; thy power to seek is his gift. Wait for God, and let thy heart be firm.

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 7.—PSALM XXVIII.

We have three pleas with God, the one arising from our certain destruction apart from Him, the next because He has Himself taught us to pray, but the most cogent is because He is Jehovah, our Rock. Because of what He is to us, in his redeeming and unchanging grace, we have a claim that He cannot disappoint.

We may well ask to be spared the fate of the wicked, yet we need not fear it; so careful is God that He will not now permit the up-gathering of tares for fear that one stalk of wheat be injured, how much more will He see to it that we are not gathered with the tares for the last awful burning. The Psalmist's prayer sketches with unerring accuracy the sure result of the sinner's life. They shall reap as they sowed. They shall be inevitably broken down.

As in so many Psalms, the heart of the singer has become lighter and gladder. He knows that God has heard his cry. His very faith has brought him help. "I am helped." And forthwith his heart is filled with a great joy. When you are glad, praise him with voice and song. And then turn to plead for the flock of God, that the Good Shepherd would save, bless, and tend it.

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 8.—PSALM XXIX.

The Psalmist's soul is stirred, and he seems unable to find words to express his emotion, so he calls on the angels, the first-born sons of light, to give to Jehovah the glory due unto his name. O, my soul, hast thou ever been so full of adoration that it was all too much for thee to tell!

A thunderstorm breaks. It is the voice of God; so we are told seven times. It rolls over the Mediterranean's many waters. Soon it crashes over the northern hills, so that Lebanon and Sirion (Hermon) sway to and fro in the motion of the storm-swept cedars. Now the lightning fire flashes, as though the thunder hewed out a fragment from the lowering cloud. Thus the storm rolls over to Kadesh, on the eastern Jordan bank, and panic reigns among the wild animals that frequent its rich pasture lands. And all the while in God's temple (perhaps the heavenly one) the sons of God are singing "Glory!" All storms end on that note. And the glory of God is always peace and goodwill on earth.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 9.—PSALM XXX.

Some great deliverance is here commemorated in song. When God has raised you up, be sure to raise Him up in adoring love. When the brook of your mercy is full, let it flow out in music. Perhaps just now one of the more plaintive Psalms befits you. But your time will come. There are joy-days in all lives. And when God has delivered you from peril and death, then turn to this Psalm, and there will be no note of it in excess of your needs.

Note how gladly the Psalmist recites the name of God. It is as if he could not say it too often; and all that Jehovah is for himself. "O Lord, my God." Notice what God does for men. He heals them, He brings them up from Sheol, He keeps them alive, He loves to fill the soul with blessedness. The darkness is for a moment, the sunshine for a lifetime. Tears occupy but a small part of life, though we remember them most bitterly. There are fewer rainy days than sunny ones in the year. Weeping comes in to lodge in the evening (R.V., marg.), but in the morning she steals out by the back-door, because Joy has come in at the front

INTERNATIONAL S. S. LESSONS.

SEPTEMBER 10.

Paul at Rome, Acts xxviii. 20-31.

Golden Text, Rom. i. 16.

The former verses of this chapter describe the interesting incidents which follow the shipwreck of Paul and his companions (1—10), and the course taken from Malta to Rome (11—15). The journey began about the beginning of February, A.D. 61, after three months' delay at Malta (11). It was about March 1 when they arrived at Rome.

In two ways God comforted and encouraged his servant. (1) At Appii Forum, a small town more than forty miles from the city, and at the Three Taverns, a place of entertainment for travellers about ten miles nearer the city, brethren from Rome came to meet and welcome him. Paul was only a man, and it is not impossible that fear may have mingled with hope as he neared the city he had longed to visit. The sympathy and affection of other Christians was a means of strength and comfort to him (15). And (2) when he entered into Rome, special favour appears to have been shown to him by the Roman Centurion (16). He was still a prisoner, bound by a chain to a soldier, but he was allowed to be separate from the other prisoners, and to dwell in a private house (30). It was probably owing to the intercession of Julius that this favour was granted to him.

Paul's first interview with the Jews dealt with matters of a personal nature, and was designed to clear away any misconceptions which might have prejudiced them against his teaching (17-22). He could not go out to the synagogue, so sent for "the chief of the Jews" (17), a term which would include, with the rulers of the synagogue, any others who held prominent positions. The important part of his message is that in which he explains that he is in bondage because of "the hope of Israel" (20). There could be no stronger proof that the Christian religion is but the complement and fulfilment of Judaism. The Old Testament is always looking forward to a Coming One; the New Testament declares that the expected Deliverer has come. The reply of the Jews is remarkable (21 and 22); but all they profess is ignorance of any charge laid against him. Since Paul's appeal to Rome, no messengers could have set out from Judea to reach Rome before him. They knew something of Christianity—as a sect everywhere opposed (22). The triumphs of the Gospel have always been won in the face of opposition.

Paul's second interview was with any who came (23—29). The audience was a large one. The term "many" (23) implies a larger attendance than might have been expected. They were Jews: for Paul's invariable rule was "to the Jews first" (Rom. i. 18). The bitter treatment he had received from them had not lessened his affection for them. The service lasted "from morning till evening (23). Neither speaker nor hearers appear to have grown weary. The matter was so pressing and urgent to Paul that even those who had no intention of receiving his message were bound to hear. Paul's method may be gathered from three words. First, he "expounded" as our Lord had done to his Apostles (Luke xxiv. 27—44). He recalled the predictions of the Old Testament, and set over against them the life and character and work and resurrection of Jesus. Next, he "testified" from his own experience of what Christ had done. Testimony without exposition may mislead because it does not instruct. Exposition without testimony is cold and unattractive. And, next, he "persuaded." Because he valued it, he could plead with men to receive it also. The effect was the usual one (24). The Gospel makes a division. How much is involved in such a statement! See the contrast in Jno. iii. 36. Decide the question as to which of these two sides is yours.

Among those who believed not there was division also (25), hence the final word of the Apostle. It is God's word, not his. The manner in which it is introduced shows two things: first, that Paul believed the book of Isaiah to be written by Isaiah himself; and, second, that Paul recognised Isaiah as inspired by the Holy Ghost (25). Let us beware of any theory which does not allow us to speak of the Old Testament in the same way. The hardening of heart of which this quotation speaks is not to be regarded as the work of God, except as he simply confirms the sentence they pass upon themselves. Everyone who is bent upon hardening his heart will find that the Gospel heard and disregarded will effectually do it for him. Paul's reference to the Gentiles as being willing to hear (28) was not in order to anger the Jews, but rather to provoke them to hear by the example of the Gentiles.

Of the subsequent history of Paul we have a few hints in his epistles. It is supposed that after his release from prison he visited Asia Minor and Greece, and probably Spain. In A.D. 65 he was made a prisoner at Ephesus, taken to Rome, and after being confined in a terrible dungeon there, was beheaded as a martyr to the faith he had lived and preached.

Mr. AITKEN on MISSION PREACHING.

In a full-sized pamphlet, Mr. Elliot Stock has published a Report of the Conference of Diocesan Missioners on Missions, which was held at the Church House in April last. The theory and practice of mission preaching is a subject fully worthy of thoughtful deliberation. At the conference papers were read and addresses delivered, which represented remarkable variety of experience and divergence of ecclesiastical views. At an early stage of the conference demand was made for "definite instruction," by which was generally meant an inculcation of sacerdotal and sacramental doctrine.

Rev. W. Hay Aitken, while allowing that a thread of sound doctrinal teaching should run through mission preaching, maintained that the real object of mission preaching is to induce, or be the means in God's hands of inducing, a definite crisis in the spiritual experience of the unawakened, the worldly-minded, and the ungodly. He said: "When you have preached, with whatever power God has given you, what is it that you aim at in the after-meetings that you proceed to hold? Are you aiming at diverting people's minds from to which you have brought them up, by introducing a subject suitable for those who are devout, but wholly unsuitable to those who are beginning to be awakened to the consciousness that they are lost souls? Or are you endeavouring to strike the iron while it is hot by calling for a full and complete surrender of the soul to Christ, and for an immediate believing acceptance by the grace of God, through faith in our Lord? This last is the view I have always taken of an after-meeting. We hold it because we understand that 'the devil cometh immediately,' as soon as the seed is sown. We know as a matter of fact that when a powerful sermon has been preached, before people get to their homes they probably meet somebody with whom they talk about the last election, or the last football match, and thus the impression is dissipated. So we have come to the conclusion that it is only by endeavouring to anticipate the Evil One who cometh immediately, with a view to getting the seed well into the soil, that we can hope to reap real, permanent, and definite results...If the object of a mission is to make people, for instance, good Churchmen, then let this be clearly understood—'we hold missions in order to make people good Churchmen'; or, on the other side, the object of a mission is to propagate Calvinism, to make people believe in particular redemption, and in the five points—if that is our object, let us say so, and stick to it. But if my object is to win souls there and then for Christ, and to lead men to the believing acceptance of Jesus Christ as their Saviour; well, then, let me neither talk about the five points nor anything else that will divert them from the one specific end I have in view. Let me endeavour, methodically, earnestly, with all the spiritual power God gives me, to lead them, step by step, to the Cross of Calvary."

Among those who took part in the discussion was the Archbishop of Canterbury, who emphasised a two-fold need as follows:—(1) To bring back the mission to the idea that it is while parochial retreats must deal with a wholly different class of people for a different purpose; and (2) that it is a painful duty to refuse, on the highest grounds, missions to places where it is not believed that the mission spirit will exemplify itself in the future work of the clergyman." Rev. B. W. Maturin, representing the "Cowley Fathers," advocated doctrinal instruction, as also did other speakers, with special reference to "confession" and participating in the communion.

Against this position, Mr. Aitken spoke with a vigour approaching to vehemence. He said: "Before you can guarantee that a penitent is absolved, you must have the spiritual capacity of insight to enable you to discern that man's inmost soul; and to decide that he has trusted himself to the Saviour, and that he has committed his soul into that Saviour's hands. Then you can say he is saved, and whether you absolve him or not, he is a forgiven man. But if you cannot tell whether that man is really in a state of salvation, whether he has really trusted his soul into the hands of Jesus Christ or not, and you say to him, 'I absolve thee,' he goes away saying within himself, 'God's priest has absolved me, therefore I am absolved,' when all the time he may be yet in his sins, never having rested his soul upon the person of Jesus Christ. Thus you have done an irreparable damage to that soul; nay, you may have been the means of that man's damnation. His blood may be on your skirts." In another address, Mr. Aitken spoke in some detail of the abiding character of the results of missions held on the lines he advocated.

MADAME TEL SONO.

Madame Tel Sono is about to leave England in order to establish her projected Christian Training School and Free Normal School for girls in "The Britain of the East." Towards this object she has collected about £600 in America, and a similar amount in England and Scotland. She will make a beginning with this, although it will be a beginning on a smaller scale than she expected when she came among us for "Jesus money."

The story of Madame Tel Sono has already been frequently told. At the age of thirteen she "found the true God," and "never worshipped an idol." That is exceptional; but the entire career of the "little Japanese woman," as she calls herself, has been exceptional. When aged twenty-six she began business as a lawyer in Tokio—such a thing as had never been known before. Recognising the needs of her sisters, she set about means for their education and spiritual enlightenment. She has been a Christian for several years, and is determined that religion shall be at the base of all her intellectual measures.

In a recent circular, Madame Tel Sono says:—"The customs of Japan are unlike those of England and America; all the customs coming from the higher ranks of society are imitated by the lower classes. If one in the higher ranks becomes a Christian, the news comes to hundreds of the lower. But the missionary cannot reach the higher classes; therefore I must take up Christian work among them, as, in God's providence, I am a woman of that class. Help me to do a mighty work for Jesus among my countrywomen. If I can begin a school in my native city of Tokio, many will come to study, and thus will learn of the true Saviour."

Letters to Madame Tel Sono should be addressed to the Japanese Consulate, 84, Bishopsgate-street, E.C.

THE SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING THE DUE OBSERVANCE OF THE LORD'S DAY has issued its sixty-second report, which contains much valuable information. After giving details of the measure of patronage accorded to public libraries and museums opened on the Lord's Day, it says:—"Were the numerical success tenfold what it is, the committee would still be strongly convinced that it is not right on the Lord's Day to supply the means of amusement in open competition with the means of grace. They would still regard the movement as not expedient in the interests of the working classes, knowing that wherever Sunday amusement becomes a national characteristic Sunday labour speedily becomes a national curse." The offices of the Society is 20, Bedford-street, Strand, Rev. Dr. Peake, secretary.

GLASGOW FOUNDRY BOYS.

There is a map of Glasgow extant over which are dotted eighty-six special landmarks. They denote the meeting places of the Foundry Boys' Religious Society. They are scattered all over a densely-populated area, and so carefully and plentifully have they been placed, that the claim is made on behalf of the organisation that it meets the needs of the non-churchgoing young people of the city and neighbourhood.

What are the methods of this Society, with its membership of 20,000 lads and girls? In the religious department the greatest importance is given to the Sabbath forenoon meeting. There is a staff of 2800 workers available for it. In each of the eighty-six meetings the proceedings are the same; each chairman is supplied with a timed programme, to which he is expected to keep. There are twenty-four minutes for praise; fifteen for an address: fifteen for four prayers; five for simultaneous repetitions of Scripture texts; and the hour is up with one minute for a collection. Even the educational bent of the collection is worth notice. Last year the amount given was over £1300.

With regard to the educational department, the initiation and management of evening classes does not lie with the Society. The School Board undertakes the duty of providing these, but the association sees that the children attend, and where it is needed, the way is smoothed by the payment of fees. The boys are well represented in the commercial and industrial classes, while sewing, cookery, and laundry classes strongly attract the senior girls. The value of the lantern for educational, moral, and temperance purposes is apparently well understood and appreciated. There is an average of 400 volumes in circulation monthly from a central library, to develop studious and thoughtful habits. There is a provident department to encourage self-help, and nineteen savings banks are in active operation with no fewer than 6400 open accounts.

The social department is evidently managed with vigour tempered with discretion. To keep children in health-giving activity is a grand preventive of evil habits. For the summer there are Saturday afternoon excursions, flower shows, swimming baths, and weekly encampments. Instrumental and vocal music is cultivated in the winter in a variety of fashions; while in recreative and athletic clubs, under proper guidance and training, the young people are able to work off their unmeasured endowment of energy.

This mere enumeration of the various parts of the machinery can give no idea of the hearty goodwill and Christian enthusiasm which keeps it all in motion, still less the beautiful results which are continually appearing in the lives of the taught. There are thousands of men and women to-day, not only in Glasgow, but all round the world, who bless the day when their youthful steps were led to these Sabbath-morning meetings.

This energetic society seems as much a part of the public life of Glasgow as its City Council. It must not only be maintained; it must keep pace with the times and the growing needs of the latest generation.

All honour to the liberal hands and hearts that are pledged to the undertaking. What greater service can man or woman do than to leave behind them, as the result of untiring effort, a well-equipped organisation at work for the social, moral, and spiritual regeneration of the common people?

BRIXTON ORPHANAGE FOR FATHERLESS GIRLS.—The seventeenth annual report of this institution, in Barrington-road, Brixton, says:—"There has been no declension in our work, but, on the contrary, progress and improvement in every department. There are at present three hundred and ten orphans in residence. Three died during last year, consumption being the cause of death in each case. Considering that physical or constitutional infirmity does not prevent admission, the health of the children has been excellent. Owing to the great number of applications for the admission of young children, it has been found necessary to raise the limit of the age at which children are admitted; in future, they will only be received between the ages of seven and twelve years (instead of between five and twelve, as hitherto). "The Orphanage is supported by voluntary offerings; it is free to all applicants when vacancies arise; the most necessitous cases are first considered. There is no voting for admission, and children are received from any part of the United Kingdom."

The Late Rev. T. W. Brown, D.D.,

Ex-Secretary of the Turkish Missions Aid Society.

Rev. Dr. T. W. Brown, whose lamented decease we announced last week, and who was long well known to our readers as secretary of the Turkish Missions Aid Society, like many others who in this great city are patiently and earnestly seeking to advance the Kingdom of Christ, hailed from across the Border. He was born in 1820 in the quaint little University town of St. Andrews, "the light of mediæval Scotland." His parents, who occupied a humble position, could not do much to advance their children in life, but they gave them the priceless boon of a godly training, which was enriched by the example of their own sincere piety, and brought forth permanent fruit.

The promise, "Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it," is always fulfilled. Instances which sometimes appear to contradict it, usually show on examination that it is the idea of what constitutes training, and not the promise, which has been at fault. All the three sons of this family distinguished themselves. One of them, Rev. William Brown, D.D., was for a quarter of a century a Presbyterian minister at Buenos Ayres, and became professor of Biblical criticism in St. Mary's College, St. Andrews. The second prospered much in business, was an elder in the Church, became a magistrate in his native city, and died amid universal regret. The third and youngest is the subject of the present sketch.

Thomas Wemyss Brown, to give his full name, received the first part of his public education at the Madras College; and a love for study, which lasted all through a long and active life, early manifested itself. At that seminary he gained a scholarship, or bursary, which enabled him to enter the United College. He passed through the undergraduate course with distinction, and took his degree of M.A. During all this time he acted as resident tutor in a well-known boarding establishment in the city. At the close of 1842, he enrolled in St. Mary's College as a student of theology. Here he continued for the greater part of the winter, but in the March following his studies were strangely interrupted. By that time feeling had begun to run high between the two parties in the great controversy which culminated in the famous Disruption, the jubilee of which has been celebrated this year.

The following incident in which Mr. Brown was involved was not unconnected with the ferment which prevailed in the National Church. The free and unfettered election of Rector of the University, as everyone knows, is now in the hands of the students, but it was not always so. At the time we speak of the election had come to be so fenced about with restrictions that practically the choice was "Hobson's choice"—a solemn farce. In 1843 it was understood that the gentleman whose turn it was to be chosen Rector would not accept the appointment. In these circumstances a majority of the students, having satisfied themselves that the terms of the University statute warranted a free election, determined to assert their independence, and elected Dr. Thomas Chalmers, almost the greatest man of his time. This was bitterly resented by those in authority, and the temerity of the young men in venturing to exercise their private judgment brought down on them the severe censure of the University.

The details of the whole case as it proceeded cannot now be stated. Suffice it to say that three of the defaulters, refusing to admit the jurisdiction of the Court, were summarily expelled from the University. Fortunately, the Royal Commission for the visitation of the Scottish Universities was still in existence, and the expelled students, of whom Mr. Brown was one, carried their case by appeal before the Commission, who, on inquiry, perceived that an act of great injustice had been committed. A few months later the Royal Commission met at St. Andrews, and after vainly trying to induce the Professors to rescind their sentence, the Commissioners took the matter into their own hands, and, in virtue of the powers vested in them, quashed the sentence and reinstated the students. Thus, what had threatened to be a serious calamity was, in the providence of God, averted. Immediately after this the Disruption, so memorable in the history of modern Scotland, occurred.

As soon as he could leave St. Andrews, Mr. Brown repaired to the New College, Edinburgh, where he completed his theological course, and was for some time tutor to Sir James Dunlop, a young Scottish baronet. In 1848 he was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of St. Andrews, and in the following year was settled in the recently-formed Free Church, at Alva, near Stirling. After labouring there faithfully, amid many difficulties, for over thirteen years, he was called, in 1862, to Trinity Presbyterian Church, Newcastle, and thus became a minister of the English Presbyterian Church. There he devoted much attention to Home Mission work, and, with the help of several devoted young men of his congregation, established a village church at Killingworth, six miles distant. In this city pastorate he laboured abundantly for upwards of eleven years, much esteemed both by his own flock and the community at large. Towards the close of this pastorate, in 1871, he was elected Moderator at Manchester of the English Presbyterian Synod.

In 1874 he was cordially invited to remove to the picturesque island of Jersey, and saw it his duty to comply. There he found a congenial sphere for his activities. He had always taken a loving interest in young people, and one chief feature of a long, useful, and unobtrusive ministry has been the largely-attended classes for the study of the Word of God, which he has delighted to conduct. His contributions to literature have not been many—a few sermons and an excellently-written biography of Rev. James Deans, under the title of "Early Called," being the chief.

In 1882, at the urgent request of the committee, he undertook the secretaryship of the Turkish Missions Aid Society, to which work he devoted his whole time and attention for ten years; few but the missionaries whose work that useful organisation assists know how thoroughly he entered into their aims, and how much he has striven to further the cause of Christianity in lands under the blighting rule of the Moslem. In 1887 he was enabled to visit the Mission stations in Egypt, Syria, Asia Minor, and Bulgaria, a tour which greatly enhanced his value as secretary. The Society owes a very great debt to Dr. Brown's unintermittent care. To mention only one thing, he for some years past used the best rooms in his house at Bedford Park as an office, making absolutely no charge for that and the many incidental matters which form a considerable proportion of the working expenses of most religious societies.

In 1888, as a quite spontaneous recognition of his scholarship, the University of St. Andrews, his Alma Mater, conferred upon him the degree of Doctor of Divinity.

Unfortunately, Dr. Brown's health, never very robust, had been for some considerable time unequal to the demands which the work of the Society made upon it, and in March last he felt it his duty to resign the secretaryship, a resignation which was accepted by the committee with sincere regret. He then decided to make his home in the picturesque island of Jersey, the scene of his former ministrations.

Cultivated, genial, and courteous, he was beloved by all who had the privilege of his friendship, and who hoped that he might have long been spared to enjoy the rest and retirement earned by a good and useful life. But a Providence which never errs had decreed otherwise, and on Thursday, August 17, he entered into rest.

THE CHINESE MURDERS.

Writing from Hankow, on July 9, with respect to the recent ruthless murder of two Swedish missionaries at Sungpu, Dr. A. G. Parrott says :—

"Many things go to show that the whole affair was premeditated. The Viceroy was aware of the state of things at Sungpu. He had been supplied with copies of the threats; indeed, the threats were stuck about the walls of the town. The present Viceroy of Hupeh and Honan is supposed to be friendly towards foreigners. This, and the riots of two years ago, when Mr. Argent and another were killed not far from the scene of the present murders, does not look much like friendship as Europeans understand it.

"To my mind the time has come for a clear exposition of the whole missionary question and Western Governments in China. If missionaries are to be regarded as subjects of their respective sovereigns, and by treaty right can expect the protection of the Chinese Government, the latter should be made to understand that neglect or refusal to render that protection is not to be lightly regarded. If the Government is to be allowed to settle such atrocities by a small monetary payment, they care little for that. They are only the more highly exalted in the eyes of the people, and foreigners are the more degraded by being satisfied with dollars.

"Everything here (Hankow) is as quiet as if the thing happened in Peking. The common people bear us no ill-will. We are safe in God's keeping. I hope most of us fully considered the matter of our lives, and the dangers of coming to a Pagan nation, before we left the quiet security of residence in Europe. We do not shrink from the death of our bodies. We are in a land where Satan's kingdom is, and know only too well the intensity of the opposition of the higher powers. While the common people receive us gladly, the ruling classes hate us as they hate nothing else. The hairs of our heads are numbered, and we have nothing to fear more than our own unbelief and want of wisdom from above."

MISS H. S. FLETCHER, writing from Hong Kong, says: I have been a few times to a cottage meeting in a poor street near. I only go to look on, keep my ears open, and learn what I can. Our Bible-woman seems to talk very simply and earnestly, and some of the women who have listened to the Gospel message for a long time are gradually taking it in. They have souls to be saved, and hearts that can feel joy and sorrow, but the brains of poor Chinese women are not called forth by their everyday life, and it is a slow process to set them in motion, especially regarding the soul and eternity.

Summer at Northfield.—V.

THE CHRISTIAN CONFERENCE.

(Concluded.)

"I came here for rest of body; I have found rest of soul. Northfield has been a revelation to me. I leave it a new man." In these and similar words did some two-score of persons testify on Sabbath evening last to the blessing that had entered their souls during the preceding days which had been occupied by the Conference. And there was many an indication that for every confession thus publicly made there were a score of hearts that responded a deep, if silent, "Amen!"

My last report ended with the "missionary day" and the eve of Mr. Moody's arrival from Chicago. The latter event was hailed by one of those genial little incidents which are common to Northfield, and which add so much to its enjoyment. The afternoon is usually devoted to purposes of rest and recreation, unless some special call for a meeting arises. On this occasion between twenty and thirty of the young people procured a hay-wagon drawn by a superb team of oxen, and having elegantly decorated the "turn out" and amply covered the floor of the wagon with straw, created no small stir and amusement by proceeding to meet the train by which Mr. Moody was to arrive some three miles away. Their exuberant spirits showed that a long series of meetings in no wise had a depressing effect upon them, but that the religion of Jesus Christ inspires pleasures second to none that the worldling enjoys. As the train drew up a song of welcome burst forth which caused many a passenger to open eyes and windows to see whence it came. The train men are evidently familiar with such little tokens of the esteem in which the evangelist is held by those who know him and his work. A splendid view of the seminary buildings may be had from the railway, as they stand on the hill slope among the trees, with the Connecticut river flowing between. There was a peculiar fitness therefore that immediately after obtaining a sight of them the passengers should have their attention drawn to the founder in this somewhat original way. These "straw-rides" and "corn-roasts," "picnics," etc., form a pleasant feature of the recreation hours, when the parties are sufficiently large to ensure variety in the methods of whiling away the time, the pace being necessarily rather slow.

The interest manifested during the earlier days was intensified as the convention went on. A good foundation in the direction of Biblical doctrine had been laid, which prepared the people the more readily to receive the ministrations of Mr. Moody, who laid especial stress on the necessity of conformity to the will of God as indicated by the leadings of the Spirit. More and more does this servant of God press the reception of the Holy Ghost as essential to successful life and work. Not that it is any new phase in his own experience; for a quarter of a century he has relied upon nothing else, and the result all the world knows. "Why should you go on month after month and year after year in the pulpit, or the Sunday-school class, and see little or no result? I don't believe God means us to have failure. We must expect success, and we shall get it if the Holy Ghost is upon us for service." Below are given in more detail some of the thoughts presented by the various speakers, but in these is found the essence of them, or the centre around which they moved.

It will be seen, therefore, that not only in natural surroundings does Northfield vie with Keswick in friendly rivalry, but that the spirit of the great English convention finds an echo among these beautiful American hills. An earnest seeking after God pervaded all the meetings; the hearts of the people prayed, "Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth;" for answer they heard,

'Tis not thy work the Master wants, but thee.

Mr. Moody's first appearance at the meetings was greeted with a universal request that he would give some account of the work in Chicago. In vain he protested that he could not do so without speaking of himself, "and that," he pleaded, "always makes me feel foolish!" But he was obliged to yield, and at the close several earnest petitions were offered at the throne of grace that ever-increasing progress might be made in the Gospel there so long as the Fair continued. Speaking on the question of the Lord's Day, which has been discussed with so much animation these past months, he took occasion, with "Walking with God" as his theme, to say that if we have turned away from the Sabbath and are looking to material things, then we are not walking in the fellowship of God. Many people, if honest, would say that they had been disappointed in the Christian life, while others would say that they had found it much better and more joyful than they ever thought it would be. Is it because God is partial, or is it because of our not walking in his fellowship? What we want to-day is to come back to the old religion. The Gospel which Martin Luther taught and stirred Germany with, is good enough for us, and if it could stir Germany then it can surely stir America. The trouble is that the line is almost obliterated. How many Christian women marry ungodly men. Are you hand-in-glove with the world? If so, do you expect a blessing to-morrow? When you are walking with God the things of this world will look very small. You will lose the taste for the amusements which you now think necessary. I do not see how any of you can touch a Sunday newspaper. It does as much hurt as any literature in circulation. When you see a person who cannot get along without the theatre, without cards, without dancing, without the Sunday newspaper, or without the dime novel, then God help them. If the world has nothing to say against you, then God will have nothing to say for you. If you want power, then keep as far away from the world as you can. Get away from the line dividing the world. It is the border Christians that get the hard knocks. Be like Billy Bray, who, when asked how the world was getting along, said he did not know, as he had not been in it for twelve years. We are to be in the world, but not of it.

BETWEEN THE CHURCH AND THE WORLD

"The Overcoming Life" was another subject in which Mr. Moody gave some home thrusts as well as exhortations of practical utility. I honestly believe, he said, that what we want is twelve months of preaching to the Christian people. The greatest power on earth should be the Christian Church. I believe the promise of God that "one shall chase a thousand, and two put ten thousand to flight," but we must have a different set of Christians from many of those in our churches now, for it takes a thousand of them to chase one.

In this connection I quote a statement of Rev. A. C. Dixon, of Brooklyn. With refreshing candour he recently addressed his church members on some such wise as this:—Brethren, there are 900 of you; 150 of you are soul-winners, about that number I think I can depend upon in the prayer meetings, and send you to talk to inquirers and you are ready to work in the spiritual kingdom; about 350 of you are Levites; you are willing to do the mechanical work of the sanctuary; you give money, and that is a good thing, and if there is a fair or festival mentioned you are ready; about 400 of you, so far as I can see from a study of two years, are not worth a row of pins. A deep work among God's people is always followed by a corresponding reality in that among the unconverted. The first element in the overcoming life is faith in Jesus Christ (1 John v. 4). We live by faith (Gal. ii. 20), stand by faith (Rom. xi. 20), walk by faith (2 Cor. v. 7), and fight by faith (Eph. vi. 16). Other elements are found in Rev. ii. 7, 11, 17, 26, iii. 5, 12, 21, and each of these in turn was held up as an incentive to a life of faithful service.

But we cannot conquer the world outside until we have mastered that within us. You may wish you could get control of your tongue or your temper, but we can only control them by being right at heart with God. The enemies within are appetite, lust, temper, selfishness, jealousy, etc., which must all be conquered. Thanks be unto Him who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ.

There is one charge, at any rate, that cannot be laid to the door of the Christians who assemble at Northfield—that is, lack of generosity. In Mr. Moody's absence intimations were made as to the heavy expenses of the Chicago campaign. At once six thousand dollars were raised, and this sum was subsequently increased to over ten thousand, or about £2080. The presence of an odd "seventeen cents" pathetically indicated that it was not the rich alone who contributed. Some fifteen hundred dollars besides were given privately to some of the representatives of home and foreign missionary work, whose words had especially elicited the sympathy of their hearers.

Perhaps the most noteworthy feature regarding the first-named gift was that just at the moment the promises were flowing in, Mr. Moody, then in Chicago, was passing through some concern as to the funds necessary to maintain the work. Yet, as is his wont, he hesitated to consult his fellow-workers, preferring that his anxiety should only be known to himself and God. He was debating the matter in his mind when a telegram reached him from here informing him that six thousand dollars had been raised as a first instalment, of which he had, of course, known nothing. Thus, as ever, the effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much.

As stated last week, one of the leaders of the conference was Dr. A. J. Gordon, of Boston, a man deeply taught in the things of God, and gifted in imparting to his hearers the truths he has learnt. His Bible readings upon were especially helpful. By the aid of a blackboard he delineated broadly the divisions of time as follows:—First period, ending at the Cross, the Jewish age; second period, ending at the Second Advent, when Christ takes the Kingdom and the righteous dead arise, the present Christian era; the third period, the millennium, ending when Christ delivers up the Kingdom and destroys death. He propounded no prophetic scheme, but urged the importance of careful study in placing in their proper sections, or "pigeon-holes," as he termed them, the texts and portions of Scripture in which God reveals his purposes toward his people and the world. He made it no merely theoretical study, but showed that it affected many important doctrines and rules of spiritual life. For instance, circumcision, priesthood, sacrifice, and the ceremonial set forth in the Levitical law, obviously belong to the first period, and must not be brought into the second. Notice the effect of this. Circumcision was a rite for the purification of the flesh. Christ put away the flesh. The Adam nature had been tested by the law, and now having died in Adam we are made alive in Jesus Christ. Therefore we learn that the "Adam vine" cannot be successfully cultivated; only by new birth, by union with the true Christ vine can man live. This condemns the "broad" theory, often set forth, of cultivating human nature into a state of grace without regeneration.

Then as to sacrifice, there is none in front of the cross, Christ having then offered Himself a sacrifice for ever. So priesthood also, except that of Christ as our great High Priest, belongs only to the first period, and, like the altar, must not be brought into the second. Thus are the pretensions of Romanism and Ritualism shown to be unscriptural.

In like manner events which belong to the third period must not be brought into the second. We must not anticipate the future by bringing it into the present. In this connection Dr. Gordon alluded to the extension of missions to the Jews and to the heathen as being incumbent on the Church of God, a topic which he amplified when considering the following:—

LIST OF THE FIRSTFRUITS.

1. Firstfruits of Resurrection, 1 Cor. xv. 20-23.
2. Firstfruits of the Spirit, Rom. viii. 23.
3. Firstfruits of the New Creation, Jas. i. 18.
4. Firstfruits of Israel, Rom. xi. 16.
5. Firstfruits of the Bride, Rev. xiv. 4.
6. Firstfruits of Missions, Rom. xvi. 5.
7. Firstfruits of the Ministry, 1 Cor. xvi. 15.

The division on the subject relating to the firstfruits of the Spirit had an especial significance in view of the thread which ran through some of Mr. Moody's addresses as indicated above, and to which I shall presently revert. The two ideas contained in firstfruits are, a sample and a pledge. Even so was Pentecost, and not till period three will the Holy Spirit have been manifested in all his fulness when He shall have descended upon "all flesh" (Is. xxxii. 15, Zech. xii. 10).

Concerning the firstfruits of Israel, Dr. Gordon showed that the "remnant" (Rom. xi. 5), is to be succeeded by the "fulness" (ver. 12) which will include the "remnant" plus "the rest" (ver. 7). He then referred to his recent meeting, at Chicago, with the Hebrew-Christian Joseph Rabinowitz, with whose life-story most of my readers are familiar. This "first ripe fig" as Delitzsch has quaintly called him, expressed to Dr. Gordon a thought, full of a pathetic interest, which will perhaps be new to many. Said he, we Jews are but a small nation (seven millions), compared with India, China, etc., but when the Lord makes up the Church, his body, India may supply the legs, Africa or China the arms, England and America the breast, and Israel will because they made the wound. And so at the last "all Israel shall be saved."

I have alluded to the teaching upon the office and work of the Holy Spirit, which pervaded some of the sessions, and it will perhaps be remembered that during the students' conference in July Mr. Moody gathered the young men together in the woods to seek the enduement of the Holy Spirit for Christian life and service. With a similar object in view he set apart one day of the present convention. The morning was occupied with the teaching of the Word of God upon the subject, and the afternoon to separate meetings for men and women that the same blessing might be sought. Dr. Gordon and Mr. Moody divided the services between them, and perhaps no better keynote could have been struck than the words of the latter when, on the preceding evening, he added a few remarks in his homely style, after an address upon Elijah from Dr. A. T. Pierson:—

If you don't get a blessing it is your own fault. Take a bottle full of water, cork it up and place it under Niagara, and you will not get a particle of water in it, and so it is with the heart; if you cork it up you will not get any of the Spirit. What we want is men like Elijah, who know how to pray and bring down the fire from heaven. When the book is opened we will find many have brought down the fire whom we have least expected to do so, while others whom we have thought were bringing down the fire, will be obliged to give up their places to others. Every one of us can pray, and can be an Elijah. If there are weak ones here to-night, then get alone and pray with God. Make to-morrow a day of fasting, and do not leave Northfield until God has endowed you with his power. He is more anxious to give you his power than you are to receive it. It is for you women as much as you men, and if you have it not get alone with God between now and to-morrow and pray for it.

Dr. Gordon showed the significance of the phrases used by our Lord, to "have life" and to "have it more abundantly." The gift of eternal life and the gift of the Holy Spirit are both to be appropriated only by faith. In a sense, what was true of Christ may be true of us. At any rate, since Christ required the Holy Spirit for his work it is certain that we do for ours. He saith, "I by the Spirit of God cast out devils." "He through the eternal Spirit offered Himself without spot to God." And concerning the great commission that he gave to his followers we read, "After that He through the Holy Ghost had given commandment to his apostles." In Luke iii. 21, "the Spirit descended like a dove upon Him." In Acts ii. 4, the disciples "were all filled with the Holy Ghost." The same was true of them as of Him. While both were praying, they knew that they had a promise to claim. "John indeed baptized with water, but ye shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost not many days hence." We must always have a promise when we pray for such a matter. Jesus Christ certainly had a promise, as we read in Isaiah xi. 1-2: "And there shall come forth a rod out of the stem of Jesse, and a branch shall grow out of his roots; and the spirit of the Lord shall rest upon him, the spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of counsel and might, the spirit of knowledge and the fear of the Lord." The stem that was growing out of the roots of Jesse was Jesus Christ, of course. He could just plead with God now to fulfil the word that had been spoken centuries before. The Jews called this a seven-branched golden candlestick promise. The Spirit of the Lord is the central stand. Then three pairs of specifications, the spirit of wisdom and of understanding, the spirit of counsel and of might, the spirit of knowledge and the fear of the Lord. Seven. In the Book of Revelation we read of Him as the one who hath the seven spirits of God, meaning the fulness of the Spirit. In the prophecy of Isaiah we have this prediction of the fulness, the seven-branched candlestick promise. Now it has been fulfilled, He has ascended up into heaven, and He is alluded to as the one who has the seven spirits of God.

In conclusion, Dr. Gordon referred, with becoming humility, to the effect upon his own life and work since he had himself claimed the fulfilment of God's promises in this matter. It had necessitated sundry changes in the organisation of his church, but how wonderfully had the result justified the step. Not only had the members of his church and congregation been blessed as never before under his ministry, but the practical outcome has been a multiplication of agencies for the salvation of lost men and women. Holiness has become a real and practical possession, not by exclusion from the world, but by preservation in it.

THE SUNBEAM CAN NEVER BE DEFILED,

though it shine for a thousand years upon the slums, because it is a part of the sun, and holiness is just the rays of God's perfection shining out, and holiness can go down into the slums, or can come in contact with the vilest sinner and never be defiled, simply because it has its source in God. But the work of the Spirit is not apprehended by natural man. Of one gift Dr. Gordon has always felt the lack, viz., that of executive ability, but others are able to supply his need. One day, however, a newspaper reporter interviewed him, and having examined his work went away and wrote, "We cannot accept Dr. Gordon's theories, but it is evident that he has great executive ability!"

After this address Mr. Moody presented the offices of the Holy Spirit, and in the afternoon held a special meeting for women, while Dr. Gordon addressed the men in another place. Two hours were spent in earnest supplication, and perhaps the result cannot be more clearly indicated than in the opening words of this report, until they shall have brought forth lasting fruit in holy living, and in winning their fellow-men to Christ.

By no means the least profitable and pleasant feature of the Conference has been the opportunity it has afforded of meeting many of those who are actively engaged in the Lord's work in this and other lands, some who are often brought before the public gaze, others who, in a quiet way, are seeking the lost in more or less secluded spheres. From time to time meetings were held at which they told of the good hand of the Lord upon them in their service for Him, and some of these stand out as occasions of special interest.

There was our friend Mr. Edwin Arrowsmith, who, in a flying visit, spoke of the work (familiar to English readers) of the Children's Special Service Mission at our seaside resorts. He had spent some months on this side gathering information as to work among the young people, and at the same time holding meetings in American and Canadian towns.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL WORK.

The importance of Sunday-school work was urged by Rev. A. P. Foster, of the American S.S. Union, who said: There is a tremendous change going on throughout the United States in regard to the filling up of the cities and the diminishing of the population of the small country towns. The foreigners, who have no sympathy with us, are taking the places on the farms. As the old people die off and the young people move away to the cities, there is no one to take their places in the churches, and as a consequence one after another are closed up. The children are brought up knowing nothing of the Sunday-school, and with but slight acquaintance with the Bible. We must strengthen the churches and Sunday-schools in these country towns, and this is what the Union is endeavouring to do. There are not enough scholars in these towns to form denominational Sunday-schools, and the Union is thus bringing the scholars together on one basis.

Rev. James O'Connor, an ex-priest, spoke of the prominence given to-day to the Romish Church in politics and press. This is a religion, he said, in which the Pope takes the place of the Holy Spirit, teaching that through him flows all that men must believe concerning God! Yet since the declaration of infallibility, there has been a feeling of unrest among its followers, and his right to govern spiritually has been doubted. There is a certain mark of inferiority among all those countries where ne still rules, whatever position Romanists may hold among us.

"Sixteen years ago I was a Romish priest. I believed that I had power to receive the good things of God, and I believed that I came rightly between God and man. I fell on my knees for hours in tears before statues of the Virgin and the saints, beseeching their intervention. Priest that I was, I knew not, nor found in all the Church of Rome, or in her theological works, that I could obtain salvation myself, through the redeeming blood of Christ. I left the Church, not as an enemy, but because I could not live in it honestly to myself. I never entered a Protestant Church before I left the Church of Rome, and of all the ministers I ever met in society or at clubs, not one ever told me of Christ. You will meet priests on the cars to-morrow: will you tell them of Christ? I did not study Protestantism or institute parallels, but I took to myself the message that Jesus died for sinners."

Father O'Connor then went on to describe the mission in New York which he conducts, known as "Christ's Mission," the rest of the title, "for the Conversion of Roman Catholics," having been prohibited by two Protestant judges.

Miss M. A. Delany, a former student at Northfield, described how, after eight years, she came back to the School thinking of the president's parting promise to often meet her at Heb. iv. 16. Since then she had been engaged in work on the New York Docks (Catherine-street Mission), and in five years there had only been three meetings without inquirers. The work had been started by an informal Sunday afternoon meeting out of doors for the lounging women and children, and now they often had 2000 present, relying on the simple Gospel message and testimonies. These had led to large mothers' meetings, at one of which twenty converted mothers prayed for their husbands, and of these petitions five at least were already answered. These poverty-stricken women, unable to dress decently enough to go to church, had contributed 40dols. in ten months to the support of a missionary in India, and the children had been equally generous. The largest percentage of children attending their services who ever attended any other service was five, and often not one in a score had heard a word of Bible history.

JERRY M'AULAY MISSION, NEW YORK.

Mrs. Ballon told of rescue work in a district surrounded by houses of ill-fame. She instanced a woman who decided to leave her drunken husband, who had not given her a penny for six months. "I believe," said Mrs. Ballon, "that you stand in the way of your husband; come yourself to Christ, and make way for him." The woman took this advice, and in due time the husband followed, and now the two are known in the locality as "Peace" and "Comfort"!

One man converted there had been for twenty years a professional thief, and had spent a third of that time in prison, though he had brothers and sisters in affluence. Though converted he was bitterly tempted, for the devil does not let such men alone, they have served him far too well. That man became and is an earnest and successful worker. He had been an inveterate smoker, but his conversion filled his mind with so much joy that he absolutely forgot his tobacco.

Mrs. Ballon's concluding words were somewhat startling, though there is, no doubt, a good deal of truth in them. She earnestly appealed for concentration of philanthropic effort on those who had accepted Christ, but without making paupers of them. "Don't take care of the devil's children unless they are sick or dying. Don't intercept God's punishments; they laugh in their sleeves to see what fools they make of you. If some of the workers of the nineteenth century had met that prodigal son and given him a new suit and a night's lodging, he would not have been home yet!"

Mr. J. E. Budget Meakin, of Morocco, gave some practical illustrations of Islam. Attired in Moorish costume, he emphasized the importance of Medical Missions in Mohammedan lands, especially when conducted by ladies, as, for example, the North African Mission station in Fez. There are three cries to-day from the Mission-field, for men and women, for prayers, and for means. All of these are to be met in one way, and one way only, by the deepening of spiritual life among the churches everywhere, and by individual recognition of the fact that we are not our own; we are bought with a price, and owe ourselves. Were this but fully realised all three cries would be answered. The silver and the gold which is the Lord's would be no longer withheld, and the workers in the field would not be forced to make urgent appeals to our feelings to get supplies. The sympathies of those whose place was to abide by the stuff would go out in prevailing prayer, and the work would go forward as never before. No man is fit to do great work at home who is not willing to go abroad if a call comes; and no man is fit to go abroad who would not be equally content to work at home. Self once yielded as a "reasonable service," there will be progress on every hand, at home and abroad, and the world will be won for Christ.

Two quiet but very forcible addresses were given by Mrs. J. K. Barney, Superintendent of the Jail and Almshouse work of the Women's Christian Temperance Union. Her work has been beset with great difficulties, but she has had the help of a great Saviour, who has taught her that no man or woman, however depraved, is beyond the pale of salvation. With a steady faith in this, and a supply of tact and common—or shall I not say uncommon?—sense, sanctified under the leadings of the spirit of God, she has been the means of leading many a downtrodden one to the feet of Jesus. More than once she had her audience in tears as she related stages by which the light entered the dark minds of these neglected ones.

Some facts as to her jail experiences show that here, as in our own country, the drink curse is at the bottom of most of the misery and crime. The jail records show that eight-tenths of their occupants come there directly through the use of intoxicating liquor, and the same cause operates indirectly in the case of a considerable proportion of the other two-tenths. The saloons are the feeders of the jails. Close the former, and you may very soon rent the latter. A few years since Hampden Co. found its old jail too small, and instead of shutting up the saloons the people decided to take a fee, legalise them, and build a new jail to accommodate their fruit. A new jail was built at an expense of 250,000dols., containing 256 cells, and the grog shops kept open. The result is that the new jail is crowded with 264 prisoners. The flood of iniquity flows on, and the people pay the bills for the benefit of the saloonist. Contrast with this the better way. The county of Horry, S.C., has for six years prohibited the manufacture and sale of liquor as a beverage. The result is, all debts are paid, there is more than six thousand dollars in the treasury, and

THE JAIL IS EMPTY.

Work among the Jews was represented by Mr. Hermann Warszawiak and Mr. Jacob Freshman, who both labour in New York. The former had a specially interesting story to tell, with which in part readers of The Christian are already familiar. It is evident that there is a great stirring in the hearts of the Jewish people, and an increasing readiness to listen to the setting forth of Jesus as Israel's Messiah, where a few years ago it was told to deaf ears if told at all. Mr. Warszawiak is working in affiliation with the New York City Mission, one of the most potent agencies of the Gospel among the poor in that city, to which I alluded in a previous report, when Mr. A. B. Irvine addressed the students on its behalf.

And now, the Conference is over, and Mr. Moody has returned with his family and Mr. Stebbins to the Chicago work. Once more the little town nestles among hills in its native quietude; a day of rain has laid the dust, the teams are enjoying well-earned repose, and stillness will reign supreme until September, when the seminaries will reopen. Meantime the hundreds of earnest souls who gathered here to be strengthened in their inner life have scattered to their varied spheres, determined, as a practical outcome of the Conference, to labour and live more fully for the glory of God.

Northfield, August 17. G. E. M.

ON THE BORDERS OF TIBET.—Says the Moravian Quarterly:—"Good news comes from Leh. Mr. Shawe informs us that last Good Friday, a young man named Jor Punitsog, was baptized at Leh, by the name of "Paula," the Tibetan version of Paul. He is in so far the first fruits of the mission in Ladak, as he is the first convert not related to the families who formed the nucleus of the congregation at Leh. Though Ladaki by birth, these received their early Christian impressions and training at Kyelang in the province of Lahoul. When Leh became a station they returned to their native land, and we trust and pray that the Lord will continue to add to them such as are being saved".

Y.M.C.A. CRUISES TO NORWAY.

During the present month, two fortnightly cruises to the magnificent fiords on the west coast of Norway have been very successfully accomplished in the steamship Kong Harald, under the auspices of the City of London Young Men's Christian Association, Aldersgate-street. On both occasions the course run was the same, embracing the choicest portions of the grand and picturesque scenery. Commencing with the Mauranger and Hardanger fiords, a brief halt was made at Eide and a long stay at Odde, to enable passengers to visit the waterfalls and glacier. After a call at the important town of Bergen (50,000 inhabitants), the Nordfiord was visited, anchorage being made for the day at Loen, a delightful excursion was accomplished across the Loen Lake to the glacier at its head, with its easily accessible blue ice caves and crevasses.

The party having re-embarked, the ship proceeded to the grand and gloomy Jorund and Norangs fiords, then on to the Geiranger fiord, with its narrow channel shut in between mountains 5000 feet high, with many waterfalls descending their precipitous sides. A brief stay was made at Merok, and Saturday afternoon found the ship securely anchored in the roadstead off Molde; here she quietly rested till Monday morning.

Most enjoyable services were held on the previous Sunday when crossing the North Sea, an unusually turbulent ocean, but on both of these occasions abnormally quiet. At Molde English Church services are arranged throughout the summer (with the kind permission of the parish minister) twice each Sunday in the Lutheran Church. During the Sunday afternoon, in the second cruise, a much appreciated address was given by Rev. F. B. Meyer. Throughout both voyages of two thousand miles, the morning and evening gatherings for family worship proved very pleasant and profitable. Hearty testimony was given at the close of each cruise to the great enjoyment of sailing with congenial fellow-passengers, and of the unbroken quiet of the Sabbath days.

On Monday morning the Romsdal was visited, and the magnificent mountains (6,000 feet), amidst new but ever-charming surroundings, were greatly admired. Next, a long sail of twenty-seven hours (in the face of a strong south-west gale on the second occasion), brought the parties from Naes, through the Sogne fiord and Næro fiord, to Gudvangen. After an eight-mile drive, the party arrived at the Stalheim cliff, at the top of which (1,200 feet) stands the comfortable and admirably-situated Stalheim Hotel, overlooking the grand and world-famed Nærodal. Here a pleasant night ashore was spent. In the morning the drive to the Vossevangen (22½ miles) was continued, followed by a two-hours' halt, lunch, and a four hours' railway journey—one of the most beautiful in the world—to Bergen. From this port the Kong Harald made sail for Leith.

On the return voyage, on each occasion, the North Sea gave the passengers a manifestation of its normal condition, somewhat to the discomfort of many. This trying experience, however, was all forgotten when at length the ship reached the friendly shelter of the far-extending Fife coast. At a farewell meeting held under these auspicious conditions, cordial expression was given to the complete satisfaction which the cruises had afforded, exceeding the expectations of many—and to the deep sense felt by the passengers of the value of these excursions, conducted under Christian auspices. These gratifying assurances were accompanied by generous tokens of approval.

MANCHESTER FEMALE STRANGERS' LODGING-HOUSE is an institution designed to befriend the weak and shelter poor women while in the midst of strangers. Sympathy and temporary help have in many cases been found to be all that was required to arrest impulsive and thoughtless girls while on the verge of a career of sin. During the year accounted for in the last report, over six hundred lodgers passed the night in the house, B 105, Piccadilly. Others stayed longer than one night, and in all the thirteen beds were occupied 2870 times. Some of the lodgers were travellers who had missed their trains, and, therefore, were in difficulty as well as danger. It is gratifying to know that 148 of these were recommended to the Home by the railway officials.

DUFFTOWN CONVENTION.

This annual gathering, which has been held now for seven consecutive summers, took place on Wednesday, August 23. The conveners had selected as the Bible study for this year the subjects of the "Coming of the Christ" and the "Overcoming of the Christian," chiefly as found in the Book of Revelation. The forenoon meeting was devoted to the consideration of these themes. Dr. Black, of Inverness, was the first speaker, and dealt with the topic of Christ's second advent. The texts he specially took up were Rev. i. 7; ii. 25; iii. 11; and xvi. 15. In a luminous, practical, and powerful address the doctor unsealed the meaning of these portions, and convicted our consciences by practical application, and stirred our hearts by earnest exposition of the blessed Hope.

The next speaker was Rev. Donald Matheson, of Putney. He sought to connect the two branches of thought before the conference. He did so in the most effective manner, by showing how the vision of Christ in Rev. i. leaves the impression that to have to do with such a holy, glorious, and searching Saviour demands the most whole-hearted fidelity on our part: and how the vision of Him in Rev. v., as the One who alone was found worthy to guide and control the events of centuries and the events of our own lives, is so perfectly fitted to encourage and cheer the Christian in his life, labour, and conflict, as that he may thereby overcome and look on with bright and assured hope to the consummation. From beginning to end Mr. Matheson's solid, thoughtful, and pungent words were edifying and helpful.

The last speaker was Dr. Elder Cumming, of Glasgow, who took up the subject of "The Christian Overcoming." He began with special reference to the overcomings of the seven epistles to the churches (Rev. ii. and iii.), showing how "overcoming" is regarded by Christ as the normal state of a Christian; he went to show, from 1 John iv. 4, that already victory is accomplished in one important sphere through the indwelling of God; and then, in the body of his address, from 1 John v. 4, showed in a most incisive and searching way what the world is; who the ruling spirit of it is, viz. the devil; what this faith is, which is the victory not the instrument of it; and finally, how this victory is God's victory as the One who has taken possession of us and is leading us in triumph in Christ. Dr. Cumming's address, by its clear definite exposition and quiet unction, came as God's light revealing the forces in the great Christian contention and the possibilities of this risen and regnant Christian life.

The afternoon meeting, as in former years, was occupied with missionary intelligence and appeal. Mr. John Anderson, of the China Inland Mission, spoke some earnest words on true missionary principles, regarding missionaries as "ministers of Christ and stewards of his mysteries" to the dark and sin-blinded world. He then gave accounts of work done and the state of several tribal peoples in the far west of China—whole clans of thousands and millions without a single messenger of the Saviour's mercy.

Rev. R. McCheyne Paterson, from Gujrat, India, also addressed the Conference. He strikingly showed how missionaries and all workers may be regarded as the friends of Jesus at the grave of Lazarus. "Take ye away the stone," that the dead may be brought face to face with a living Saviour. Mr. Paterson gave some very interesting accounts of the conversion, faithfulness, and persecution of both poor and rich Hindus and Mohammedans. How sad it all is to hear so often of the perishing millions and so many able-bodied Christians spending lives, comparatively useless, in this favoured land.

In the evening we were specially gathered for Gospel testimony, and a most solemn occasion it was. The chairman spoke a few earnest sentences from Luke xii. 56—59; and Mr. Anderson (C.I.M.) gave a short but telling address on the words, "Thy will be done on earth as it is done in heaven," Luke xi., 2. The final address was given by Rev. J. Hall, of Cullen, from the words, "We have no king but Cæsar" (John xix.). The word took hold of minds and hearts. The water was seen in the eyes of not a few as we sealed the sum of the day's blessings by singing—

"Shall we all meet at home in the morning,
On the shores of the bright crystal sea?"

"KESWICK" IN SOUTH INDIA.

Nestling in its bosom of mountains, whose wooded slopes surround with picturesque beauty its four-armed lake, lies Kodai-Kanal, the "Keswick" of South India. Here, surrounded by Nature in her loveliness, invigorated by the deliciously pure and cool air, for Kodai is over 7000 feet above the sea, many of God's servants find a quiet place to "rest awhile," away from the heat and toil of the plains. After the long months of earnest work on the low and uninteresting plains, what a change one feels as one gets up on to the mountain-tops, or walks over the grassy downs, adorned with the wild flowers, so lovely in their very simplicity, and which carry one back to the days of childhood and the country fields of happy England! How sweet to hear the little stream rippling down the valleys between the rounded mountain-tops which keep watch over Kodai—now winding through the jungle, now meandering by shady groves and leafy bowers,—till at last, rushing over stones and rocky steeps, and falling in silver cascades, it hurries with ever-hastening flow to water the scorching plains and scatter its blessings over a thirsty land.

While resting here, where the tokens of our Father's hand and of his love are so numerous, we seek to be drawn nearer to Him, to know more of his love to us, more of what He would have from us, and more of what He is willing to do for us. Having been giving out all the year we now seek for that filling of the Spirit. With this end in view, for the last four years a Convention for the Deepening of Spiritual Life has been held at Kodai, and it has become to us something like what "Keswick" is to our fellow-workers in England.

During the Convention week daily might be seen well-laden boats gladly hurrying towards the reach of the lake where the American church lay hidden amid the woods which clothed the valley, and as nine o'clock drew near the clear sounding bell broke the stillness of the air, shortly followed by the sound of praise which voiced the heart-feelings of those who were assembled to participate in the feast out of God's Word, and to claim their share of the good things provided by the Father for his children.

The Convention commenced on May 22, Monday morning. The previous days and weeks many of us had been specially looking for a blessing; we had dug deep channels for his grace to flow through, and now we looked to have them filled. Surrounded on all sides by heathenism, with its low standard of morals and purity, and with the cold ceremonialism of its religious rites, what wonder if our stream seemed to become dry, if our spiritual life seemed to ebb, if our standard tended to lower itself? Such, I fear, is frequently the experience of missionaries. Feeling this, it is no wonder we looked forward to the Convention with thirsting, longing hearts, thirsting for more of his Spirit, longing for more of his presence, and He satisfied the longing soul with Himself, and filled the thirsting spirit with his Spirit.

Two meetings were held daily, at nine in the morning and four in the afternoon, and from beginning to end, wet or fine, the church was always filled with a reverent, earnest gathering of between two and three hundred. Meeting together thus daily might be seen representatives from a large number of missions, distinct indeed from one another outwardly, but all bound together by one bond of love and brotherhood, kneeling at the feet of one common Saviour, and singing praises from the heart to the one great God and Father of us all.

The general subject of the Convention was "Sons of God." At the morning meetings the different aspects of Christ the Son were dwelt upon, and in the afternoon, the subject of Christians as "Sons of the living God" was looked into in the light of God's Word.

As each day went by, and our great privileges and high responsibilities were successively brought home to us by one and another of the brethren who in turn took part in leading the thoughts of his hearers, our hearts burned within us, and we felt He was talking with us by the way, and the kindling fire of his Spirit seemed to be taking possession anew of his temple. It was very helpful to look at Christ as "the Son" in the morning, and then to consider our grand position as "sons" in the evening. But as the week wore on and we realized more the great difference between "the Son" and ourselves, we were bowed down, and the cry was forced from our hearts, "Lord, who is sufficient for these things?" Then, as we realised more that "God's commands are enablings," it led us more to seek from above that filling of the Spirit which the Father longs to give his children, but which they are so slow to take owing to "self" and "unbelief."

Throughout all the meetings there was the utmost liberty and freedom, and many opportunities were given for earnest extempore prayer, as well as for the expression of thoughts which God had put in our hearts while meditating upon his Word.

All this naturally led up to the consecration meeting which was held on the Friday morning, when many were helped in their new life by giving testimony to what the Lord had done for them during the week, and in recalling some particular word that He had spoken suitable to the individual case. It all led up to this, but did not end there, for, refreshed and strengthened, we left Kodai for the plains feeling anew the power of God and the abundance of grace. Even as the streams from the hills roll down to the plains carrying new life and blessing over the land, so we prayed that his Spirit working through us might bring new life to many a dead soul, and the rich blessing of our Father to many a poor sinner.

Nor were the Lord's little ones—his lambs—forgotten, for in connection with the Children's Special Service Mission a series of eleven bright happy services were held in the open-air, and the changed lives of many children are a witness to blessing received, filling our hearts with praise and thankfulness.

IRISH EVANGELISATION SOCIETY.

The Irish Evangelisation Society, in its last report, calls attention to the earnest spirit of hearing at present manifested in Ireland. The committee state: "There have been a larger number of our missions than usual, in which the results have been seen in numerous conversions, and the encouragements to our work have been, therefore, great. The state of our funds led us to limit our work to some extent, and so the number of meetings held in the year was 2640; those in the year 1891 were 2796—that was the largest number hitherto recorded by our Society. During last summer we made some special efforts to reach our Roman Catholic neighbours, by open-air preaching in markets and fairs."

Messrs. Brown (London City Mission) and McKittrick (Harley House, Bow) undertook an open-air preaching tour under the auspices of the Society just a year ago. At Arklow they addressed about a thousand Roman Catholics. "About fifty or sixty fishermen's wives kept up a dreadful noise, but the country folk gave us a respectful hearing, and we believe God carried home his own Word to many of their hearts. The proprietor of the hotel in which we were stopping turned us out when he heard that we were open-air preachers, but God raised up friends who took us in, and treated us kindly." At Howth a noisy crowd pressed upon the preachers to put them into the sea, but the Lord delivered them safely.

At Banbridge Mr. Carleton held a memorable mission. Night after night great numbers of people congregated, and many remained to be conversed with about their souls. Rev. George Marshall writes: "Thank God, many were led to accept Christ as their Saviour. As far as one can learn, all the churches of the town have been helped by souls entering into the light."

Describing a series of meetings at Lurgan, Rev. T. M. Hamill says: "We have had evangelistic services with perhaps uniformly larger attendances, but none, I think, more largely attended by the non-church-going, and what are sometimes called the lapsed. The place in which the meeting was held tended to prevent a good many of our more respectable people from coming. Doubtless some of the apparent conversions will not prove lasting, but I trust a genuine spiritual work was, in many cases, wrought, and will remain as a harvest for eternity."

Sending us a copy of this interesting report, the hon. sec., Mr. James Barton, of Dundalk, says:—"We are in dire need of help, and yet our people—even our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen—were never so willing to listen to our message of peace and love. It will be a real wrong done to Ireland if our evangelistic work has to be diminished, because our friends in England cannot afford us the means to carry it on."

OPEN-AIR WORK AT SCARBOROUGH.

BY REV. R. BALGARNIE.

(Concluded from our last.)

In many other ways these open-air services were useful. A bond of brotherhood was established between the fishing folk and myself. Often they would send for me in times of sickness. When fishing gear or boats were lost they knew where to find a helper. When their homes were darkened by sorrow, they made sure of at least one heart who would comfort them. Never can I forget a terrible storm that swept the coast and carried widowhood and orphanage into many a home. On that memorable day I stood by the crew as they manned the lifeboat before putting off to a ship in distress. Her canvas was in shreds, and in battling with the waves she gave a great lurch; the boatmen watching her cried aloud, "Ah! she's sinking! push off, push off!" Brave fellows! they never thought of themselves, though death stared them in the face. I helped to fasten their lifebelts, cheered them as they grasped the oars, joined with the crowd in launching the craft, and prayed, "God help you!" as they dashed into the deep. Alas! within a few minutes some of them were in eternity. It was a terrible catastrophe, but it was also the time for prompt sympathy and help. Every desolated home was visited before nightfall, and a letter addressed to The Times the next day brought immediate relief from all parts of the country.

On such occasions the Sailors' Orphans' Home at Hull was ever ready to help. Its annual visit was a red-letter day to us all, for then, headed by the brass band of the Institution, we paraded the streets in long procession. Need I say that the sight of 200 orphans moved many to tears, or that from windows and balconies along the route showers of money fell upon us? Then followed the Orphans' Sunday on the seashore, which always drew a crowd. The local widows and orphans surrounded the pulpit; a brief narrative of each case was given. Perhaps the father of one was lost in a storm, another in the lifeboat, another went away and the ship was heard of no more; then, pointing to the happy faces of these children, a collection for the Orphanage crowned the appeal. This anniversary, apart from subscriptions, frequently realised £100, and once, in response to a personal appeal, the late Sir Titus Salt, Bart., presented a donation of £5000.

Another result of these services was the establishment of a ragged school for the rough sailor-lads of the neighbourhood. It was the means of doing much good, and only was discontinued when the school-board system rendered it unnecessary, but it led up to the erection of the Cottage Hospital in the town, now containing fifty beds; the superintendent of the school was Mrs. Anne Wright, who voluntarily undertook the work for Christ. Though delicate in health, she seldom was absent, and often was escorted to her home on dark nights by the lads with lanterns. It was when visiting the homes of the scholars that her heart was touched by the poverty and sickness prevailing: no chance of recovery to a patient amid such wretched surroundings. She bought a cottage and made it into an hospital. Then another was added, till both were full. Ultimately, the large institution referred to was built, mostly at her own cost, and it has proved a boon to many. It is a pleasure to add that this noble lady, now eighty-eight years old, is still at its head, and is known far and wide as the

"FLORENCE NIGHTINGALE OF SCARBOROUGH."

For the last twenty years these services have been conducted in the Foreshore-road, which is the great marine promenade of the town. No site could be better chosen for reaching the people. Immediately behind it is the Royal Northern Sea Bathing Infirmary, with about 100 patients, who open their windows and appear on the balconies during the service. Thousands of visitors are passing and repassing; some listen for a few minutes, and then move on, others remain till the close. It is a great opportunity to preach the glorious Gospel to rich and poor, learned and illiterate, seamen and landsmen together. I have seen among the crowd dignitaries of the Church of England and clergy of all denominations, members of Parliament and of the Cabinet, who have taken part in the good work, but best of all, the common people, as of old, have heard the Word gladly, and not a few have been won to Christ. Some cases are worthy of record—one stranger in passing was arrested, and is now a Christian minister. Another, hiding out of sight, was smitten by the truth and brought to the feet of Jesus. Another, wandering about as a homeless tramp, stood still and listened, and from that day became a new creature in Christ Jesus. A young lady, with her companion, was attracted by the crowd, and by seeing, as they put it, "a man preaching on a tub," they drew near to "get some fun," but the story of Christ's love melted their hearts, and one of them yielded herself to the Lord. These are but a few specimens of the silent harvest that has been gathering during these forty years, but the time of full harvest is not yet. It is because of the manifest blessing resting upon these services that my remaining years have been consecrated to special mission work. Upon it the Master has graciously set his seal, and the joy in it is enhanced by the surprises given me in all parts of the country; that at the open-air services in Scarborough "this and that one was born there."

These services are continued on the same spot every Lord's day. It has been my privilege this summer again to preach there, and to behold crowds of people eager to hear the Gospel of Christ. My prayer is that it may be blessed to coming generations; that they who sow and they who reap may rejoice together, and that all the sheaves brought in may be laid at the Master's feet, to whom be the glory for ever.

OPEN DOORS IN IRELAND.

Holiday time has arrived in our Dublin Mission Homes and schools, and also the time that we usually give a little account of the work. The teachers are home for a well-earned rest, and the children of the Homes have the joy of excursions and visits to the seaside; while the little ones who come daily, the "town sparrows," still assemble each morning for breakfast and for about an hour's teaching in the Bible, and to sing their sweet hymns. Frequently the parents come with the little ones, and thus hundreds of Roman Catholics hear the Word of God.

On one of these occasions a poor sorrowful-looking woman came in, bringing with her two children. She waited while the children had breakfast and learned their verses, but she kept her eyes on the ground. One day, when the children were sent out to play, the teacher asked the poor woman why she was so sad. She replied that her husband had gone to the militia, and she was left alone. He might have stayed at his work if he could have paid £1, but this was impossible; before he left, however, he told her that when a little boy he was treated with great kindness by the teachers, given food when he was hungry, and had learned texts and hymns. Though he and his family were all Roman Catholics, yet he left it as his parting wish that the children should go to the mission school in his absence. So, very reluctantly, she obeyed, feeling strongly prejudiced against anything Protestant.

She determined, so far as she was concerned, not to listen to what was taught. However, when she found herself alone with the teacher, she became deeply touched by her sympathy, and greatly interested in what was told her of the love of Jesus, and from that day her mind opened to the living Word. And when her husband came home she told him of the change, and persuaded him to come to some of the evening meetings.

PERSECUTION SET IN,

and when his employer heard of what had taken place he dismissed him; but meantime both husband and wife had learned to trust in Jesus only, and after a short time of trial he found employment with a Christian man. This is only a specimen of numberless cases of blessing, showing that the Lord is working in our midst.

In the Coombe district we have a Boys' Home for sixty lads—fed, clothed, and taught. It would take a volume to describe all the encouragements we have had with these boys; to tell what they have been saved from, and of the success in life of the numbers who have gone out from the Home. Many of them are now engaged in the Master's work at home and abroad; not a few are in Canada, though, we are sorry to say, emigration is not so easy for us as in England, because the priests will not allow the parents to give permission.

Then there is the Elliott Home for 100 little children, also the Birds' Nest and its little sister, the Home in Spiddle, and the Helping Hand, for big lads, as well as the Grand Canal-street Boys' Home. The Helping Hand was opened for big boys who have lost their way in life, and would not know what to do unless they found a friend to help them. In the Home in Grand Canal-street, the eighty-six beds are always full. For years we have wished for a piece of ground at the back of the Home, where stood two rows of miserable hovels inhabited by a most objectionable set of people. It seemed a vain hope to think of getting them; but what seemed impossible to us was possible with God. Quite unexpectedly a man came forward and offered to purchase the whole lot in order to set up a circus on the site. This would, of course, have been most unpleasant and injurious to the Home, and, through the intervention of a valued friend, the ground is now ours, and will soon be turned into a garden, which will be a most useful addition to the Home.

Now, a word about the itinerating work. Most encouraging accounts come from all parts of the country. Surely the door is wide open, the people in most parts are just thirsting for the Gospel, and drink in the teaching with joy. Multitudes have never seen a Bible, and know nothing of the true way of salvation. The following will give some idea of the results of the work:—

"Visited the Market at ——, lovely bright day, large attendance, numbers of Roman Catholics came in from the country and mountains round. We sold and preached from 12 o'clock to 3.30. At times we had great crowds round us, most attentive, who bought as soon as we opened our store. Read Luke xv., with a running commentary for an hour; many passing would listen, while others would remain the whole time, with close attention. We had very blessed times in another part, and sold ninety-three testaments and eighty smaller books."

Again:—"We worked in —— Fair. Some were very suspicious of us, being warned by a priest who was walking about watching us. A Roman Catholic man and woman came up to tell us they were rejoiced some time ago when their son came home from a fair near where we had been, with a Douay Testament. It was just what they had been longing for. Next we worked in a small village, but large fair. We sold books, and also read various texts, which drew great crowds around us, notwithstanding a very hostile spirit manifested by some. A police-constable was warned, but he pushed through the crowds and asked us what we were selling. We showed him our books and explained our business, and he was perfectly satisfied and bought one. This encouraged many to do likewise; such a thing had never been done before. Hundreds of people eagerly drank in the truth, and purchased. A Roman Catholic woman regretted that she had not bought a Testament last time, so secured one to-day. An elderly gentleman, who listened a good while, said he had always objected to open-air preaching, but to-day he had seen so many Roman Catholics attentive and purchasing the Scriptures, that he saw the good and need of the practice. For these people would not be seen entering an evangelical place of worship, while they are glad of the opportunity of hearing the Gospel in the open-air. The Gospel message seemed to penetrate, as we spoke of sin and God's remedy, and lifted up Jesus only as our Advocate, Mediator, and Intercessor. Many heard the Word for the first time."

Rejoice with me in the wonders God is working in our midst.

THE YOUNG WOMEN'S MISSIONARY TRAINING HOME, in High-street, Kew, Melbourne, has been in operation over a year, giving Biblical instruction and practical training to young people preparing for Gospel work abroad. The first report states that thirteen candidates had been admitted, and three had left for their respective spheres of labour. The lady-superintendent, Mrs. Warren, says at the close of the report:—"Our purpose is to remove the Home to East Melbourne, and our own residence also, in August, so that we may be more central, near the Collingwood and City slums, where we hope, if the Lord will, to start a medical mission shortly. This will serve a three-fold purpose of healing the sick, and saying to them: 'The kingdom of God is come nigh unto you,' and providing both Gospel and medical training for our sisters. In order to accomplish this, Dr. Warren (hon. director) will, in future, confine himself to consulting practice (in town) as far as possible."

African Missions Visited.—10.

BY MR. D. A. HUNTER.

PRETORIA.

From Johannesburg I travelled to Pretoria, the seat of the Transvaal Government. It is a pretty spot, with an abundance of foliage, consequent on an ample supply of water, which is led in courses along the streets, and which can be diverted into private gardens for purposes of irrigation.

Right in the middle of the town is the Dutch Reformed Church, a fine building, standing in the centre of a large square. Here, four times a year, the "Nachtsmal," or communion season, comes round. It is quite a unique sight. Farmers from the surrounding country come trekking in with their families in their bullock wagons, and camp all around the church, frequently rigging up a small tent alongside their wagons, and cooking over camp fires lighted in the open square.

I am now at the Northern terminus of the railway system, so typical South African travelling begins from this point. It has been necessary to purchase a travelling wagon, and eight oxen to draw it. Two saddle horses and a dog complete the live stock, and the wagon has been provisioned for three months. A Zulu driver, a leader, or "tow-boy" as he is called, together with my friend and myself, make up the party.

It seems a very small matter on paper, storing a wagon for three months, but the actual work is no light duty. The hundred-and-one things to be thought of, and the quantities of stores calculated out, give one food for consideration. We hope to start on our long trek, provided with a good store of Zulu and Dutch gospels, and we shall be literally pitching our moving tent night by night one day's march farther on.

WAGON TRAVELLING.

I have along with me Rev. R. Shemeld, an American missionary, who has worked for some years among the Zulus in Natal, and who is now connected with the Cape General Mission, having charge of their native work in Pretoria. Being anxious to have a travelling companion, and knowing the C.G.M. are desirous to get information about, and push into unoccupied fields farther north, I offered them a seat for Mr. Shemeld in my wagon; so they have arranged for his work to be carried on in Pretoria during his absence, and have set him free to accompany me.

My driver is a tall Zulu from Natal, called Tom, a man who has come under the sound of the Gospel, but is not a Christian. We are praying that by God's grace he may learn to know Jesus as his personal Saviour during this trip. The "tow-boy," who leads the front oxen, and looks after the span while they graze, has been working in Pretoria, and is now returning to his home in the Spelonben. His mother is a Christian, but his father is still a heathen. A third native from one of the Swiss Mission stations also accompanies us. He is a Christian, and he, too, is returning home. He gets his bundle carried on the wagon, his food also he gets, and the protection afforded by our party travelling; and in return he makes himself generally useful.

Our usual mode of travel is to inspan the oxen about 5 a.m., and trek for three hours. Then we outspan and cook breakfast, while the oxen feed and are watered. Our second trek is for two hours, say from noon, and we make a third in the evening, from four or five o'clock, again for three hours. In this way we reckon to travel eight hours per day, at a rate of about three miles per hour, thus covering twenty-four miles a day.

When we come to sandy roads, where the wheels sink half-way up to the hubs, progress is very slow indeed, sometimes only a few yards between each rest; and this, of course, tires out the oxen, and greatly reduces the average distance covered. Yesterday and to-day we were on such roads, and they make a heavy drain on one's patience—even on African stock.

The style of life is very novel, and somewhat rough, but lovely weather and plenty of fresh air make up for a good deal. So soon as we outspan every one lends a hand, and a camp fire is soon blazing, with kettle and pot over it. I have had to learn to cook from force of circumstances. The first attempts were somewhat disheartening, but things are going on better now. Then we eat, and afterwards have to wash up the dishes; one washes and the other dries.

Time hangs by no means heavily. We seem always to be kept busy. Writing and reading have to be done during the outspans, for there is too much jolting while we travel. Then I am studying Zulu with the help of Mr. Shemeld.

In the mornings or evenings one of us usually rides off with gun or rifle to see if anything can be bagged for the larder. It is a great advantage to a man situated as we are, to know how to shoot, and I am thankful for the practice I had while serving as a volunteer in England. Game has been very scarce during the last few days, so we have had to draw heavily on our store of tinned corn beef; which has the disadvantage of making one very thirsty this weather.

Over Sunday we were outspanned at the Warmlead, where there is a hot mineral spring, said to be very good for rheumatism. Some thirty wagons were camped round, mostly belonging to Dutchmen, who had come for the sake of bathing in the water. We held a service on Sunday afternoon for those who understood English, and Mr. Shemeld sold several Dutch Bibles, etc., on Monday morning before leaving.

I have bought four more oxen, as eight were too few to drag the wagon through the sand. Last night we camped at a beautiful spot up in a mountain pass. We sat round the fire with the boys before turning in. Mr. Shemeld read to them from the Zulu Bible, and then prayed in Zulu, the boys kneeling with us, and joining in the Amen at the close of the prayer. We expect to reach a German mission station this evening.

PROTESTANT JOURNALISM IN FRANCE.

An effort is on foot in France to establish a daily paper that shall represent the best elements in the English and American daily newspaper, and, being published under Protestant auspices, shall strive to shake off the deadening influences of scepticism and agnosticism, and set France free from the enslaving bonds of materialism. For this purpose a company has been organised, and all Protestant parties have pledged their support.

M. Rougemont, who recently represented this new enterprise at the Press Congress at Chicago, makes the following statement in reference to the needs of such a paper, and the requirements for carrying forward such a commendable object:—

The time has come when the influences of a bad and corrupt literature in France should be counteracted by a sound, healthy Press. There is no paper, I fear, in Paris which exerts this desirable influence. The Roman Catholic Church has several dailies in France. Free thought, or even atheism, has still more; Protestantism has none.

The need of an organ, imbued with the morality taught in the Gospel, is deeply felt; one which will promote a higher social standard among the masses. For over a year M. Reveillaud, one of our best writers, and others equally influential, have been arousing public opinion concerning the need of such a paper, and have studied the best methods of its publication. Earnest searchers for truth among the youth of France, who first followed M. de Vogüé in his efforts towards the creation of a new France, are leaving him, now that they have discovered his Roman and Papal tendencies. The generality of students have, until now, maintained an expectant attitude. On the other hand, philosophy has founded no school to educate the young. Mr. Taine, who put the education of his family into the hands of Pasteur Hollard, used to deplore the absence of leaders. Historians, as Michelet, Ed. Quinet, Pelletan, H. Martin, have not succeeded to popularise their ideas. Protestants must do what others have failed to accomplish, and they will show France the way of a new and better life.

A social work has been organised among students through the efforts of MM. Couve, Jean Monnier, and James B. Reynolds, a young American. A good, non-partisan newspaper would prove a powerful help in this direction, and would represent and encourage all reform movements. It would be acceptable and helpful for the family—the only one of the kind, I fear, among all the papers of Paris, for among its contributors would be all the best Protestant writers and distinguished women. The Board of Management has a remarkable opportunity of purchasing at a relatively small cost, a daily paper published for many years past, bearing a well adapted title. The difficulty lies in the fact that Protestants are scattered throughout France, and are generally poor, with few exceptions, several of these not adequately realising the power of the press. Help can be given by subscribing to the stock of the company. The Société du Signal et de la Bonne Presse, is incorporated under the laws of France. Shares are of 100 fr. (or £4), the liability of shareholders being limited to the face value of their shares.

THE EVANGELISATION SOCIETY.

The latest report shows that far and wide all over the land the 254 evangelists of this Society have been carrying the Gospel message. The Hon. Sec. remarks: "Readers can form little idea of the variety of meetings evangelists are asked to address in the course of a year. It is scarcely too much to say that no class in our land is omitted. Those workers who devote their prayerful effort to various sections of society, such as railway men, post-office employés, factory hands, inmates of institutions, etc., etc., all in turn come to us for the preacher, and so it comes to pass that as one noble society is said to aid all the foreign missionary societies, the Evangelisation Society is ready to help and does help a large proportion of the evangelistic work of this country in the churches, in addition to its own very large number of missions taken in tents, schoolrooms, town halls, and other buildings throughout the year."

The testimonies given as to missions in England and Wales abundantly show the power of God resting on the clear presentation of the Gospel. The following, penned by Rev. W. Smith, of Melksham, fairly represents the general character of the reports from rural districts, country towns, and great cities:—

"We have much reason to thank God that ever our mission was held. The word so faithfully preached could not be in vain. We have reason to believe that God has blessed it to many. We have seen most to encourage amongst our young people; several for whom I have been watching and waiting for a long time have now been gathered in, and I am forming them into a class in order that they may be instructed and encouraged in the new life upon which they have entered.

"I have no doubt there are many others of whom we shall hear later on; I feel that the work has only just begun, but blessed be God for what has already been accomplished. Surely, if pastors of churches only knew what a help such missions were, they would arrange them much more readily than they do. Alas! unwise methods adopted by some evangelists have brought evangelistic work into bad repute; but when the Gospel is preached soberly, earnestly, and faithfully, as by your men, it cannot fail to prove a blessing. The Baptists, Congregationalists, and Wesleyans united in daily prayer, and these meetings proved to be times of refreshing to us all. The mission has given an impetus to our regular work, and has strengthened us in every way."

Much interest attaches to the very important branch of service through the summer months in tents. "From May to September we do our utmost to maintain an aggressive work in country villages, large towns, and seaside places, by means of tents. Last year we used thirty-two of our own tents, and eleven the property of others."

Details, similarly encouraging, follow of the work of the Scottish branch, now widely extended in the North, and great interest is reported in connection with many missions in the cities and in country districts. The report may be had of Captain William E. Smith, Hon. Sec. and Treas., 21, Surrey-street, Strand, W.C.

"HELPING HAND" tells of Rebecca Cox, of Garway, N.Y., who has left to the Baptist Woman's Missionary Society a legacy of 800dols., earned by weaving rag carpets!

AMONG JEWS IN NEW YORK.

In a special report, Mr. Hermann Warszawiak describes his growing work among Jews in New York. He says:—

The Mildmay Mission to the Jews (London) has again granted us a supply of 10,000 Hebrew New Testaments and 25,000 portions in Jewish-German to distribute among the Jews in this city and country, as their supply of last year of 10,000 New Testaments and 50,000 portions has been nearly all distributed. Some people say that sometimes the Jews destroy the Testaments which are given to them. It is surely only very, very seldom it happens in our work, for when we visit our Jewish brethren we always see the New Testaments in their homes, and read by a great many more than their own prayer-book. But I know of a case where even the tearing of the New Testament was the very means of a Jew's conversion.

A young man used to come to our meetings almost regularly, but he believed he knew that the whole teaching was false, and almost hated us in his heart. He, however, continued to come for the sake of telling others, whom we were influencing, that our doctrine was false. In fact, he believed he was thus doing God a service, and wanted, if he could, to destroy the whole mission. He often used to pray in his seat, while I was preaching, that God would send a fire over the church and burn the whole house, tracts and Testaments. All he himself, however, could do was to steal and put into his pockets as many New Testaments or tracts as he could and burn them in his own house, believing that by doing so he would please God. He took a few tracts or New Testaments with him whenever he could, and before going to bed tore them in pieces and burned them. One evening he had stolen three New Testaments, and while going to bed tore them all in pieces and threw them into the fire. It was a windy night, and a page was blown out of the fire. Afraid of the people in the house finding that he had Christian reading in the house, he jumped from his bed to pick up the page and put it in the fire again. His mind was disturbed that night with what he had seen at the meeting, and as he paused his eyes caught these words, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." The words struck him, and he stopped to read the whole sheet, which gave the account of

THE SAVIOUR'S CRUCIFIXION.

His whole course of behaviour came up before him, and he thought, Why! I have been going for about a year to that place and never hearing what is taught. I am stealing their books, and would be put into prison if they knew it. I am burning their books, which I have never read. May God indeed forgive me, for I know not what I have been doing! Next night he returned to the mission with a mind altogether changed, and for the first time listened indeed in earnest to the teaching, and soon became entirely changed; in course of time he was won to Christ, and to-day he is a most honest and true believer in the Lord Jesus Christ, having received Him by baptism.

My intention for the immediate future is to build a large tabernacle with a seating capacity for about 1500 to 2000 in the very heart of the Jewish population, which will be called "Christ's Synagogue," chiefly, or rather only, for Israelites. We shall receive every honest convert into our membership upon confession of faith, and, after a few months of probation, baptize them. The prayers, reading of Scriptures, and singing of psalms and hymns, will be conducted in the sacred Hebrew language, which will, of course, be a powerful attraction to the Jewish worshippers and new-comers. The "Christ's Synagogue," however, will acknowledge the rules and confession of faith of the regular Church of Christ, though it will be undenominational. There are now so many different classes of Reformed Jews among us in New York that there can be no doubt that this "reformed synagogue" will be heartily welcomed by a great many, especially among the many hundreds of Israelites who are already kindly inclined toward the truth of Christianity and interested in it. I myself have a list of several thousand Israelites to whom we have spoken about the new movement of the "Christ's Synagogue" congregation, and though many did not want to give me their names for positive membership, desiring first to see how the enterprise will proceed, they assured me of their interest in such a new movement. There is a desire among the Reformed Jews for a positive assurance of forgiveness and eternal life, and, as some of their leaders expressed in their newspapers, "such a thing must be borrowed from the religion of Jesus of Nazareth." We will say they do not need to borrow it, because it belongs to them naturally; it is from them that we have received it, and surely they are very welcome to their own Messiah.

A "training school for Jewish missionaries," for converts of our own and any other mission, will adjoin the synagogue, and after being trained by Hebrew and Christian teachers, and gaining experience in the work practically, they will be sent out all over America, where are at present living, and every year increasing by tens of thousands. Such an institution is scarcely to be seen in the wide world; but America has now become the greatest field for Jewish mission work; there is no doubt that here is the place where such a "central work" must be established. When one considers how the Hebrew Christian students are scattered over all the colleges, and receive no special training to fit them for Jewish work, and that of the 3000 converted Israelites preaching the Gospel to-day in different denominations, very few engage themselves to work for their own brethren, the need of our proposed training-school will be at once realised. I might as well mention, while it is written "to the Jew first and also to the Greek," there are in the United States cities with a Jewish population of 30,000 to 50,000, without a single labourer among them. Was not our brother Paul right when he said, "How shall they be saved if they do not hear? How shall they hear without a preacher? and how shall they preach except they be sent?"

The Christ's Synagogue building and the training-school, it is estimated, can be built, in a simple way of course, for about 100,000 dollars exclusive of the cost of the land, and quite a part of that amount has been already promised in various smaller and larger sums, while several thousand dollars are already lying in the bank for that purpose.

RITUALISM IN EAST LONDON.

Sir,—Your correspondent, Rev. W. F. Cobb, B.D., more fully known as assistant-secretary of the English Church Union, has done his best to defend the Society of which he is an official. As to the Ritualistic practices complained of at St. Clement's, he has substantially admitted the truth of the allegations, and this is quite sufficient reason for Christians to withhold their support from the East London Church Fund. His attempted defence of these practices will only strengthen the determination of those who prefer a Bible to a human religion.

But when Mr. Cobb says of the President of the E.C.U. that, though "he has certainly and very properly expressed a strong desire for reunion (with Rome), it is dishonest to omit his repeated declaration that any such reunion must be 'through the truth'"—in other words, he would see Rome's errors abandoned first—I would point out to your readers the highly interesting process by which this reunion is to be effected. When Lord Halifax was the Hon. C. L. Wood, he advocated at the Derby Church Congress, as a liturgical improvement, the use of the half-reformed Prayer-book of Edward VI., which, he contended, was in many respects far richer, and more calculated to place in its true sublime light the doctrine of the Holy Eucharist than the existing meagre Prayer-book. In the case of the Burial Service, the Prayer-book of Edward VI. had the advantage, because it afforded intercession for the dead.

Such utterances drew forth the immediate reply from Canon Hoare: "This great assembly has heard what has been said by Mr. Wood, the president of the English Church Union. We have been told this day that we are to go back to the liturgy and office of 1549, instead of accepting that of 1552, revised afterwards in 1662. We are told that ours is a falling off from the Use of Sarum. We are therefore told to look upon the Use of Sarum—the old Popish liturgy—as being the best. Mr. Wood has told us as plainly as possible that the object is to bring back the Church of England from the Reformed Church of 1552, to stop a little by the way, just in the refreshment-room of 1549, and then plunge head-foremost right into the Use of Sarum. I thank Mr. Wood for having let us know this day what are the real intentions of the English Church Union."

Hence a backward movement from light into darkness, an undoing of the work of the Reformation, a Rome-ward retreat, is Lord Halifax's method of effecting reunion with Rome, and this is what Mr. Cobb calls "reunion through the truth." Does this look like asking Rome to give up her errors? Is it not rather asking the English Church to give up her progressive enlightenment for the sake of reunion with Rome? In fact, the surrender is to be on the part of the English Church.

What, then, after such a discount, is the nett value of the expression "reunion through the truth"? Instead of its being a qualification of Lord Halifax's policy of "corporate reunion with Rome on the part of the English Church," it is, when interpreted in the light of his other speeches, simply a declaration of the method by which such reunion is to be effected.

It is easy for Mr. Cobb to separate Lord Halifax from the E.C.U., but why has the E.C.U. never deposed its President, or repudiated his presidential utterances as their spokesman at their annual meetings?—Yours truly, Observer.

CHEAP MISSIONARIES.

Dear Sir,—Is there not an idea afloat amongst supporters of Christian Missions that, because one can live cheaply in one country, every missionary in every other country ought to be able to do the same? I have never been to China or India, so I cannot form an opinion, but in North Africa (Algeria), where I have lived as a missionary for some time, I find it impossible to live at the same rate. Firstly, we cannot dress as the Arabs, and consequently cannot really live amongst them, without exciting an unnecessary suspicion on the part of the French authorities; secondly, we have to be careful to live as much like the French as possible, and identify ourselves rather with them than with the Arabs, for the same reason; and thirdly, the civilisation and presence of the French in a land not overstocked with food has necessarily made everything dearer.

The threat of expulsion still hangs over our heads; we remain simply upon sufferance, therefore we are obliged to avoid everything that could possibly raise suspicion. I have tried all ways and means to live cheaply, but, without reckoning house rent, travelling, teachers, clothes, etc., the cost of the simplest food, the very cheapest I have been able to live upon, is ten shillings a week. This also is the testimony of every man missionary in Algeria.

Therefore we ask our supporters not to judge us harshly if we cannot live as cheaply as others.

Yours truly in the best service,

North Africa Mission. W. G. Pope.

[We should think this by no means extravagant in Algeria. Of course it does not include house rent, clothing, or occasional expenses of any kind.—Ed.]

"LIFE AMONG THE ENGLISH POOR."

Sir,—The letter signed "W.H.C.," under the heading of "Life Among the English Poor," in your issue of August 17, does not give a fair idea of the state of the agricultural labourer. Having recently been staying at a village in Hampshire, I am able to speak from actual knowledge, and it is but just to the landlords and farmers to consider the question in all its bearings, i.e., not only what money the labourer receives, but also what he can buy with his money. In the village in question the labourers get ten or twelve shillings a week. For ninepence or one shilling a week they can rent a four-roomed cottage (put and kept in thorough repair by their landlord), with a good garden well stocked with fruit trees. Most of the labourers keep bees or fowls; some few keep a pig. Not only can the produce thus obtained be used at home, but money can be made from it at the neighbouring markets. At harvest time every villager can glean enough wheat to make bread for himself and his family through the winter, and to supply his fowls with food. Wood in any quantity for fuel can be obtained free.

In addition to all these advantages, the labourers nearly all belong to benefit clubs, from which they receive help in sickness: additional help is also given by the principal inhabitants and the rector, who knows every one of his parishioners. Surely the labourer, with such purchasing power in his money, and with so many expenses made altogether unnecessary, is better off than the town labourer, with his twenty or thirty shillings a week. Farmers can but ill afford to pay their labourers even their present wages; in most cases, to raise them would mean actual ruin. Many a Christian farmer and rector devoting himself to the good of the agricultural labourer would be naturally hurt and discouraged by the representation that these labourers are badly paid and uncared for.—Yours truly,

M. K. B.

REV. THOMAS EVANS and others are endeavouring to form a Liquor Prohibition League for India.

THE Y.M.C.A.

Mr. Southwell, well known for his labours as secretary of the Melbourne Y.M.C.A., is now doing good work at Orange, N.S.W.

The theatre services conducted by the Ipswich Y.M.C.A. (Queensland) are a gratifying success—large attendances and decisions for Christ.

The Auckland (N.Z.) Monthly Record reports that the work of the Y.M.C.A. is going on well, and that indoor and outdoor meetings have been largely attended.

The Dublin Association have received a promise of £25 if they can raise the £130 needed by September 15, to enable them to close their year's work without debt.

A carefully prepared draft of rules and constitution for adoption by Indian Y.M.C.A.'s has recently been translated into Hindustani for circulation amongst native young men.

An important Conference of Associations in the north is announced to take place at Sunderland on September 8. Lord Kinnaird, Mr. Arthur Pease, and Mr. John MacInnes are among those announced to take part.

Mr. Boyd, travelling secretary for Mid-Ireland, has just completed a most successful tour. Correspondents have been appointed at ten new centres, at some of which there is prospect of the early formation of new Associations.

The Young Men's Christian Magazine, organ of the associations of Scotland, continues its useful course on the wholesome lines of "no personalities, no bitterness, no gossip, and at the same time the minimum of heavy reading."

Mr. F. E. Wootton, Ness Villa, Lydd, Kent, hon. secretary of the Lydd Association, writes to say that if financial help is not forthcoming the rooms will have to be closed next quarter. This, he says, will be a great pity, as the work is prospering.

The latest report of the Adelaide Association is most encouraging. The aggregate attendance for the past year was 110,000. The theatre and other Gospel services have been fruitful, while special rescue work for young men, sadly fallen, has been much blessed. Every department appears to be going forward vigorously.

The International Training School at Springfield, Mass., has for some years been training young men as secretaries, physical directors, and officers for the Y.M.C.A. From an elaborate catalogue sent us (and which may be had of secretary O. C. Morse, Springfield), it is evident that care is taken to fit men practically for every detail of Association work.

The Sydney Association reports that the difficulties caused by the crisis are being surmounted, but it has involved a large amount of relief work, as many young men have been thrown out of work, and reduced to great straits. Says the secretary: "Our winter programme of work is now in full swing, and it is gratifying to state that, so far, it has been very successful."

At Aberdeen a short series of consecration meetings was conducted recently by three students who had been at Keswick. Much blessing has resulted. The special open-air band is about to close its meetings for the season. It has visited seven different places in the district. At its last meeting at the suburb of Woodside, much power was felt, and two enquirers were dealt with at the close. D.P.

The formal opening of the new rooms of the Cairo Y.M.C.A., situate at 3, Sharia-el-Manakh, took place on August 9. In declaring the premises open, Rev. Dr. Harvey gave a brief history of the work done by the Association since its inauguration in 1892, as a result of the efforts of Mr. Geo. Holmes, one of the foreign agents of the English National Council. This Association supplies a long-felt need, providing as it does, in addition to its religious meetings, a well-supplied reading room, which is open every evening, a good circulating and reference library, a literary and debating society, and various other advantages.

THE EAST END EMIGRATION FUND, during the ten years of its existence, has assisted over 4,000 persons to colonial life. In the report for last year the hon. sec., Captain G. le M. Gretton, describes in brief a tour of inspection of the emigrants sent to Canada. In all, he looked up 412 persons, and, with three exceptions, all who were of an age to work were duly employed. These included men who had been shopmen and artisans, as well as labourers of various orders, when able to get work in overcrowded London. Captain Gretton says: "Canada is so vast, and our emigrants so scattered, that I could only see those settled in and round large towns. I know that a very large number of those whom I did not attempt to visit are doing very well indeed. Many of them write to me, giving excellent accounts of themselves; while from the friends of many others I hear good reports." The office of the Fund is 44, Newark-street, Stepney, E.

THE Y.W.C.A.

Visitors to York may be glad to hear that rooms may be had at the Y.W.C.A. Institute, at very moderate charges. A quiet but real work is being carried on among the young women. There are about 200 members. Many pass their evenings there; some meeting or class is held nearly every evening (excepting in the months of August and September); and there are two Bible classes on Sunday.

The report for last year of the London Association is a bulky booklet of nearly 150 pages. In addition to a description of the work, there are particulars of the various branches, and of the different agencies for the protection of young women and their advancement in Christian life. Friends and supporters of the Association should procure copies of the report from the secretary, 16A, Old Cavendish-street, W.

By kind permission of Lady Henry Somerset, the Summer School of the Association recently met at Eastnor Castle. The object of the school is to train workers in Bible teaching and Y.W.C.A. methods. Two chaplains had charge of the Bible instruction, and two classes for this object were held daily. The former instruction was on the evidences of religion, conducted by Rev. Dr. Flavel Cook, and such topics as miracles, early documents, science, nature, and design, were ably treated, and opportunities afterwards given for questions and private instruction. Rev. H. E. Brooke, in his evening lectures, took the general scope and teaching of the Old Testament.

The school lasted ten days. Two classes were held each day on departmental work and methods, and were conducted by members of the committee and Mrs. Moore (hon. sec. of the United Central Council), Miss Jones (Manchester), Miss Williams (Birmingham). The idea of a school was kept up throughout, and all who came promised to keep the rules and attend all the classes. These were often held at the cedar tree, so that tired workers might imbibe fresh air to the lungs at the same time as instruction. The afternoon was devoted to recreation, tennis being provided, and the house afforded to lovers of art among the students endless delight. Sectional meetings were held after tea, the attendance being optional, though very few of the number ever absented themselves. The evening conferences were a peculiar feature of the summer school; they were held in the large library, and very able papers were read from Y.W.C.A. workers unable to be present, and by the chaplains and teachers. They were followed by animated discussion.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOUR NOTES.

A Christian Endeavour Union has been formed at Ipswich, Queensland.

The British Convention of 1894 will be held in London, and probably in the Metropolitan Tabernacle.

Christian Endeavour is making great strides in South Australia. The annual Convention was held on 20th June.

"Endeavour" has just been successfully inaugurated in Whitby, and is hoping to do good work "for Christ and the Church."

The Morningside Congregational Church Y.P.S.C.E., Edinburgh, have decided to raise £20 a year to support a native evangelist of their own in South India.

A sunrise prayer meeting, held jointly by the Y.P.S.C.E. and Y.M.C.A. in Adelaide, has been very successful, proving a happy means of fellowship between the two institutions.

Mr. Jue Hawk, a Chinaman, who delivered one of the most inspiring missionary addresses at last year's International Christian Endeavour Convention, is now conducting a mission among his own people in Portland, Ore.

The Sunday School Union has published a little book, which should be in large demand among Endeavourers. It is entitled, "Christian Endeavour Principles: Stated and Commended from British Experience." (1s.) The various features of the movement are ably treated by different writers, including Revs. E. R. Hassé, A. Soothill, J. J. Muir, J. B. Morgan, J. R. Davies, and T. Townsend.

Christian Endeavourers in Malvern, N.S.W., hold from time to time, "an Evening with the Sunday-school." Invitations are given to the elder scholars, some fifteen or twenty attending. The president conducts an evangelistic service, being well supported by the members, who pray, give texts, and speak a few words encouraging the young people to accept Christ as their Saviour. At a recent meeting, those who would definitely accept Christ were asked to give a sign; some six or eight hands were held up in response to the invitation.

JEWISH NOTES.

Mr. Joseph Rabinowitz, now returned from the United States, rejoices in the wonderful opportunities he had there of preaching to Jews in New York, Chicago, and Boston. Nowhere has Jewish missionary enterprise been so suddenly aroused, nor organisations so speedily called into existence as in New York. In that city there are ten recognised Jewish Missionary institutions, besides various minor efforts.

The Jewish Era, the organ of the Chicago Hebrew Mission, gives a list of Jewish Missions in various countries. Mr. Blackstone, speaking particularly of work in Chicago, says: "Surely, in these latter days, the Lord is doing great things for Israel. He is pouring out a spirit of inquiry upon his people. Many Jews to-day are eager to read the New Testament; many are willing, as we see at our Mission, to hear of Jesus and his redeeming love. Some are earnest inquirers, having a hunger and thirst after the truth, while others come out boldly for Christ. Besides, there are a multitude of secret believers. May it be the heart's desire and prayer of God's people everywhere that Israel be saved."

Colonisation, says the Jewish Chronicle, has now become so important a feature in Palestinian life that the movement has an organ of its own. It is a periodical entitled "Der Colonist," and is published in Hebrew-German.

Though we live in the rapid nineteenth century, and though the Jew is becoming every year a more prominent figure socially, politically, and religiously, one still needs cautiously to note the trend of events before considering this or that "a sign of the times." Perhaps it is not so correct to say that Judaism is decaying as that it is fast losing its hold on multitudes of Jews. Most especially are there signs not wanting that the power of the Rabbis and the Talmud is on the wane. This, however, is not a step Christwards. It may, indeed, in some cases set minds free to consider the claims of Christ Jesus, and to give Him their hearts. It may clear the air of clouds of error, and permit the sunshine of the Sun of Righteousness to be seen and felt; but, on the whole, the "Reformation" going on in orthodox Judaism seems to be the result of indifference and respectability on the one hand, or Socialism and infidelity on the other. It is, in a word, the work of the spirit of the nineteenth century. And that is not nearer the Spirit of God; it is, from his standpoint, degeneracy, not improvement.

Still it is interesting and instructive to watch every feature of the present-day internal, as well as external, history of the Covenant people. The Hebrew paper Hamelitz recently contained an article, over the signature of Esra Goldin, of Warsaw, from which the following extract is taken:—

> The Talmud does not possess the power of awakening in the heart of our youth a national love: only the Holy Scripture has this. The idea that every Jew is obliged to study the Talmud has been the ruin of many of our brethren. By reason of their ignorance of the Word of God, they have fallen from faith in the God of their fathers. I do not need to confirm this sad fact by illustration, as I hold it to be a well-known fact to those who know anything of the needs of the people in our time.
> The learned Rosenfeld says that if we want to be true Jews in heart and soul, we must educate our children in the Talmud, which is the fountain of Judaism, the source of Jewish wisdom and glory. Such phrases, however, are only used by such as do not grasp one hair's-breadth of the views of our fathers. We, however, who move with the times—we are of opinion that to the awakening of love towards the Jewish nation, to its wisdom and morality, only one book is necessary. It is the Book of books which alone can inspire, not only in the Jewish heart, but in the heart of all mankind, a holy and a pure spirit, a spirit of wisdom and of knowledge. This small book, the Bible, is written with the finger of God; on its holy pages is engraven the poetry of mankind, to which poetry the ear of those nations bends whose hearts are full of the Holy Ghost and the fear of God. Only this Book is calculated to purify morals and to make stubborn hearts wise.

THE NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL HOME FOR CRIPPLED BOYS, Woolsthorpe House, Wright's-lane, Kensington, W., receives for three years, and trains on Christian principles, destitute and neglected crippled boys between the ages of thirteen and eighteen. The average number of inmates during last year was eighty-five; this was fifteen short of what the building is able to accommodate, but the want of the necessary funds compels the committee to keep some beds vacant. Twenty-two boys left, after completing their period of training, to follow trades or fill situations. The report says: "Doubtless there are many who are physically unable to undergo industrial training; still, it is a fact that many cripples are growing up a burden to themselves, their friends, and society, who, if taken in hand, might be made as industrious and self-supporting as their able-bodied brethren. For these 'possible' cases the Home exists, and the committee earnestly trust that the benevolent will afford them increased support whereby they may carry to a greater extent this philanthropic work." Communications should be addressed to the secretary, Mr. F. J. Bovis, at the Home.

SCOTTISH NOTES.

A conference was held in Bethany Hall, Glasgow, on Saturday, August 19th. Nearly 1400 persons were present, showing the interest manifested in the Lord's work in this centre of blessing.

On Sunday evening Mr. R. Scott-Moncrieff addressed some three thousand persons in the East Meadows, Edinburgh, on "Jews in Palestine," showing how the people are flocking back to the land.

A well-attended conference of the Railway Mission was held at Edinburgh on Saturday last. On Sunday afternoon there was a great open-air gathering on the Calton Hill, and evening meetings in several churches.

Principal Brown, of Aberdeen, has entered his 90th year, and, notwithstanding his extreme old age, he is still fit for active service. Many were astonished at the vivacity he manifested in a speech which he delivered at the last Assembly; and, but a few days ago, he took an effective part in the proceedings connected with the laying of the foundation-stone of the Salvation Army barracks at Aberdeen.

A series of successful meetings has recently been held on the west coast by Jaakoff Prelooker, the founder of the New Israel Movement in Russia, and late head-master of the Government School at Odessa. His addresses have been greatly appreciated by large congregations, and the sympathy he has evoked on behalf of the Stundists has been very marked. A provisional committee for Scotland, to afford help to these dissenters from the Orthodox Greek Church, has been formed, and among its members are the Moderators of the three leading Presbyterian churches, whilst the Principal of Edinburgh University acts as chairman.

IRISH NOTES.

A Holiness Convention, extending over two days, was held last week in Bangor, co. Down, under the auspices of the local Christian Workers' Society, of which Mr. S. Montgomery is the leading spirit.

A Home of Rest, commenced on a small scale for girls at Warrenpoint, co. Down, under the auspices of the Girls' Friendly Society, has been transferred to Rostrevor, where it has been opened on a much larger scale and a broader basis.

The Christian Endeavour movement is undoubtedly growing in Ireland. On Tuesday evening week a largely-attended meeting of those interested in the movement was held in the Y.M.C.A. Hall, Belfast, when Rev. Wm. Patterson, of Toronto, briefly stated the objects and history of the society, and urged everyone to try and do something for the Master's sake.

During the past twelve months the Belfast Branch of the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children dealt with 405 cases, including 946 children, and out of sixty-two cases in which it had to invoke the aid of the law it got convictions in all except one, the offenders in several instances being imprisoned for periods varying from four months to fourteen days. In most of the cases intemperance is at the root of the evil, but in some it cannot be doubted that it springs from a vicious desire to stealthily get rid of the poor child, and obtain the little money for which it has been insured. The Society is doing a splendid work, and is a real advantage to the community.

The Colliers' Strike.

Dear Sir,—Doubtless your readers are more or less conversant with the labour struggle which has raged in the Welsh coalfields the past few weeks. I am not asking help for the strikers, but I earnestly appeal to your readers to pity the aged infirm fathers and mothers, helpless wives and poor children, who are feeling the pinch of hunger, and more especially for the wives and children of the steel, iron, and tin workers, who for months past have suffered keenly through depression in these trades. Now that they are thrown into enforced idleness by the colliers' strike, their position is most pitiable. I shall be pleased to receive gifts in money or kind for them.—Yours in Christ's service, Thos. M. Wintle.

Pontymoile, near Pontypool.

WHAT A HUNDRED DOLLARS WILL DO.—In illustration of what can be done with a small amount of money, Rev. Mark Williams, of Kalgan, China, explained, at the recent Mission Conference in Clifton Springs, what 100 dollars will do in North China. 1. It will maintain a boys' day-school of twenty-five, as it will pay the rent of the room and salary of the teacher. 2. It will maintain three boys in a boarding-school. 3. It will pay the salary of two native preachers. 4. It will pay the wages of two colporteurs, who not only sell, but explain the Bible. 5. It will support a station-class of twenty men, who spend all their time for three months in Bible study.

Evangelistic Notes.

Rev. E. P. Hammond has been labouring with good results at Greenfield, Mass. The various denominations united heartily, and many professed conversion.

Mr. Richard Weaver has concluded a mission at Bedford. He hopes to visit Wimbledon on September 23, and afterwards Stratford. His health continues indifferent.

Messrs. B. and F. Weaver held last week a special mission in the New Central Hall, Newcastle, which has just been formally opened for evangelistic and temperance work. Good audiences were secured and great power manifested.

Aberystwith.—The Lord has manifested his presence in blessing to quite a number of young visitors, and also to some older ones, during three weeks' services on the beach. We hope to continue the services till about the middle of September.

G. Bennett.

New South Wales.—According to the Australian Independent special evangelistic missions have been held during July and August by Messrs. D. O'Donnell and D. Wright in many outlying parts of this colony. Much interest has been aroused and fruitful work done.

Cheddar.—Gospel services have been conducted by Rev. J. S. Haggett, of Watchet, in a tent at Cheddar during the past fortnight in connection with the Open-air Mission. These have proved most successful, the tent being crowded. Many testify to blessing received. Several thousand Gospel tracts and portions of the Word were distributed.

Hull.—Mr. and Mrs. Evens have just concluded a series of special services in Scott-street Chapel, Hull. The services from the first have proved that crowds can be drawn even during the hot nights of August. Certainly the singing of Mrs. Evens was a great attraction, and helped many to decision. The exposition of God's Word by her husband carried weight with it, which proved effectual in bringing many to Christ.

Yoxford.—The last few Sundays the ordinary services in several country places in this district have been held in the open air by Rev. C. A. Pollard, and such numbers gathered together as amply to justify the step taken. The most pleasing feature was the number of working-men attending, and it was evident that if such services had not been held they would not have heard the truth, as they belonged to the class who never attend any place of worship. There can be little doubt, from the testimonies given, that not only have outsiders been impressed, but that many professing Christians have entered into a more joyous experience and courageous spirit through an open confession of Christ in the open air.

Rev. F. C. Spurr will (D.V.) hold missions in London as follows:—Sept. 3-10, Spencer-place, Islington; Sept. 17-20, Ferme Park, Hornsey; Sept. 24 to Oct. 1, Wynne-road, Brixton; Oct. 8-12, Vernon Chapel, King's Cross; Oct. 15-22, Forest Hill.

LESSONS FROM MORDECAI'S LIFE.

Ps. xl. 3, 4

He was God-fearing in a difficult place.—Esther ii. 21.

He feared not man, but feared to disobey God's command (see Acts v. 29).—iii. 21.

He had an unselfish spirit, which would not allow him to rest at ease while others were suffering.—iv. 1.

But this love did not hinder his steadfast obedience to God, though the people suffered through it.—v. 9.

His true love for Esther, shown by his advising her to do right in face of danger.—iv. 8, 13, 14.

Had great faith in God, in spite of ominous circumstances.—iv. 14.

He was not a lazy servant of God; he did more than counsel others to do right.—iv. 17.

Prayer necessary even for those things which we believe God is willing to do (see Ezek. xxxvi. 36, 37).—iv. 16, 17.

If it had not been for Mordecai this deliverance might never have been accomplished. God needs devoted servants, who do not fear man, and are willing to be made channels for his working; sometimes these are unrecognised by the world, even as we think more of Esther than of Mordecai.

To Mordecai, as to all God's children, evil worked together for good.—ii. 21 and vi. 3.

We are members one of another (Rom. xii. 5), and on the obedience of one may hang issues of blessing to many.—vii. 15, 16.

Out of grief to honour risen,
Winning rapture for thy pain,
And a palace for thy prison,
And a sceptre for thy chain.

Is not this the reason why God does not give us similar deliverances and victory over our enemies—viz., that we do not show our trust by fearless obedience in the face of circumstances?

Personalia.

Pastor Tonjoroff returns this week to Bulgaria.

Lord and Lady Aberdeen sail for Canada on 7th inst. to take up the duties of their high office in the Dominion.

Dr. Monro Gibson, with Messrs. F. F. Belsey, E. Towers, and C. Waters, of the S.S.U., have sailed for America to attend the S.S. World's Convention.

Rev. W. Wetton Cox, clerical secretary of the London Association in aid of the Moravian Missions, has so far recovered from his long illness as to be able to be at his post again.

The Dean of Chichester (Dr. R. W. Randall) is still in a delicate state of health. He is at present staying at Slough, near Windsor, with his younger brother, the Bishop Suffragan of Reading.

Rev. Frederick A. Klein, who has been actively engaged in connection with the Church Missionary Society for forty-two years—thirty-one years in Palestine and eleven at Cairo—is resigning his work.

Rev. F. B. Meyer hopes to recommence his ministry at Christ Church, Westminster Bridge-road, on Sunday, September 3. Services, 11 and 6.30. The Thursday morning service recommences on September 21, at 11.30.

Rev. J. B. Barraclough, M.A., who was formerly, for nearly eleven years, minister of the Episcopal Jews' Chapel, Palestine-place, Cambridge-road, has accepted the important charge of St. Thomas's, Westminster Bridge-road.

Mr. J. C. Lanphier, who founded the Fulton-street noon prayer-meeting, New York, in 1857, has at length felt compelled by advancing years to retire from the active charge of the daily meeting. His place has been filled by Rev. C. F. Cutter.

Canon Tristram was, we regret to learn, attacked by illness on Sunday, the 13th. The cause is unquestionably overwork. His many friends will be glad to know that he is very much better, but he has been ordered absolute rest for three months.

The Bishop of Bath and Wells entered on his eighty-sixth year on Sunday last, having been born August 20, 1808. He graduated from Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1830, was ordained in 1832, and was consecrated Bishop of Bath and Wells in 1869.

The Archdeacon of Stafford (Rev. M. H. Scott) still continues to make steady progress towards recovery, and there has been improvement in all the most serious symptoms. It will, however, even under the most favourable circumstances, be a long time before he is able to resume his work.

Principal Edwards, who has been ill some time, has received permission from Dr. Andrew Clark to resume his duties at Bala College in September. He is at present preparing a series of lectures on "The Fatherhood of God," and aiding in arranging for a Summer School of Theology to be held at Llandrindod Wells.

Mr. George C. Needham, of E. Northfield, Mass., U.S.A., is greatly improved in health; he hopes soon to be in full working power. For some time he will give his service to Bible teaching in colleges, churches, and institutes, until able to prosecute his evangelistic work. He still covets prayer, but mingled with thanksgiving.

Pastor and Madame Lopez-Rodriguez are most anxious to hear of three lady workers with private means, to return with them at the end of September to work in the Province of Gerona, North-east Spain. Communications should be addressed to them, care of Dr. Macwhirter Dunbar, Hedingham House, Clapham Common, S.W.

Rev. W. Hopkyn Rees, who has been creating so much missionary interest in Wales, has now set sail on his return to China. A Welsh correspondent says:—"By his fervour and earnestness he has inaugurated a new era in the missionary life of Wales. No one will forget the two hours' speech at the Union meetings at Ferndale last year. It produced an overwhelming effect. It seemed as a strong wind from the hills of God."

Rev. Dr. Charles F. Deems, the well-known pastor of the Church of the Strangers, New York, has been seriously ill during past weeks, and for a time it was thought that he could scarcely recover. He had rallied from the severe stroke of paralysis in December last, but never fully recovered strength, and recently was attacked by fever which developed an abscess. The latest news, however, says that he is improving and there is hope of recovery.

BELFAST TOWN MISSION.—The report of this Mission gives interesting details of the work of its eighteen missionaries who go from house to house, as well as visit factories, yards, ships, &c. Many incidents are given, showing the good results among the lowest classes. The secretary is Mr. William Maxwell, 12, May-street, Belfast.

The Christian.

Notes and Comments.

NEXT week we purpose giving portrait and sketch of the late Mr. Henry Cook, of the English and French Coasting Mission.

On another page we give an extract from an article by Rev. W. F. Crafts, showing how a combined and firm Christian sentiment has sufficed to defeat the machinations of Sabbath-breakers at the World's Fair. This bit of modern history carries with it a deep lesson for all who are seeking to combat the giant evils of their time. The power of evil is strong, but it would be a libel on the constitution of things to say that the power of goodness, when properly evoked and firmly pressed home, is not stronger. If those who make up the Church of the living God would only cease their internecine divisions and strifes, and meet the satanic forces of the day with unbroken and determined front, the Lord would assuredly give them the victory.

In the same number of Our Day, in which Mr. Crafts' article appears, there is a very pungent protest by an American judge against the negro lynchings of the Southern States. He demands the punishment of mob murderers equally with private murderers, and says:—

When the same individual conscience which compelled the directors to close the gates of the World's Fair on Sunday shall count the taking of a coloured man's life by a white mob an equally grave offence against Christian morals, lynching will cease to be an American institution, and this shall cease to be known as "the land of Christian murderers"!

"Christian murderers!" was there ever a more striking illustration of the cutting words "If the light that is in thee be darkness, how great is that darkness?"

Having been led to comment in a previous issue on the alleged P.S.A. incident, we have pleasure in reproducing the following paragraph from The Independent of last week:—

The P.S.A. movement has many insidious enemies with which to contend. Mr. J. Blackham, the originator of the movement, writes us to say that, "according to the Christian World of August 10 a hoax has been played upon the Manchester Courier by a writer who signed himself 'A Manchester Reporter,' giving a remarkable account of irreverent proceedings at a P.S.A. at Oldham. An investigation has been made, and the writer has published an apology, acknowledging that all his statements were absolutely false, and that he drew on his imagination for his facts. It transpired that the writer of the letter was not a Manchester reporter, and that he was not present at the service he pretended to describe. A similar, but milder, joke has been played on some other papers, describing a pipe of tobacco as a bribe for attendance. Careful inquiries have been made, but no foundation has been discovered for the statement."

The interviewer is no longer a newspaper bore, who, by impudence and adroitness, has to push his way into the presence of some distinguished or notorious person, and extract from him all that can be obtained for the gratification of public curiosity. He is a friendly representative of a friendly magazine, to which perhaps the interviewed person is a famous contributor; even the Editor may condescend to fill the place. But now that we are entering on this new way, may it be suggested that some regard should be paid to the sacred privacy of home? We cannot afford to have our wives' rooms, our children's nurseries, our family history, all laid bare for everybody's eyes to see. An Englishman's house is his castle, but it should also be his shrine, to intrude on which would be sacrilege. All the same, we are grateful for the knowledge which is given to us of the inner thoughts and dearer hopes of some who are accounted leaders among us, if, consistently with modesty and a due regard for others' feelings, they choose to unbosom themselves.

Archdeacon Sinclair has been seen "at home" by The Sunday Magazine, and has said many interesting things. He informs us that the curates of to-day are drawn principally from the professional and upper commercial classes, rather than from a higher social class, as was formerly the case. In this fact he sees a danger; the young men of to-day are more inclined to the sacerdotal school, "as giving them an impression and position of greater importance." It will be news to many that the weakest point of the Church of England to-day is clerical education.

Very few men come to the parishes with training in, or appreciation of, the composition of sermons, or public reading, which are two of the most important functions of the clergy; and many of them know nothing of pastoral work, and are utterly without experience of the working classes or knowledge of working-class ideas or movements.

The passmen from Oxford come least prepared of all. The men who come to the Bishop of London best trained are those from the Church Missionary College at Islington, and next to them are the men from Highbury. Archdeacon Sinclair thinks that before a young man is ordained he should have done two years' work as a layman in a parish populated by the labouring classes. In these practical and sensible views all who desire the efficiency of Christian workers must heartily concur.

Archdeacon Sinclair's favourite idea, a dream of his heart, is a more intimate and active union between the Church and Nonconformity. But he seems to be far more conscious of difficulties in the way of its realisation than of any forces or methods by which it may be brought to pass. It is a disappointing part of the interview. He thinks that on the side of the Church the chief hindrance to a mutual understanding "is the extensive influence still exerted in the Church by the party which has been the outcome of the Oxford movement." This influence he regards as transitory. On the side of Nonconformists, difficulty comes from their demand for disestablishment and disendowment. He is of opinion that a conference between Churchmen and Nonconformists, much on the lines of the Savoy Conference, would do much good. We wish we could think so, too. But when and where would Sacerdotalists ever meet Nonconformists? To consent to do so would be to concede the most vital point in dispute—sacerdotal privilege.

A preacher said recently that the churches have never yet done anything in a united and resolute way to make peace the standing relation between the nations; that they leave this to the Quakers, the Benjamin among the tribes of Israel; but that these are now too busy making money to attend thoroughly to the sacred trust committed to their care. In the same town where this was said the Friends' Meeting House is closed, as, unfortunately, it is in some other places. Leaving the question as to how far the Friends are responsible for the advocacy of peace, we may express our deep indebtedness to them for what they have done and are doing; and we may add an expression of our fear that the money-making fever of our times has found its victims in every church, and has left its desolating mark on every communion. Time goes to money-making, and the money to luxuries, and so Christ and his cause are left in poverty.

It is refreshing to observe that at the twenty-sixth annual Congress of the International League of Peace and Liberty, to be held at Geneva on September 24, one of the subjects set down for discussion is "Morality in Politics." No doubt the primary application of it will be to the particular policy which the League exists to promote, but the mere mention of such a topic is like a breeze of keen mountain air. Morality in politics means the adoption of principle rather than expediency; it is the death of compromises with evil; it implies a perpetual reference of measures to the influence and effect they will have over the highest life of the people; it embraces international policy, and signifies that the strong may not oppress the weak. Sooner or later it will also become indisputably manifest, that if we are to have morality in politics, we must also have moral politicians. Men's measures resemble their makers. Above all, morality in politics would mean ruling in the fear of God.

Rev. W. Carlile, of the Church Army, writes to The Guardian an interesting letter on "Lay Co-operation and the Church Army." He submits that the simple soldiers, who are not only unpaid but weekly subscribers to the parochial evangelistic work of the Army, "are quite as pure in their intention to win their own companions as any clergyman." He denies that they have any desire to "ape the parson," or to seek the priesthood and administer the sacraments.

If anything, their fault is to make too little of these things in their zeal to reach their outcast brothers. Very likely, we would add, because they unconsciously see how useless these things are to do anything for the outcast.

The voluntary work and voluntary giving of the Church Army are a striking proof of the value of such workers as fill its ranks. Mr. Carlile assures us that thousands of unpaid laymen, "all paying members in numerous parishes of England, after a hard day's work, devote three or four nights a week, under the direction of their vicar, from seven to nine in the evening." They seldom hear their own voices. "Last year the contributions from the poor, mostly in pence, amounted to over £15,000." Mr. Carlile says:—

There are many earnest communicants with a keen desire for the spiritual welfare of their fellow men who are quite unable "to manage clubs, keep accounts, and superintend Sunday-schools." They can neither read nor write sufficiently well for this, but they know well the interior of a public-house, and the interior of a drunkard's home. They know well how to get at him when very few clergymen can do it. On the other hand, after these humbler folk have worked under their own vicar for some years, they become most earnest workers in the various ways suggested above.

The effect of the Church Army upon the evangelistic spirit and evangelistic labours of the Church of England has been very great. Mr. Carlile says that the clerical secretary of the London City Mission, which employs 480 laymen in the metropolis, has publicly stated that eleven years ago it was almost impossible for him to find any evangelistic men who were "Churchmen," but that now there is a copious supply through the labours of the Church Army. In all this one cannot but rejoice, but our satisfaction is somewhat disturbed on learning that amongst the resident chaplains at the training institutions of the Church Army there are moderate men of the three great schools; certain of the officers have preferences for one school and others for others. The managers of the Army try and suit the man to the special needs of the parish as far as they can, "loyalty being thoroughly insisted upon." The "Churchmanship" of the Army is quite as distinct and as distinctive as anything about it.

The gullibility of persons who are bent on making money anyhow is a wonder to quiet onlookers. Perhaps the most foolish are those who study the "tips" in certain sporting papers. Could they be got to read the matter-of-fact article which Rev. J. W. Horsley has sent to The Westminster Gazette on the "Mahdis of the Turf," even they might pause before laying their next bet on the word of some knowing adviser. Mr. Horsley has taken "the prophecies" of seven sporting papers on eight races, with the following results:—

Eight races, seven prophets, seventy-nine prophecies between them, and of these prophecies five right and seventy-four wrong! If these things are done in the green tree of expert knowledge, what is probable in the dry tree when the average working-man thinks he can spot the winner and is in the know?

As I have mentioned the names of the papers who kindly provide this information for the benefit of our betting youth, I may as well give credit where it is due, and note the amount of success each achieved. The Sportsman named thirteen horses, and was right once; The Sporting Life named eight, and was right once; The Field named twelve, but never hit the mark; The County Gentleman had ten choices, all ineffectual; Land and Water was right twice out of nine attempts; The Sporting Times believed in twelve animals (not including the prophet), but was basely deceived by all; and The Licensed Vituallers' Gazette could not be contented with less than fifteen winners for the eight races, but only once was right.

Every preacher who preaches on gambling, and every teacher who speaks to his class, should give these facts a prominent place. If people are slow to perceive the immorality of turf speculation, let them, at any rate, know of its folly and futility.

The devotees of modern rationalistic criticism are unreasonably positive and impatient. It is quite provoking to observe their insistence upon conjectures as if they were conclusions, and their maintenance of mere theories as if they were elements of definite knowledge. Intellectual pride is a snare; and efforts to discredit the Book which records God's revelation to man appeal strongly to this dangerous spirit. An exemplification of critical arrogance was afforded recently by a review in The Daily Chronicle of Dr. Easton's very useful "Illustrated Bible Dictionary" (5s. Nelson). This work is an endeavour to help people to understand the Bible and its teachings. Because it is not a repertory of doubts and worthless speculations, the reviewer declares it "altogether untrustworthy." It is obvious, however, that the real quarrel is with the Holy Scriptures themselves, which we, as well as Dr. Easton, and Christians in every clime, with abundant reason, regard as "given by inspiration of God, and profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness, that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good work."

Dr. Benjamin Gregory, in retiring this month from the editorship of the Wesleyan Methodist Magazine, brings to an abrupt conclusion the series of articles which he began in the January issue entitled "'Theology in Transition' and the Bible in 'Suspense.'" The papers have throughout shown a useful acquaintance with a large literature; while the critical tendencies have been unsparingly exposed to view, the authority and integrity of the Word of God have been abundantly vindicated. In conclusion, Dr. Gregory sets himself to answer the significant question, "Is it possible to surrender the trustworthiness and truthfulness of Holy Scripture, and yet retain the authority and competence of our 'Teacher and Lord'?" Thus, incidentally, he deals with the objection of some, very plausibly worded, that "no book must come between the disciple and the Master".

Now, the Master stood by the Old Testament Scriptures: "they testified of Him." The critics not only analyse those Scriptures, but, arguing about the kenosis, or self-emptying, they qualify the authority, if not the moral character, of the Christ of God. Dr. Gregory tersely says:—

As to the Old Testament, it would be a grave reflection on our own discipleship were we to discuss that any further, after having adduced the express and energetic testimony of Christ in refutation and rebuke of this most unjust aspersion of his leading witness. And, surely, the case as to the New Testament is too resplendently clear and conclusive to need an argument. No open-minded reader of the New Testament can avoid knowing that, so far from being an intrusive obstruction between the soul and Christ, its whole spirit, structure, substance, is such as to make the way to Christ the straightest, smoothest, most unmistakable that Divine engineering could possibly construct. From the first verse to the last, from "The book of the generation of Jesus Christ" to "The grace of the Lord Jesus be with you all"—the whole aim and tendency of the Book—that which gives it unity, coherence, completeness, and vitality—is the leading the soul direct to Christ. "Him first, Him last, Him midst, and without end," is the very principle on which it rests. All its doctrines radiate from Him, all its minor themes converge to Him.

In a peculiarly forcible manner, Dr. Gregory shows that to charge the Bible with obstructive intrusion between the soul and Christ, is "a foundationless libel most unduteously got up by those who owe all their real knowledge of Christ to that very Bible itself"! Moreover, the apologist who, from excessive zeal for criticism, maintained that Christ himself had been proved fallible, is shown in reality to have permitted an indefinite number of books—mostly German, and mutually contradictory—to come between himself and Christ, and to reverse the pronouncements of Christ regarding the Old Testament!

A friend of the Wesleyan Missionary Society has intimated his intention to supplement his missionary subscription by a birthday donation of £100 a year. In a letter to Rev. F. W. Macdonald, secretary of the Society, he attributes this intention to "renewed obligation" aroused at the recent Keswick Convention. We trust many will follow his excellent example. He says:—

I am sometimes tempted to think that as a Church we are not as earnest as we might be, and are being outstripped by other Churches in our efforts for the conversion of dark and heathen nations. I hope, however, this is not the case, and will never be, but that, as true followers of Wesley, whose heart was as big as the world, we shall be determined to shoulder our responsibility, and by increased individual and united effort make our Church as effective in the world as the Great Head of the Church would have it be.

It was the grandest sight it was ever my privilege to behold to see at the Keswick Convention scores of persons of both sexes rising to signify their readiness to consecrate their all to God, and their willingness to go to any sphere of work to carry the Gospel of Jesus Christ to the heathen. I shall never forget the mighty wave of spiritual power which swayed the congregation, numbering over 2000 people, and which was still more intensified when parents in all parts of the tent rose to signify their willingness to dedicate their children to Christ to go for service in foreign countries. I would that the same spirit of consecration might lay hold of the rising youth of Methodism.

Rev. H. H. Moore, of Hilltown, Ireland, has a comment in The Expository Times on "Rahab and Another," in which he seeks to lend a fresh interest to the story of the woman that was a sinner. Admitting that our Lord's treatment of her is sufficiently explicable from the divine standpoint, he seeks for an additional element of human interest by supposing that our Lord, who, as to the flesh, stood in a direct line of descent from Rahab, went back in thought to the times of Joshua, and recalled the stained life of his ancestress:

That the annals of his own ancestral life were not without the record of, at least, one name deeply dyed with the marks of shameful living, would establish in his heart a double bond of sympathy and pity for poor outcast Mary.

Now, it is an assumption that her name was Mary, and, in the next place, will it not lessen our reverence for that divine love which moves toward all sinners, to try and search in our Saviour's heart for thoughts to which we have not the least clue? Besides, a compassion which is linked with personal feeling can hardly be called the purest. The simple story appears best just as it is given by the Evangelists.

TO PARENTS AND TEACHERS.

By giving his Son Jesus only plain clothes to wear, and only an ordinary house to occupy, and a poor place to be born in, God shows us that it is always the boy He thinks of first, and not the house he lives in; the baby first, and not the cradle in which he is rocked.—Rev. C. H. Parkhurst, D.D.

Of course the boy has incessant activity. So has the mountain stream, and you use it for a saw mill. So has steam, and you run your engine with it. Electricity has tremendous power, but Edison trained it. The secret you have to learn is to turn the boy's energy into the right channels.—Dr. Dille.

Communion and Satisfaction.

1 Kings x. 2, 3, 13.

The Queen of Sheba did well and wisely when, from her land of darkness and distance and doubt, she came to King Solomon and communed of all that was in her heart. Not with his attendants, though she did not overlook nor undervalue them (ver. 8), but with the King himself. Communion with our fellow-Christians will soon become worthless and dissipating if it is not sustained by abiding fellowship with the Lord Himself! "They that dwell under our shadow" are not likely "to return" for refreshment and strengthening (Hos. xiv. 7) if we are not sitting under his shadow, and finding "His fruit sweet to our taste" (S.S. ii. 3). "All my springs are in Thee!"

The two disciples had little comfort in their walk or their talk, till Jesus himself drew near and went with them! Satan will most watchfully seek to hinder and interrupt this holy trust between the believer and his Lord. "There I will meet with thee, and I will commune with thee, from above the mercy-seat, from between the cherubim;" (Exodus xxv. 22.)

It is the highest privilege, and an absolute necessity in the Divine life, if there is to be growth and vigour and fruitfulness! Would we have foretastes of the coming glory? They are found in converse with Jesus now. "It is the heaven of heaven to have unhindered, free, full, heart-in-heart communion with Himself" (Hewitson). The more we have of it, by the way, the more will we taste of the sweetness of the coming bliss. It will also make our witness ready and bright and effective. "Ye also shall bear witness, because ye have been with Me" (John xv. 27). "Mary sat at Jesus' feet, and heard his word" (Luke x. 39).

The Queen of Sheba communed with Solomon "of all that was in her heart." Oh to be thus open-hearted with Jesus! No reservations. No hidden corners. It is impossible for Him to fill us wholly with his light, and life, and grace, if there is not an entire unfolding, a laying bare of every secret thing.

Let him come to every chamber,
Nothing would I hide;
Let the dearest idol perish!
Let the Lord abide!

"Search me, O God, and know my heart; try me, and know my thoughts" (Psalm cxxxix. 23).

What revelations have been made to Him—what confessions have been poured into his ear—what dark disclosures!

But to this greater than Solomon there has been given "largeness of heart, exceeding much" (1 Kings iv. 29), so that with infinite patience and love He can enter into all the sins and sorrows of his numberless seed. We need not fear to tell Him all!

Instant sympathy to brighten,
All their weakness and their woe,
Finding grace their way to lighten,
Shall thy loving members know.

He answered all her questions. Will our King do that? He may not give us a straight answer, a minute explanation of all his dealings. He may say to us as He said to Peter, "What I do thou knowest not now, but thou shalt know hereafter" (John xiii. 7), but that will satisfy us.

Some of the questions of Sheba's queen must have appeared very foolish and trifling to the King of Salem, but he did not treat them as such. Our weaknesses, our infirmities, do but endear us to the heart of our Great High Priest. He is "touched" by them (Heb. iv. 15), and nothing is too trivial for his notice and compassion. If we would only bring every little tangle to Him, how He would delight to put it right—every perplexity, everything that brings darkness on our path, and hinders occupation with Himself, how it would dissolve away in his presence, like the mist before the rising sun. "There was not anything hid from the king." Ah! she found that out! He knew all! What was so hard and puzzling to her was bright and clear to him.

There is wonderful sweetness in this thought for the child of God, and how often we fall back upon it in the midst of darkness and uncertainty.

And peace through every trial flows,
Because I know that Jesus knows.

Nothing hid from Him. Words even are not needed. Our trouble may be too deep or difficult for expression, but we can, like David, go in and "sit before the Lord" (1 Chron. xvii. 16), and rejoice in his perfect knowledge of our case. "When my spirit was overwhelmed within me, then thou knewest my path" (Ps. cxlii. 3). There are no difficulties to Him! The great mountain becomes a plain (Zech. iv. 7).

"There was not anything hid from the King, which he told her not." Solomon did not give her bare explanations. He must have told her much of what was in his own heart, and unfolded mysteries far beyond her highest conception. "Henceforth I call you not servants, but friends, for all things that I have heard of my Father, I have made known unto you" (John xv. 15). A glorious privilege which the weakest believer may enjoy (Luke x. 21). Alas! how many of God's dear people know little of it: These sayings are hid from us, if other things are occupying our minds, if our hearts are not in harmony with the thoughts of God. One unconfessed, indulged sin, in thought, word, or deed, will dim the vision, and dull the ear, and hinder the blessed Spirit from revealing to us those things which "have not entered into the heart of man" (1 Cor. ii. 9).

"He gave her all her desire, whatsoever she asked." Will our King do that? If we are walking closely with Him, our desires will be under the guidance and control of the Divine Spirit, and we are not likely to ask long for anything He does not mean to give. He may say, as He did to Moses, "Speak no more to Me of this matter" (Deut. iii. 26), but that will "suffice" us. We may ask for sweet. He may give us bitter (and then he will make the bitter sweet). "Take this thorn away." "My grace is sufficient for thee" (2 Cor. xii. 9). "Delays are not denials." Though the answer tarry, all our desire is before Him; and "no good thing will He withhold from them that walk uprightly" (Ps. lxxxiv. 11). Rutherford says, "By this heavenly art we may beg ourselves rich. "Ask, and ye shall receive, that your joy may be full" (John xvi. 24).

"Besides that which he gave her of his royal bounty." What will the royal bounty of our King be? Did Paul catch a glimpse of it when, after asking such great things for the Ephesians, he adds, "Now unto Him that is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think" (Eph. iii. 20). It is not all in the glorious future. With a blessed profusion He is dealing it out now. "Exceeding abundant" in his explanations, revelations, and answers to prayer! "Empty vessels borrow not a few." He will fill them to overflowing.

The fulness of his blessing encompasseth our way,
The fulness of his promises crowns every rising day,
The fulness of his glory is beaming from above,
While more and more we realise the fulness of his love!

All our need supplied, and that right royally, "according to the state of the King" (Esther ii. 18); and then, "His riches in glory in Christ Jesus" for evermore (Phil. iv. 19, R.V.).

SUNDAY SCHOOL RESULTS.

Mr. Duncan Love, at a recent Sunday School Convention in Melbourne, read a paper on "What ought the Sunday School to produce?" Some of his points are well worth earnest consideration. He said:—The Sunday School ought to produce, I. A larger annual percentage of addition to church membership. The main object of the teacher is, by means of the Word, to bring his scholars to decide for Christ—to have them hear his voice, obey his call, and confide themselves to Him for ever. The natural progress of events is that the young friend thus converted seeks to ally himself with the body of disciples which we call "the Church," and on his entering into this fellowship the fruitage is so far secured, the end aimed at by the teacher is in a measure attained. From the statistics of both the English and the Victorian Sunday School Unions, I estimate that the proportion of scholars who join the Church is somewhere about three per cent. per annum of a school's roll number. Is this enough? I think not. It seems to me there ought to be at least (as at one school I lately attended) about six per cent. of the roll number taking the responsibility of a Christian profession every year.

II.—A better supply of well-equipped Christian workers. Not only should good teachers be produced by the Sunday School, but also a large number of effective speakers on Christian subjects. Further, the Sunday School ought to produce a greater number of ministers and missionaries, for both the home and foreign fields. The more the young teacher studies the Bible and prays for his class, the importance of the Divine Word grows upon him. He sees it as the only means by which men can be shown the love of God, and by which the Holy Spirit reaches the heart. Gradually he is brought face to face with a dim or clear opening to him of the question, "Ought I to give myself to this business wholly?" Then the cry of the heathen abroad, or the clamant need of our destitute legions at home—life's lonely places or its overcrowded ones—comes into his ear and heart; and who should more easily become a missionary than the Sunday School teacher?

III.—A warmer spiritual atmosphere in the community. By the association of so many having one purpose, and that one distinctly apart from mere worldly gain, there is made a definite, although unobtrusive, impression of sustained spiritual enterprise. A bond of common interest, common expectancy, common anxiety, forms the workers, however far apart, into a magnificent "trade-union," whose aspiration is a truer life for themselves, whose labours are for the same end in others, and whose inspiration is the Holy Spirit's power prevailing in a more or less effective degree upon each member. This common warmth of heart is a distinct quality amid the world's turmoil—none the less effective because it is modest and unpretentious.

Mission to Deep Sea Fishermen.

Sir,—The doctors who have been sent out by the Mission to Deep Sea Fishermen to minister to the sore need of the Labrador fisher folk took with them a good supply of old clothes, the gifts of kind friends who readily came forward on the wants of these poor people being laid before them. But so poorly clad is the fishing population on the bleak Labrador coast that our latest news from Dr. Grenfell and Dr. Curwen is to the effect that the supply of clothing placed at their disposal is wholly inadequate to meet the demand. Garments of every kind, but especially those made of flannel, will be greatly valued. Any such gifts will be promptly forwarded to St. John's, and acknowledged without delay if sent to me.

It will also interest many of your readers to know that most successful and largely attended services have been held on board the Mission Ship Queen Victoria during her visits to Lowestoft, Scarborough, Plymouth, and Dartmouth. The Queen Victoria is now working at Torquay, and it is hoped that she will be able to put into several other ports on the South Coast before the close of the summer season.—Yours faithfully, Francis H. Wood, Secretary.

Method in Miracle.

It is usual in these days to depreciate the evidential value of miracle, and to look elsewhere for the foundation of faith. The age, it is contended, wants something more specific, more immediate than miracle, whose mission was but temporary, and the grounds of which, for most men, rest only on hearsay. Yet what an exalted place does our Lord give the works which He wrought. He calls them the Father's works, and such is his estimate of their value that He appealed to them as necessitating the belief of unwilling hearts in Himself as the Revealer of God. "If I do not the works of my Father, believe Me not. But if I do, though ye believe not Me, believe the works; that ye may know and believe that the Father is in Me and I in Him." The works of Christ were endeared to Christ Himself, and raised to the highest possible altitude, because of their relation to the Father. He could say, "These works that I do are my Father's works. They stand clear of all human limitations. In these works my Father mirrors Himself immediately. Their evidential value is, therefore, beyond degree. If my being in human form causes you to stumble, look at these works, and your faith shall transcend every obstruction. You shall know and believe that the Father is in Me and I in Him."

We may not think of a temporary mission in the case of Christ's miracles, in the face of such a forthsetting of their nature, such an eulogium on their quality. If they speak of the Father, they speak of Him for all time; if the Father shines through them, the glory is as bright to-day as when they sprang into being at Christ's word or touch; if this feature in the works made them hallowed ground to the God-man, and placed them on the loftiest pinnacle of evidence, such is still their nature, and such is still their force.

It is not, however, with the substance of miracle that we are now concerned. Rather we wish to draw attention to the element of method in it. How these works were wrought, is an instructive field of inquiry. In Christ's busy life one miracle followed hard on the heels of another; and yet each one has a particular setting. The element of individuality lives in Christ's miracles, just as the self-same element lives in his deeds of grace to-day. Some get the blessing by the way, as it were by stealth, like the woman with the issue of blood, in the crowd, and yet a stranger; others, like the daughter of Jairus, are raised from the dead in solemn conclave, and after the house is cleared of a time-serving rabble. In the case of others, again, the blessing is found as the result of repeated call and persistent endeavour to keep in Christ's track, and win his favour by an urgency that thrives on neglect. His deeds of grace are not all cast in the same mould; nay, it is a question if the same mould is ever used twice over. Why one should be kept waiting and another not; why one should be instantly responded to, and another kept on the tenter-hooks of suspense; why one should be found who has never sought, and another kept long seeking ere finding; these and similar questions concern a variety of method, to which apparently there is no end. The variety in the method illustrates the endless variety that is part of the Father's administration. God is sovereign here, and He is Father also. He knows how best to deal with the individual, whether by immediate encouragement or temporary repression, by gentle action (as in Lydia's case) or in the thunder of his power, as when the Philippian jailor's conscience was aroused. Blessed be his name; his sovereignty is not fate, though it be inscrutable to us, for it is the Father in all. The works of Jesus are the Father's works. They reproduced the Father then; they reproduce the Father now. There is a Fatherly meaning in the diversity, for it dovetails with our individual need and type and end.

But variety in miracle, if it stood alone, would rather attest the absence of method than its existence. Christ's works would then become like a science of cases. But this is not how the Divine variety is shown. The particular in nature is not at the expense or sacrifice either of genus or species, but is always held in harmony therewith. Order is heaven's first law everywhere. There is a connecting bond, a tie uniting cases, so that the diversity is not destructive of oneness. How clearly, for example, this stands out in all instances of sight-giving. While the element of individuality is there, while in dealing with the condition of the blind Christ deals variously, yet there is one principle that runs through all the cases in question, and that is the principle of contact. Many of Christ's miracles were wrought by a word, a word simply. It was thus He turned the water into wine, restored the nobleman's son, healed the centurion's servant, allayed the tempest, and resurrected Lazarus. But no case of sight-giving was done by a word alone. In every recorded case, the word was preceded or accompanied by a touch.

How is this feature to be construed? Why, in every such instance of power, was Christ there present Himself to touch the eyes and thus prepare the way for the light to enter the darkened eyeballs? The meaning seems to be symbolic of the way Divine light enters the soul. As the touch sends a thrill through the frame, as it awakens the sensibilities, so is it in the impartation of the light of life to the soul of man. It enters into the consciousness and lives in the experience of him who is the subject of it. Spiritual light means a sensible knowledge of God. There is a sensation where there is a touch. And so with the knowledge of God in the face of Jesus Christ. Take any case of true conversion, where the blinded eyes have been opened, and it will be found that coincident with the opening of the eyes there has been a Divine touch. In other words, the knowledge of God in the face of Jesus Christ is a sensible knowledge. It is not an inference or deduction of the logical understanding. It is an experience. If in the Divine light you see, you feel God, the knowledge that you have of the Father and the Son is embedded in consciousness. It has not come to you by man, but the Saviour has communicated it to you by the touch of his Spirit.

Hence the saving knowledge of God is like a house that is built upon a rock. It is not in the power of the winds and rains to pelt it down; nor is it in the power of the floods to sap its foundations. He that is light in the Lord has felt the Lord; he has been the subject of his touch; the truth has been vitally communicated to him, and, in the language of the Apostle, "he has the witness in himself."

We need more than a notional knowledge of God; we need a knowledge that is subjective and experimental. We need the Lord to come within the circuit of our conscious being. It is his felt presence we need, his omnific touch, that verified knowledge from which we can be no more driven than we can from the fact that we ourselves are. Happy those who, from a consciousness illumed by this experience, can sing;—

> But this I do find, we two are so joined,
> He'll not be in glory and leave me behind.

Education and Missions.

AN EXPOSITION AND DEFENCE—1.

BY REV. EDWARD STORROW.

Preaching should undoubtedly be the general method of making known Christ and his salvation to all unbelievers, and it is well to be jealous, not only abroad, but at home, of how and what is preached, and of any form of evangelisation which might limit this grand and primary one.

But though the first in importance and general utility, it is not the only one. This is not the place for a full treatment of the question, but, in passing, let it be considered that our Saviour and the Apostles were very free in their methods of communicating truth, caring so much that it be communicated, that the manner of doing so seemed to them of little importance. Sunday school instruction and Bible teaching in public day schools are a recognition of the same principle, so also are Medical and Zenana Missions and other forms of agency which need not be named. Our contention, then, is, that as the Gospel is for all, and all cannot be reached by the same method, it is not only lawful but commendable to reach them in other ways, suggested by their efficiency, reasonableness, and agreement with Scripture principles.

This is precisely the situation in India. Until very recently, through prejudice, pride, and rigid custom, more than one-half the population could not be reached by what is usually understood by preaching. Things are a little better now, and the change is more owing to missionary educational methods than to anything else.

Nowhere, not even in China, is education more appreciated, and nowhere has it a mightier influence in overthrowing superstition and uprooting most pernicious customs. The people of India are among the most intellectual races. Education is ardently desired. Even the ignorant respect and almost reverence learning, even in a missionary. In such a vast empire, and among such a diversity of race and nationality, few things can be predicated of the whole, but generally young Aryans are eager to learn, and they acquire book-knowledge with great rapidity.

Then there has grown, especially in the few great cities, and among the higher castes and aspiring well-to-do classes, a desire for a good English education. It is a coveted accomplishment; it gives access to a new world of thought and sentiment, and it is the surest way to a situation which, though seldom lucrative, is always valued. Mission schools are open to all, and the intense exclusiveness born of caste is entirely ignored in them. Nevertheless, the Anglo-vernacular schools are frequented mainly by the influential classes just named, and in not a few instances they attend, not only in scores but hundreds; for though Christianity is disliked and dreaded, the missionaries are respected and honoured, and the high moral tone of the education they give is appreciated by fathers for their sons, however little of it they may have themselves.

Now, the value or raison d'être of all mission schools is that it brings the young at the most favourable time of life under instruction more avowedly Christian and religious than the teaching of the common schools of most so-called Christian countries; and of Anglo-vernacular institutions, that it does that for the sons of the most influential classes of a race who pay an unquestioning deference to birth and rank, while no class is neglected. These classes are surely worth trying to win. They are no more in the judgment of God than the poorest and lowest born, but we have to consider what will influence Hindus. These classes come under our influence, if we give them a thorough good education; if not, they will go elsewhere, and no people are so sagacious in discerning the quality, not only of what is taught, but of those who teach. They often remain at school much longer than middle-class boys in England.

The curriculum varies, no doubt, over so wide an Empire, being regulated by different degrees of wisdom and zeal, but in every instance the Mission School and College is distinctly Christian. The Bible is read and explained in every class. The evidences of Christianity are presented from the most suitable class books. The ordinary lesson books are saturated with Christian teaching on religion and morality. The whole is under the supervision of the missionary, who is perfectly free to say whatever is in his heart in condemnation of superstition and commendation of Christianity. Surely there are few spheres of evangelisation comparable to these; and some of us who have filled them never desired, or thought we could have, nobler or fairer fields to cultivate.

Now these boys and young men could not in the same number, or with the same thoroughness, be brought under the influence of the Gospel in any other way. Mr. M. Phillips writes of reaching them by preaching. A few have, all along, come to listen occasionally, and if in recent years there are more, it is of course a circumstance to rejoice over; but is not this largely owing to the educational methods he so disparages? It has awakened an interest in Christianity and a respect for its claims, which this class formerly had not, and they talk about it, read books in its favour, as well as hostile literature, and listen to preachers, as formerly they did not; but to ignore or depreciate the principal cause of this changed attitude is very much like kicking down the ladder by which we mount the walls in attacking a citadel.

Mr. Phillips proposes reaching them by lectures, but in the same paper he inconsistently asserts the futility of such an effort, for he declares that when religious lectures are delivered to educated Hindus, they are generally conspicuous by their absence. Writing from immediate knowledge, we can say that religious services for this class, including an address or lecture, held on Sunday evenings in a missionary college, have been steadily kept up, and often largely attended. Much, of course, depends on the preacher. They know who can speak to them with power, and whom they do not care to hear. A large proportion of the attendants are young men who have been made familiar through the Mission College with the words and deeds and claims of Christ.

And this powerful lever for the overthrow of the most stupendous and formidable system of heathenism the world has ever seen, we are advised to limit if not abandon! Do those who tender such advice know what they are doing? They do not. It means to abandon the education of a most intellectual race, and especially of its acknowledged leaders, to secularists,—to those neutral on the great question of religion, or to those avowedly hostile to our Divine faith. Such a course would be unwise and disastrous in the highest degree: and this I think will be acknowledged when our argument is completed.

FIVE HUNDRED MOHAMMEDAN MISSIONARIES go out from Cairo every year, and travel through Eastern Lands, teaching everywhere the religion of the False Prophet.

"WHERE WILL TEACHER BE?"

By Mrs. HARVEY-JELLIE.

It was one of those marvellously clear days we sometimes get in the springtime, when the earth seems giving out one song of praise all round. The busy town lay quiet in the Sabbath rest, and as the time drew near for afternoon school, little parties were to be seen here and there wending their way to the different places.

Teachers, too, were eagerly hastening to their work, and two of them were passing a house where little Rosie, the favourite of all in the class, lay dying. She had often of late been absent from the school through illness, but the springtime only developed the disease which was stealing her life away. For twelve years she had been the joy of happy Christian parents, and, but for her weakness and suffering, they would have entreated the Lord to spare her.

"There goes your teacher, Rosie dear, perhaps she will call when going home."

"If I was well, I should be just starting, shouldn't I, mother? There are my books, you'll come and read my verses to me, and my hymns, and tell me one of those beautiful stories!"

"Yes, dear, and we will pray for teacher and the class."

Propped up by pillows, looking as fragile and fair as a flower, the gentle child listened to the words she had early learned to love,

"Now, darling, you must sleep," and with a fond kiss the mother laid her back to rest, and an hour passed by. With a sob and look of distress, the dear girl opened her eyes. "O mother, was it only a dream? I have been in such a lovely place, it must be real and true, and I was well again, and Jesus was holding out his hand to lead me away over such glorious hills. You can't guess how beautiful, and you were there, and father, and little Katie, who used to go with me to Sunday-school; but when I looked about, I could not find teacher. I called her, and I thought I asked Jesus where she was, and He did not answer, but she wasn't anywhere near to Him; and I wanted her, and it made me cry when I was waking, for I do love my teacher."

"There, Rosie, don't think about it; it was only a dream, and you must be happy and forget that part."

"But I don't want to forget, mother; it was all so lovely there, and it will be true soon. Only, where will teacher be? I cannot bear to lose her up there. Do ask her, when she comes, to be near Jesus, then I'll find her easily."

"I will, dear, if you take your tea and keep quiet a little now." And the little child, by Jesus called, and blessed, and charged with a saving message, was content.

"I must call, I suppose, and ask how Rosie is to-day," said the teacher to a friend and fellow-worker, as they met in the street and walked on together.

"Isn't it delightful to see those eager faces on Sunday! and doesn't it make one long and pray to be more Christlike for their sakes!"

"You are just made for a Sunday school teacher, you revel in the work: I can't, it seems so tiring to be shut up with children on bright afternoons, and they seem to be so forgetful, I shall give up, I think, unless I have a larger and more interesting class," and they parted at the corner of the road where Rosie lived, and fond as she was of those children in her class, she knew in her inmost heart that she lacked some qualification which her friend possessed.

"I am so pleased to see you," said the mother, "for my Rosie cannot be happy till I tell you a dream that made her so disturbed. You will smile at it; only to satisfy her I must repeat it, and you will soon make her at rest about it."

The words of a suffering one, be they young or old, are imprinted on the thought and memory, and mothers ponder these sayings, perhaps, as others cannot. Any way, the words that had told of her child's discomfort were repeated in just the tones she had received them, and with the full pathos of their first utterance, bringing tears to her own eyes.

"She will be so glad to see you, and you will make her forget it all; she is weak, and even a dream troubles her," said the mother, leading the way.

But the teacher did not "smile" at it, or think it "only a dream." Had an arrow struck her heart, or some big weight of sorrow suddenly entered there? Why did that simple dream-question flame out in such overpowering consequence, refusing to be put aside, and making a trembling listener of the one who went in there as teacher?

"Are you better, Rosie?" she asked, bending near over the bed.

The pale face flushed over with pleasure, and putting her tender arms round her teacher's neck, she said:

"I heard mother telling you about my dream; kiss me, teacher dear, and promise me you will be quite near Jesus in heaven, so I can find you quickly."

A great revelation came to her soul then and there, and spoke the plain truth within. "I am not quite near Jesus now, how can I expect to be then?" and she longed to rush away and hide herself. "I will come and talk to you, dear, soon; I am in a hurry now," she said, fearing to trust herself.

"But, teacher, tell me first for certain where you will be. I might go before you come again, and I must know where to find you there, please tell me."

The most difficult question ever put to her, and she a teacher—yet scarcely knowing how to answer her own little scholar, who held her hand so lovingly and would not be denied. The mother spoke to Rosie to take her attention, thinking the sight of the dying child was causing the tears and choking sensation, but she did not know the Angel of the Lord was wrestling there with the heaven-sought soul of that Sunday-school teacher. Recovering herself so as to speak, she said, pressing a farewell kiss on the pleading face—

"Yes, Rosie, darling, you shall find teacher quite near to Jesus."

"Now I am so happy; I won't cry any more. You come again and see, teacher, if I do. Good bye."

Three days after it was as another creature she trod that same street. Earth was more lighted up with heaven, and life a new and solemn trust. Nearing the house again she said to herself, "'Except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven.' O, blessed messenger to me, she has saved her teacher."

The pure frail casket lay before her; the happy soul was set free to take the Saviour's hand, and joyfully go forth to the land of perfect health to await the loved ones' coming.

"Thank you for all your kindness to my Rosie in the class," said the mother. "She loved you, and after your visit she did not cry or seem to have a wish. Just before she went from me she said, 'Will teacher come?' and then, as if she thought you would not see her again, she said, 'I'm so glad I know where I shall find her now'—and she laid her head upon my arm—but there was no sight of death to her. She passed away all smiles."

Tears and thanksgiving and prayer made a richer wreath than floral decoration for the scholar who had helped the teacher to make sure of a crown.

As she goes forth, baptized from above, to her new life of love and service, and her scholar Rosie enters the homeland, we wonder if all our teachers can confidently answer that question, "Where will teacher be?"

Where? When the great harvest home is gathered. Where? When, "with rapture through and through," the children roam the fields of glory, and gaze upon their Saviour's face. Will they greet you there? Will they find you close to Jesus then?

They never think it can be otherwise. Your life to them is a pattern. Your words their guide. Your death to be all radiant and your place in heaven to be sure, and near the Lord! Will they be deceived and disappointed? You may be able to prepare a splendid lesson, and keep order in the class, but forgive the question put in faithfulness and love, and before you meet those trustful scholars again, answer in the sight of God, "Where will Teacher be?"

Apocalyptic Scenes.

By Sir S. Arthur Blackwood, K.C.B.

XXV.

A RECAPITULATION.

We have now arrived at the termination of that series of the visions which consists of the seven seals and seven trumpets, the last of which brings us to the close of this dispensation—to the intervention of God in judgment—the first resurrection—the assumption of rule over the kingdoms of the world by Christ—in fact, to what Peter calls "the end of all things."

The course of events extending from the days of the Apostle, to whom the visions were vouchsafed, to the day of the Lord itself has been traced, as shown by mysterious symbols and prophetic hieroglyphs, and has been interpreted by the two-fold key given to us, the ascertained use of such symbols in predictions known to be fulfilled, and the page of history.

It is, of course, not contended that such interpretation is invariably correct. To take such a position would be unpardonable. No one who attempts to expound this marvellously deep and mysterious portion of the Word of God can do so without the most humbling conviction of his ignorance and liability to error. Not only may the meaning of the symbols and imagery employed be misapprehended, but an altogether undue, or wrong, importance may be assigned to the events supposed to be prefigured by the visions. Still, as one of those Scriptures which have been written for our learning, and more particularly as the one book of the Bible, upon the intelligent study of which so special and emphatic a blessing is pronounced by its Author, it is incumbent upon us prayerfully and patiently to search into its meaning, availing ourselves of all the help which the providence of God has put within our reach.

In the foregoing attempt to present the interpretation of the Apocalypse, which I believe to be the true one, in as simple and concise a form as possible, I have not advanced anything original or independent. The papers are the result of studies, extending now over very many years, of the labours of men of God, far more competent than myself to investigate the prophecy and to instruct the Church; and it is competent to all to examine for themselves at length the sources of information which I have consulted.

In proposing now to review the line of interpretation which has been followed, my object is to present what I believe to be one of the strongest arguments in its favour. That argument is the fact that, without forcing of metaphor or fancifulness of application, the leading events of history, relating to the Church and to the world (i.e., the Roman Empire) for 1800 years, are found to correspond in the most marvellous way to those scenes which were exhibited to the seer in the apocalyptic visions.

I say, without fancifulness of application, and I say it most advisedly, since such a charge is frequently brought against interpreters of prophecy; and I am not concerned to deny that there may have been cause for it. It is only natural that one or another who is eagerly engaged in attempting to decipher the enigmas of prophecy, and who believes that his own interpretation is correct, should occasionally err in the way of arbitrary or hasty assignment of meaning to this or that difficult hieroglyph. Instances of such misapplication, or at least of applications which do not commend themselves to our own judgment, may doubtless be found among all expositors of prophecy, even the wisest.

But, taking what is known as the historic interpretation as a whole, I am deeply convinced that the more it is candidly examined, especially in the light of the Old Testament Scriptures, the more it will be found to be sober, reasonable, and free from such a charge. To one who hastily and superficially takes up this or that bit of interpretation, the idea of fancifulness and far-fetched application may very probably occur. Many have I heard exclaim at what seemed to them the absurdity of supposing that the successive Gothic invasions were represented by burning mountains, and falling stars, the Saracenic scourge by locusts, and the woe inflicted on Europe by the Turkman power by the Euphratean horsemen. Taken up isolatedly, without regard to the context or appreciation of the requirements of symbolic representation, such an idea is not unnatural, and it is very easy to raise such an objection.

But the matter cannot be dismissed with a scoff, or a sneer, or even an honest doubt. Much graver questions lie in the background. It must be asked, Has God in prophecy written the history of earthly events beforehand? None can deny it. If so, Has he employed the language of symbol and figurative delineation in order to give such history? No one who has the most cursory acquaintance with Old Testament prophecy can say the contrary. Was there fancifulness or arbitrariness in the employment of locusts to denote the ravages of Judæa by heathen powers, of a volcano to represent Babylon, of smoking torches to depict the enemies of Judah? Was it far-fetched and fanciful to symbolise Nebuchadnezzar by the golden head of an image and by a tree, the Kings of Medea and Persia by a two-horned ram, and Alexander, King of Greece, by the great horn of a rough goat? Did not Ezekiel depict Egypt's monarch as a crocodile, and Zechariah speak of heavenly and earthly powers as horses and horns and carpenters? Did not our Lord allude to Herod as a fox, and was not his language replete with parabolic imagery and symbol? These are questions that must be answered before the application of the symbols of the Apocalypse to earthly events can be dismissed on the grounds sometimes alleged.

In now proceeding to recapitulate the subjects contained in chapters vi.—xi., and to place side by side the Apocalyptic scene and the historical interpretation, I would ask the reader to have regard to the following important considerations. First, assuming that God has in prophecy written history beforehand, and that He has employed the language of symbols for that purpose, could any pictorial or hieroglyphic representations, more accurate, more pointed, more descriptive, or more suitable, have been made use of? Secondly, assuming the history of the past 1800 years to have been thus depicted, is there any other series of events, more closely connected with the fortunes of the Church, situate as she has been in the Roman Empire, or affecting her more seriously, that could have been selected? If, after fair allowance for differences of opinion in expositors, and errors of interpretation, there is found to be a most striking general correspondence and agreement between the symbolic prophecy and the literal history, is there not strong presumptive evidence that the scheme of interpretation is, in the main, correct, and according to his mind, who gave the prophecy and ordained the history?

Apocalyptic Vision.	Historical Fulfilment.
First Seal. — The Crowned and Conquering Rider on the white horse.	Prosperous, victorious period of the Roman Empire, under Nerva and the Antonines.
Second Seal.— Peace taken from the earth by the Rider on the red horse.	Period of civil war under sway of Prætorian prefects.
Third Seal. — The Rider on the black horse with emblems of justice, and commands against oppression.	Fiscal oppression by Prætors of Provinces, Injustice, Want, Famine, Edicts concerning prices.
Fourth Seal.—Death on the livid horse, accompanied by the grave and devastating powers.	Dissolution of the Empire. No human rider. Devastation by sword, famine, pestilence.
Fifth Seal.—The cry of the souls of the martyrs at the altar.	Era of martyrs. Time of Diocletian.
Sixth Seal. — Tremendous convulsion of nature and downfall of ruling powers. The overthrow of all orders of society. The Lamb the cause thereof.	Overthrow of Paganism. "The greatest revolution the world has ever seen." The Crucified One is the conqueror.
The suspension of the approaching tempest. The sealing of God's elect.	Gothic nations arrested on the frontiers. Empire nominally Christian. Error of baptismal regeneration prevailing. Truth that Christ seals his own brought into prominence.
Palm-bearing multitude round the throne. The Blood of the Lamb their salvation. Their pathway of tribulation. Their eternal blessedness.	An anticipative glance at glory. That glory yet to come. Suffering the portion of the people of God here. Christ the alone Saviour. Augustine's teaching against prevailing errors.
Seventh Seal.—The angel with the golden censer offering incense with the prayers of all saints at the golden altar. Thunderings, etc.	Intercession of Saints beginning to prevail. High-priestly work of Christ brought out in allusive contrast. Judgments on Apostate Christendom ensue.
First Trump.—Hail, fire, and blood. Third part of trees and grass burned up.	Invasion of Roman Empire by Alaric and the Goths. A.D. 395.
Second Trump.—Burning mountain cast into the sea. Third part of sea becomes blood. Third part of life and ships destroyed.	Invasion of Vandals under Genseric; shores of Mediterranean specially attacked. Roman Navy nearly destroyed. A.D. 427.
Third Trump.—Great star falls on rivers and poisons the waters.	Invasion of Huns under Attila, "the scourge of God." Regions of Rhine, Danube, and rivers of North Italy specially affected. A.D. 453.
Fourth Trump.—Extinction of third part of sun, moon, and stars.	Extinction of Western Roman Empire under Romulus Augustulus, A.D. 476.
Fifth Trump.—Falling star, scourge of iron—armed and crowned locusts from abyss. Composite form of men, women, horses, and insects. Five months.	Saracenic Woe. Mohammedan imposture work of Satan. Specially directed against idolatrous Christendom. Intensity from A.D. 612 to 762.
Sixth Trump.—Euphratean angels loosed. Myriads of parti-coloured horsemen. Fire, smoke, and brimstone. Third part of men killed. Persistence of idolatry.	Irruption of Turkish powers, commencing at Bagdad, under Togrul Beg, Genghis Khan, Tamerlane, and Othman. Artillery used in capture of Constantinople. Roman Empire of East Subverted A.D. 1057 to 1453. Idolatrous Christendom unreformed. The Dark Ages.
Cloud-clothed, rainbow-crowned angel claims sea and land, delivers open book to seer, with command to preach. Seven thunders sealed.	The glorious Reformation. An open Bible. Rome's usurpation and fulminations gainsaid.
The Temple and worshippers therein measured, the outer court given to the Gentiles.	Re-formation of the churches.
Testimony of the two witnesses in sackcloth for 1260 days. Results of their rejection.	Testimony of Christ's witnessing churches for 1260 years.
(Their death at the end of their testimony by the agency of the wild beast.	(The overcoming and death of the Protestant churches by the agency of Rome.
Their shameful treatment. Sepulture refused. Rejoicings at their death.	Ignominious submission to general council at Jerusalem. Rejoicings over silenced Protestantism.
Their revival and exaltation after three and a-half days.	Revival after three and a-half years.
Great earthquake. Fall of tenth part of city. Seven thousand "men of name" slain.	Great social revolution. Fall of England. Upper-class subverted.
Repentance. God glorified.	National repentance.
Seventh Trump.—Assumption of power by Christ. Wrath of nations. First resurrection. Reward of saints. Destruction of ungodly. Ark of covenant manifested. Lightnings, thunders, and great hail.)	Winding up of this dispensation. "End of all things." Resurrection and reward of the servants of God. The earth purged. The mystery of God unveiled.)

The portion inserted in a parenthesis relates, as is evident, to the future, and is, of course, conjectural. It is the previous part that demands our attention. How marvellous the correspondence of prophecy and history! Is it explainable on any other hypothesis than that the one is the complement of the other? Is it reasonably possible that a series of the strangest and most extraordinary symbols and portents, deciphered according to Old Testament analogy, should be found to correspond accurately to the leading and most important events of European history during a period of 1800 years—events utterly unknown when the vision was vouchsafed—and that the correspondence should be accidental, with no designed relation between the two series?

Making all allowance for errors of every kind, we have found that each ward in the mysterious lock of the prophecy has in turn yielded to the pressure of the key of history. Must we not conclude that it is the Master Key? If there had been occasional correspondence, if here and there a general resemblance had appeared, we might have hesitated to arrive at such a conclusion. But when, one after another, in due chronological order, without one misplacement, the most prominent events of eighteen centuries have been thrown on the prophetic canvas, each ascertained correspondence has furnished proof which has accumulated in geometrical ratio, and thus demonstrated the truth of the system of interpretation advocated.

One more conclusion remains to be deduced. If the historical interpretation be true, any system which proceeds on the assumption that chapters vi.—xi. have their fulfilment in another dispensation, subsequent to the rapture of the Church, must be false. Both cannot be true. The visions we have considered prefigure either the history of the Church and the world from the time of the Apostle to the last trump, or they relate to some future time after the Church has been removed. They cannot relate to both. The latter view depends entirely upon the idea that the Church is seen as actually in glory in the vision of chap. v., a view we have shown in our fourth paper to be entirely baseless.

The Key-Words of Life.

REV. F. B. MEYER, B.A.

OUR WALK.

To walk is an obvious synonym for our life. Life is a walk from the cradle to the grave. Our steps emerge from the jewelled gates of birth, traverse rock and sand, enamelled meadow and difficult mountain steeps, and ultimately pass within the gates of death, which, though sombre enough, when seen from afar, are often found to be irradiate with light from the world beyond.

In this sense the word occurs in all parts of Scripture. In the opening chapters of Genesis it is said of Enoch that he walked with God. And in one of the last Epistles, we are bidden to walk even as Jesus walked. And between these extreme points, the pages of Holy Writ are strewn with similar references. Indeed, the comparison of life to a pilgrimage is based on the same conception. The race of man goes afoot, as a vast host.

A walk is made up of steps. Though a man circle the globe, yet he must do it by one step at a time; and the character of the steps will determine the character of the walk. So life is made up, for the most part, of trifles, of commonplaces, of the reiteration of familiar and simple acts. And what we are in these, that will be the colour and value of our lives in the verdict of eternity. Life is not made by the rapturous but brief moments which we spend on the transfiguration mount, but by the steps we take to and fro along the pathway of daily duty, and of sometimes monotonous routine.

Eph ii. 2. THE WALK OF THE OLD LIFE.—The Apostle does not scruple to unveil the past of those whom he addressed. Look, he cries, to the rock whence ye were hewn, and to the hole of the pit whence ye were digged. Ye were once dead in trespasses and sins. But though in our unconverted state we were utterly dead to the claims of God and the life of the spiritual world, yet we were very much alive to the promptings of that malign trinity of evil, which is ever set upon the ruin of the souls of men. "Ye were dead . . . ye walked."

As the doctrine of the Divine Trinity is never expressly formulated in Scripture, though it may be derived from many an obvious inference, so there is no difficulty in showing that the world, the flesh, and the devil, are in essence one in their endeavour against the soul. Here, for instance, in successive sentences, the Apostle speaks of the course of this world; of the prince of the power of the air, the spirit that works in the sons of disobedience; and of the lusts of the flesh and of the mind.

Here are several points that deserve our earnest thought.

(1) Those who live a worldly life are as much under the influence of the devil, and as much children of wrath, as those who give way to the lusts of the flesh. This is a very solemn thought. We make distinctions which are not recognised by God. We classify sinners after a fashion which will not stand the test of eternity. We pity the child of fashion, whose one thought is dress, rank, and amusement, flitting like a butterfly from flower to flower, and squandering the priceless hours in vanity and gaiety. But in the sight of God, such a one stands in the same category, is the prey of the same evil spirit, and is menaced by the same doom as the libertine or the sot. It may even be that a frivolous worldly life is more offensive to God than that which is swept by violent storms of passion.

(2) Beneath the shows of this world, its pageantry and pomp, its fascinations and ambitions, its round of amusement and engagement, there lurks the disobedient spirit, who is set upon inducing disobedience to God, and whose seat is in the air.

It is difficult to understand precisely the meaning of these words. Is the air a different locality to the heavenly places? Has the seat of the devil's kingdom been shifted from the earth or the heavenlies to the air? Is the very atmosphere laden with the invisible microbes of Satanic influence? We cannot tell. But it is enough for us to know that, while Satan tempts some through their passions, he tempts others through the riches and baubles, the shows and lures, the cares and anxieties of worldliness, which is Godlessness. This explains why the Apostle John said that between the love of God and of the world there could be no compatibility.

(3) As the Spirit of God works in those who fear to grieve Him, so the spirit of the prince of the power of the air works in the unregenerate and unbelieving. There are secret passages to our souls by which influences, whether from heaven or from hell, may enter our most secret thoughts. By the one we are prompted to crucify the flesh with its affections and lusts that we may live unto God; by the other to indulge the desires of the flesh and of the mind, and so to remain dead unto God, dead in trespasses and sins. By these tests we may discern between the voices that speak within us; and be saved from the snare of the tempter. Oh for grace, when we have detected the suggestion of Satan, who always cries, "Spare thyself," to turn on him with the Master's words, "Get thee behind me."

(4) It is as ruinous to the inner life to indulge the desires of the mind as those of the flesh. By the marvellous gift of imagination we may indulge unholy fancies, and throw the reins on the neck of the steeds of passion—always stopping short of the act. No human eye follows the soul when it goes forth to dance with satyrs or to thread the labyrinthine maze of the islands of desire. It goes and returns unsuspected by the nearest. Its credit for snow-white purity is not forfeited. It is still permitted to watch among the virgins for the Bridegroom's advent. But if this practice is unjudged and unconfessed it marks the offender a son of disobedience and a child of wrath.

It is thus that we walked once. But God loved us, and lifted us out of these dark and dangerous paths, putting us on the Ascension track; may He keep us from choosing or treading them again. Hedge up those ways with thorns, dear Lord, and make fences against us, that we may not find them.

Eph. ii. 10. THE WALK OF GOOD WORKS.—Before the vision of the evangelic prophet arose the conception of a highway that should intersect the desert. It was the way of holiness; the unclean should not pass over it. No lion or beast of prey would haunt it; none but the redeemed would tread it. As soon as they should touch it, gladness and joy would greet them like twin radiant angels, whilst sorrow and sighing, that had pursued them hitherto, would drop away disappointed, like dark angels of the pit.

That causeway was prepared for the ransomed before the foundation of the world, but it was fully opened and revealed by the work of Christ and the grace of the Holy Spirit. Directly we yield ourselves to these blessed influences, we begin to tread it. We find that each step has been prepared for us, so that we have but to put down our feet. As long as we keep to it we are safe from alarm and molestation. Our hearts beat out the glad marching music to which our feet answer blithely. And sorrow and sighing flee away.

Eph. iv. 1. WALK WORTHILY OF YOUR CALLING.—The simplest words are the deepest. Take, for example, the word call. It is constantly on our lips. The shepherd's call to his sheep, the herdman's on the hills, the mother's to her child. And God appropriates it in his dealings with men. He calls them. From the throne of his glory He speaks to every soul of man, once, twice, many times, as when He said "Samuel, Samuel," or "Saul, Saul." In some solemn hour of decision, in a moment of awful crisis, by human voice or written word, or by the pleading and remonstrance of conscience, God's voice may be heard calling men to Himself, to Heaven, and to a saintly life. On that call the Apostle bases his argument for holiness. Act worthily of the love which summoned you, and of the goal to which you have been called. Stand still and ask yourself before you speak, or act, or decide, Is this worthy of that great ideal which God has conceived for me, when He called me from the rest of men to be his priest, his saint, his son? If not, eschew it.

Eph. iv. 17, v. 9. WALK IN THE LIGHT.—God is light, and when we live in daily, hourly communion with Him, in such a frame of mind as that his name is frequently in our hearts, or murmured softly by our lips, or spoken as a talisman when temptation is near, we may be said to be walking in the light. And it is just in proportion as our steps tread the crystal pathway of light, that our understanding becomes enlightened. In God's light we see light. When the heart is pure the eye is single.

The contrary to this is also true. When we are alienated from the life of God, our understanding is darkened to the truth of God. The seat of infidelity is in the heart. Once let a soul become shut out from the life of God through the hardening of the heart; once let it give itself up to lasciviousness, and to make a trade of uncleanness with greediness; then the light of the knowledge of the glory of God beats against a shuttered window, asking for admittance in vain.

If you would know God, you must resemble God. If you would learn God's secrets, you must walk with God. If you would know the doctrine, you must be willing to do his will.

But there is something even better than walking in the light; it is to become children of the light. What an exquisite conception! Dewdrops sparkling in the light of dawn; star-dust glittering on the vault of night; humming-birds flashing in the tropic sun; children dancing in light-hearted glee—none of these are so truly sons of light as they who have been begotten by the Father of Lights, who carry within them the Light that lights up hearts, and who, in goodness, righteousness, and truth, prove what is well-pleasing unto the Lord. Let us live as such.

Eph. v. 2. WALK IN LOVE.—We are to imitate God's love in Christ. The love that gives, that counts no cost too great, and, in sacrificing itself for others, offers all to God, and does all for his sake. Such was the love of Jesus—sweet to God, as the scent of fields of new-mown grass in June, and this must be our model.

Not to those who love us, but who hate; not to those who are pleasant and agreeable, but who repel; not because our natural feelings are excited, but because we will to minister, even to the point of the cross, must our love go out. And every time we thus sacrifice ourselves to another for the sake of the love of God, we enter into some of the meaning of the sacrifice of Calvary, and there is wafted up to God the odour of a sweet smell.

Eph v. 15. WALK CAREFULLY.—Pick your way amid the pitfalls of the world. Gird up your flowing robes with dainty care, lest they be soiled by the filth of the street. Beware of any side paths that would lead your steps away from the narrow track. Watch and pray. Especially be careful to turn every moment of time into an opportunity of making progress in the Divine life.

All these injunctions, however, will baffle us, and leave us stranded on the shore, when the impulse of their stimulus ebbs, unless we blend with them the thought that God is willing to walk with us—nay, in us, for he saith, "I will dwell in them, and walk in them."

NOTES ON DAILY READINGS.

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 10.—PSALM XXXI.

The thought of this psalm swings like a pendulum from the enumeration of sources of sorrow and pain to the reiteration of trust in God. Now one and now the other occupies our thought.

Its opening strain (1-4) pleads with God to be all that which his character pledges Him to be. "Be Thou a strong rock, for Thou art my rock." This is the noblest attitude the soul can adopt, in which it lays hold on God's covenant engagements, pleading that He should be all that He has promised, and do all that He has said. "For thy name's sake"—i.e., for thy character, as revealed in Jesus Christ.

The next strain (5-8) muses on the blessed past, and recalls all that God has wrought. The devout soul can never forget that the Master appropriated one of these sentences in his death hour, and that the first of the martyr band also quoted the same words. We also may use them when entering into scenes of danger and temptation.

The third strain (9-13) enumerates the causes of present pain, as if the bitter catalogue of woe must touch the heart of God. In this the instinct of the Psalmist led him truly, because our weakness is our strongest plea with God. Ill-health, defamation of character, alienation of friends—tell them all to God. To tell them is to get relief. Then from all rise into the next strain (14-18) by prayer and faith, and realise that all your times are determined by God's unerring wisdom and love. They are in the hand that was crucified.

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 11.—PSALM XXXII.

This was David's experience during the year which followed his great sin. At first silent in moody obstinacy, till the pain became intolerable, and the sluice-gates of confession were forced. Then he tasted the blessedness of forgiveness, of which he so sweetly speaks.

Transgression is rebellion against royal authority; sin is missing a mark; iniquity means crookedness. Then note the three words that describe the putting away of sin. Forgiven, the burden lifted off; covered, the mantle of love flung over the foul wound; imputeth not, the debt cancelled.

Then we are led (3-5) through the secret passages of his soul-experience, during which he refused to confess. It is thus that men suffer hell before they reach it. But confession changes all, and the soul springs up into the light, crying, O the blessednesses of forgiveness! Learn that confession is the condition of instant pardon. The words of penitence have hardly begun to cross the lips, ere they are checked in the rush of pardon. "But the Father said. . . ."

Standing on the ground of justification, the forgiven man magnifies God's grace, and invites others to share it. All times of seeking are times of finding (6). In all great waters there is a hiding-place (7). For all trouble there are songs. In all perplexity there is guidance by one who always has his eye on those whom He loves (8, R.V.).

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 12.—PSALM XXXIII.

Amid the storm and stress of life, God's own can sing. The righteous soul is so sure of the righteous Lord, that it can afford to look across the present and anticipate the hour when He who created all things will restore that which He has made, and bring again the pristine beauty and order of his first creation. Such praise becomes us. Everywhere beside, God is misunderstood and hated, let us not be slack to express our adoration and love. The righteous (4, 5) have a quick perception of the rightness of God's Word, the faithfulness of his work, and discover that the earth is full of love. It is the distorted heart, to which all things seem awry.

In vv. 6-9 we have a noble description of creation; and in vv. 10, 11, a reference to the divine government of men. God's will alone is permanent; rest there, and your life will also acquire permanence and strength. The limpet becomes as the rock to which it adheres. To do God's will is to abide for ever.

In the closing stanzas of the psalm (12, etc.), the singer describes the blessedness of Israel, and there are striking resemblances to the song of Moses and Miriam at the Red Sea, which was referred to in v. 7. Note the minuteness of God's care, looking from heaven; fashioning all hearts; watching (18) to succour his own. Let us wait (20); let us trust (21); let us hope (22). We shall find God our help and shield. As surely as we have trusted Him, we shall rejoice in Him. As certainly as we have hoped, we shall find his mercy distilling on us as dew.

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 13.—PSALM XXXIV.

The superscription connects this psalm with a strange and humiliating experience in David's life. His device was by no means creditable to him, but he recognised that God's good hand had delivered him, almost in spite of himself.

What a burst of joy in that opening summons (1-3). He little thought in that glad hour of the darkness which was to overcast his life, and silence his song in later years. We get glimpses now and again of a life of continued praise, but they halt in their realisation. Yet God would make them permanently ours if we would. True joy is contagious. One songster will set the feathered choirs of the woodland singing "with me" together.

From personal experience the Psalmist proceeds to general principles of what God will do for those who trust Him (4, etc.). Are you in the dark? Look to Him and be lightened. Are you poor? Cry and He will save. Are you assailed by your foes? The angel of the Lord will encamp as the inner circle of defence. Do you lack aught? Seek the Lord and you shall not want any good thing. Do you desire life? Mind your speech. Are you in trouble? Cry and the Lord will deliver you out of them all. Is your heart broken? The Lord is nigh. Is your spirit contrite? He saves such. Are you afflicted? Not a bone shall be broken. Are you hated? Trust, and you shall not be condemned. O taste and see that God is good (8). To know however little is to long for more, and yet there is no want where the heart knows Him.

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 14.—PSALM XXXV.

The Sauline persecution may account for this psalm (compare verse 1 with 1 Sam. xxiv, 15). There are three sections, each leading up to praise.

In the first (1-10), the psalmist appeals to Jehovah to vindicate him. He depicts a battle-field, in which God drives the fleeing foe before him. The imperatives of this passage may be read as predictions. Instead of let them be, read they shall be. In all these utterances the Psalmist is the mouthpiece of God, declaring the certain and awful consequences of sin. What a terrible delineation of the inevitable fate that overtakes the ungodly!

In the second (11-18) a contrast is drawn between the accusations of the foe and the lonely prayer of the persecuted soul. And these avowals of his anxiety dissipate all ground for charging David with personal vindictiveness in the earlier passages of this psalm. Pray on, your prayers may seem to miscarry, but they will return to you in blessing (13).

In the last (19-28), the cry for deliverance becomes more intense. On the one hand is the crowd of foes, hating heartily, and longing for the destruction of the saint. On the other hand is the assembly of those who favour him. And he is sure that the day must come, when the hours will be all too short for his talk of the love which delivered him from the one and gave him to the other. So it shall be with you.

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 15.—PSALM XXXVI

What a contrast there is between the evil of the heart and the exquisite beauty of nature which reflects the moral attributes of God. In ver. 1 substitute his for my. Transgression utters its oracles in the heart of the wicked (R.V.) as a sybil in the caves of old, and reveals itself in words and ways that are not good.

Notice, first, the words preceded by the pronoun Thy. What a catalogue is here! Each a subject for devout thought! Whether the soft wing of God or the brimming river of his pleasure; his righteousness or his loving kindness.

Notice, next, the natural objects employed to match the Divine attributes. How many stops in the great organ of creation are drawn out to celebrate the praise of God. Children of men! take refuge in God, and you will find yourselves ushered into his house, sitting at his table, drinking deep draughts of life's fountain, and seeing light in his light. And when once there, be glad, for thither the foot of pride can never come, and the hand of the wicked shall never reach to pluck you away. "None shall pluck them out of my Father's hand."

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 16.—PSALM XXXVII.

Fret not (1). Fret not (7). Fret not (8).

Trust (3). Trust also (5).

Delight thyself in God (4). Roll thy way on God (5, marg.). Be silent to God (7).

Wait patiently (7). Those that wait, inherit (9). Wait on the Lord and keep his way (34).

The inheritance (9, 18, 22, 34).

The wicked persecute the good. Shall not the good man retaliate? No; because God delights in his way and takes his side against his foes. Their success is but for a moment. Soon God will interpose on his servants' behalf and mow down the ranks of their oppressors, and they shall wither like swathes of new-mown grass.

There is no need, therefore, to become angry or to use force. Be still. Go on doing what is right. Leave all vengeance with Him to whom it belongs. Do not be surprised at the immediate prosperity of the wicked, but wait for the latter end. Of the wicked, it is to be cut off. Of the righteous, it is peace. Take refuge then in God (40), from man and from thyself, the Lord helpeth—rescueth—saveth.

INTERNATIONAL S. S. LESSONS.

SEPTEMBER 17.

Personal Responsibility, Rom. xiv. 12-23.

Golden Text, verse 21.

In the church at Rome were two classes of persons, the weak and the strong (xiv. 1; xv. 1), and the aim of the Apostle is to lay down a principle upon which the one class may act towards the other without disturbing their peaceful fellowship. The weak were made up of converts from heathenism, and certain Jewish Christians who were still in bondage to the letter of the Jewish law. To these any meat or drink having been offered to idols was defiled, and since what they bought in the market might have been so offered, they refused it altogether rather than defile their conscience. The strong possessed more spiritual intelligence, knew that an idol was nothing (1 Cor. viii. 4-6), and that no meat was in itself unclean (Rom. xiv. 14). They understood better than the others the liberty of the Gospel.

But there was a danger lest these two classes should act without proper consideration for one another. The weak, who were more punctilious, might sit in judgment upon the strong, and condemn them; while the strong were tempted to make use of their liberty without caring at all about the effect of their conduct upon the weak. To the weak Paul says: Do not take offence at the conduct of others though it differs from your own. To the strong Paul says: Be considerate for the weakness of your brethren, become weak for their sakes, and let not your liberty be exercised so as to injure them.

This counsel is enforced in our lesson. (1) By the prospect of judgment for us all (12, 13). The weak are reminded that the strong are fellow-servants with them of the same Master, and that He will receive the account of each one. In all matters on which there may lawfully be a difference of opinion is it not wiser to leave judgment with Him? And in view of that judgment seat the strong are warned against making their liberty an occasion of stumbling to the weak. The members of the Church of Christ are so bound together that no man may exercise his liberty without considering the possible effect upon others who are less instructed.

(1) By the law of love (14, 15). The Lord died for the weak as well as for the strong. How small will our sacrifice of personal liberty appear in comparison with what He sacrificed in order to possess them. The love that revealed itself in Jesus when He died for men, is to be shown by the strong towards the weak (1 Jno. iii. 16). A man says, he drinks his glass of beer in order to manifest his liberty as a Christian; but if his action "grieves," perhaps "destroys," some weaker brother, is he not making too much of his liberty to enjoy a personal indulgence, and too little of the charity due to his brother? Our liberty needs to be exercised upon the principle laid down in Gal. v. 13.

(3) By the greater importance of other things (16—19). The spectacle of a church at strife on a question of eating and drinking, because one part would insist on enjoying a harmless indulgence which another part of the church condemned, is far from edifying. "Righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost" are the necessary things. A church where these are absent is not only useless, but injurious. The liberty for which one may contend may be a "good" thing (16), but if it be "evil spoken of," would it not be wiser to sacrifice it? See how much may follow from our refusal to exercise our liberty (18—19). God is well pleased, men approve, the church's peace is preserved, and the weak are built up. These are the more important things we should seek.

(4) By a consideration of the conscience of the weak (20-23). Think how the weaker brother regards what is to you a lawful indulgence. If he repeated your action his conscience would be defiled, he would be made to stumble, and his Christian profession would be destroyed. To him it would be wrong; and while he may not demand that you regulate your conduct according to his weaker conscience, yet you may do this for his sake.

The teaching of this lesson is well expressed in the words of Luther, "The Christian is a master of all masters, and a servant of all servants." Or in the words of Gregory the Great, "Free in faith, serving in love." Our attitude toward everything that is lawful in itself, but may be a stumbling block to others, is that of being "free to use them, but too free to need them." We manifest a truer liberty by surrendering them for a brother's sake than by continuing to indulge them.

CAVALRY CURATES.—The Archdeacon of Northumberland's scheme of "cavalry curates," to ride on ponies from hamlet to hamlet in scattered portions of the diocese, and officiate in small chapels of wood or iron capable of holding from thirty to fifty people, is progressing favourably.

For the Young.

"GO QUICKLY, AND TELL."

GLEN had been a disciple of Jesus for more than a year—a sort of Nicodemus disciple, secretly, for fear of Bob. That was her brother—her daring, darling, handsome, only brother.

Now, Bob had got it into his head that it was quite enough for a fellow to go to church and Sunday-school, and to say his prayers, when he didn't forget them; to follow Jesus afar off, in short. None but "milksops," he felt pretty certain, "went in" for more than that in the way of religion—for much more, at any rate.

Indeed, as Glen well knew, he had a decided prejudice against those whom he contemptuously called "saints," though, in common with many an older and wiser being, he had but the vaguest notion as to what he meant by that term, and no notion at all as to what God means by it. It included, in Bob's mind, the dead folks whose names are printed in calendars, etc., with "St." before them, and certain live folks whom he knew, who fancied themselves to be (he fancied) a great deal better than the rest of the world.

Glen and he were not brother and sister only, but dear friends and close confidants. Yet when Glen was constrained by the love of God her Saviour to "come" to Him in a more definite and real way than ever before, she kept her coming and what she got by it—much of which, however, she could never tell anybody, it was so unspeakable—a secret from Bob, and from everybody else, for fear it should get from others to him.

She came to know that Bob was all wrong about "saints," and longed for him to find out, as she had done, that "saint" is just a beautiful name for poor sinners whom God has forgiven for Jesus' sake, who think nothing of themselves and everything of their Saviour; longed, too, to tell her brother what a very nice thing it was to love that Saviour, and to be "set apart" for Him. But she feared he would never understand—would laugh at her—would love her less if she told him. So she kept her newly-found joy to herself, and lost ever so much of it in the keeping.

* * * *

"You've all heard of the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavour?" said the superintendent of the Sunday-school which Glen and Bob attended, from the desk at the close of school one Sunday. "Well, we're going to start a branch in connection with our school, if those among you who love the Lord Jesus, or would like to love Him, will rally round us and help us to do so. The preliminary meeting, at which you will hear all necessary explanations and details, will be held next Friday evening at half-past seven, and I invite all who answer to the description I have just given to attend."

* * * * *

"You will come, I hope, Glen," said her teacher, shaking hands with her. "I do believe you love Him, dear?"

Glen was silent. We can guess why. But her heart gave a big bound, and she thought as she joined Bob outside, "O, I do! I do! and I'd give anything to tell it out by going; but—what would Bob say? He'd never understand, he'd think I was setting myself up, and making myself ridiculous. I daren't go."

She was ready to "give anything" to tell it out; she was not ready to risk having to give up any portion of the place she had in Bob's esteem and love.

Before long the St. David's branch of the Y.P.S.C.E. became an established fact. From the young Endeavourers, gathered out of the various classes, Glen listened to many a glowing report of what was done at the meetings, and of what lifts up hills of difficulty, and help in living and working for Jesus were to be had at them. Her secret longing to frequent them grew deeper and deeper, and at last, on a certain Friday, she resolved to go just for once.

Bob was to take tea with Phil Taylor, one of his chums, and wouldn't be back till quite late, he said. Glen was always allowed to attend the Sunday-school meetings, provided that her lessons, etc., were not neglected for them. And it was not likely that Bob would inquire into her doings during his absence. The committee-room was crowded when Glen entered it, for she had been kept at the last moment to do some little service for her mother.

The boys and girls were all on their knees, speaking, one after another, briefly, earnestly, and some of them tremblingly, to God. Presently a boyish voice broke a still and solemn pause: "O God, I've made up my mind to follow the Lord Jesus Christ from to-night. Please help me, and please bring my sister to know and love Him too. For Christ's sake."

Bitter tears of shame and sorrow rushed to the eyes and down the cheeks of that sister, kneeling, all unknown to him, quite near the pleader. Then, before the little company rose from their knees, she slipped out of the room as quietly as she had entered it.

* * * *

As soon as Bob came home from Taylor's that night he went straight up to his room. Hardly had he closed the door when a timid knock on the outside of it was followed by the entrance of Glen, as her "Oh, Bob, dear" announced. So she began, but could get no further.

"What's up, Glen?" asked Bob, feeling about for his matchbox. "Are you crying? Ain't you well? They said you'd gone to bed long ago. Where are those matches?"

"Don't try to find them yet. I've something to tell you, and I'd rather in the dark. Bob, I was in the meeting a few minutes this evening, and I heard you, and how came you there?"

"How came you there? I didn't see you. I'm glad you were though. Taylor went, I went, he asked me. Fact is, Glen, Taylor joined 'em last week. And he isn't a milksop; he's the biggest brick out. And he's been on to me ever since, and, well, I've been on a wrong tack, I find, but I'm going on a new one altogether now. The long and the short of it is, I'm a Christian, and I want you to be, too, old girl."

Then Glen told him what we know. "And, O Bob, I'm afraid I've been mistaken all along. I couldn't have hidden it up, I just couldn't, if it'd been real—like—like you and Taylor, you wouldn't have, would you?"

"You haven't—all of it. You were always jolly, but you've been jollier than ever lately. It's all my fault if you've been afraid to show your colours. I needn't remind you, Sis, how awfully good He is about forgiving; so we'll let bygones be bygones, and never you bother about 'coulds' and 'woulds.' We can out with it together now, and be Endeavourers together, and we will, won't we?"

"I feel too happy to sleep, Bob," said Glen joyfully, as she gave him his good-night kiss.

CHILDREN'S S.S. MISSION.—SEASIDE SERVICES, 1893. The following are the arrangements for the Children's Seaside Services: Mr. H. Hutchinson and W. H. Wilson, Bridlington Quay, to Sept. 11; Mr. E. Arrowsmith, Eastbourne, to Sept. 20; Mr. H. E. Geary, B.A., Herne Bay, to Sept. 11; Mr. A. G. Dodderidge, St. Leonards; Messrs. Josiah Spiers and R. Westall, Towyn, N. Wales; Rev. M. J. Hall, Ventnor, I.W.; Mr. Livesey Carrott, Felixstowe.

CHILDREN'S SCRIPTURE UNION.—Sept. 10, S., 1 Chron. xii. 16-29; 11, xii. 30-40; 12, xiii. 1-14; 13, xiv. 8-17; 14, xv. and xvi. 25-29, 1-14; 15, xvii. 1-15; 16, xvii. 16-27.

MISS MOORE writes from the Home of Rest, Walton-on-the Naze:—"We are again holding services, in our new tent on the beach, every morning and two evenings a week. During the past three weeks many children, aged from eight to seventeen, have yielded to Christ, and the Lord has been working mightily in our evening meetings for adults, bringing them to see the need of Christ, and the filling of the Holy Spirit."

SAND SERVICES.

SOUTHEND-ON-SEA.

THE services for children held on the sands here since August 1 were concluded on September 1. The time has been one of great happiness and much blessing to the children, the adults, and to those who have assisted in the work. We have indeed realised the fulfilment of the promise, "I will command my blessing upon you." J. W. COLDICOTT.

CARNOUSTIE, SCOTLAND.

The workers of the seaside services were only four in number, and were able to remain only a fortnight; the Lord was pleased to give marked signs of blessing. The attendance at the beach meeting gradually increased, reaching 400 on week-days and 600 on Sunday. At the Chinese lantern service we mustered eighty lanterns, and perhaps 600 listeners. We have heard of definite blessing through this service. The sports also were a success. T. G. B.

LYTHAM.

Mr. Gilbert R. Kirlew has again held a fortnight's services at this well-known Lancashire watering-place. Meetings were held each day at 11 a.m. and 6 p.m. The first week Mr. Kirlew was assisted by Mr. Marston, of Halifax, and the second week by Messrs. Marston, Ernest Wright, and Fred. Hargreaves.

Each morning the workers, and any children who were specially interested in the well-being of the services, met in the Y.W.C.A. room to ask God's blessing upon the services of the day, and these little prayer meetings were wonderfully blessed of God before the close of the mission.

Afternoons were sometimes occupied by cricket matches, etc., so that the children might be shown that the religion of Jesus was not opposed to happiness or play. An important event was the Chinese lantern service, held on the Green. A large number of children each carrying a lantern, walked in procession from the well-known windmill, along the promenade, afterward forming an inner circle, and being surrounded by numbers of other children and adults attracted by the unusual sight. On the last Sunday afternoon a Scripture object competition was held. Much trouble and ingenuity were shown by the wonderful and varied objects brought together by the children.

MADAGASCAR GIRLS.

WITHIN the last year our hearts have been encouraged by a number of girls, mostly little ones, who have come forward desiring to follow Jesus. There is now a little band of fifteen, but it is continually if slowly increasing. By their own desire, I take them with me every other Sunday to carry the Gospel to the villages round about, they are also eager to help in any way they can to forward God's work.

Will fellow-Christians give thanks for these dear children, and pray that everyone of them may be kept, strengthened, and further enlightened as to spiritual things? KATHLEEN P. MACKAY.

Antsihanaka, Madagascar, June 25.

Folkestone Y.W.C.A.

THIRTEEN years ago the darkest, lowest spot in Folkestone was a certain court called the "Narrows," inhabited by gipsies, rag-and-bone pickers, knife-grinders, and outcasts, none of whom ever entered a place of worship. By the grace of God the Y.W.C.A. was led to take the Gospel to these people, and by degrees to establish a systematic evangelistic work amongst them, with the result that souls have been saved, lives reformed, and the neighbourhood improved. We have long prayed and waited for a mission hall to take the place of cottage which for several years we have used for our meetings, Sunday-school, etc. Having now bought some freehold property in the midst of this dark neighbourhood, we desire to pay off the purchase money at once and build a commodious hall. The address of the Institute is Alexandra Gardens. A. E. M.

AN ECHO OF KESWICK.

Many will be glad to read the following estimate of the recent Keswick Convention by Dr. Norman L. Walker, editor of the Free Church of Scotland Monthly, which we extract from an article in the September issue :—

"It may sound like an exaggeration, but I confess that Keswick looked to me more like what our towns will become when the millennium arrives than anything I have ever yet witnessed. Religion was, for the time being, the subject which was uppermost in the minds of us all. I daresay there were many in the place who remained unaffected. The driver of a waggonette, in which we were making an excursion, told me he had been at none of the meetings, and overladen coaches constantly rattled through the streets. But it was impossible to survey the great multitudes which met day by day for worship, and which were so quiet, so kindly, and so earnest-looking, without feeling that there had indeed been put forth the gracious power of the Holy Ghost.

"As to the teaching, I did not hear anything to which serious objection could be taken ; nothing could be more sober and reasonable than the addresses, for example, of Principal Moule. I did not assent to everything to which I listened. It seemed to me that attempts were sometimes made to put fanciful interpretations upon passages of Scripture; and I did not see why the period at which a man is brought to understand the special point of trusting in Christ for sanctification should be spoken of as a crisis in his life like that of his first conversion. The point itself is not a peculiarly recondite one. It ought not to be difficult to show to an intelligent Christian man that the strength in which he is to overcome temptation must be in no sense his own, but Christ's; and although the illumination may come from the Holy Ghost, and may result at times in a very blessed sense of deliverance, I do not think it is necessary to regard it as implying a new transformation. We have many fresh revelations made to us in the course of a long experience, and that may be one of them. To insist on its being otherwise is to tend to destroy the Bible idea of spiritual development, which is compared to the light which grows more and more vivid unto the perfect day.

"Two memories of the Convention, however, will always live with me. I shall never forget that day by day the aim of everyone seemed to be to give 'all glory' to Jesus Christ and to the Holy Ghost. A spirit like that cannot but issue in the securing of blessing. And for another thing, it was very plain that those present were heart and soul concerned about the coming of the Kingdom. Whatever of 'quietism' there may seem to be in the doctrine of Keswick, there is no tendency to encourage inactivity in the life. How to bring about the submission of men everywhere to God—that seemed to be the great thought with all. I do not think any of them were troubled with the doubts of the Higher Critics. To them the Bible was in an emphatic sense God's own Book, and while leaving speculation to others, they were on fire to establish the reign of Christ."

MLLE. AIMÉE RAPIN.

The body is made to be the servant of the spirit. Yet the Royal Preacher had seen servants on horseback and princes walking like servants in the street. We see it also wherever the body with its appetites rules, and soul and spirit are made subservient to it.

The blind read with their fingers ; and we have all heard of the blind girl who read with her tongue when her finger-tips had lost their sensitiveness through hard work.

Wonderful is the ability of the human being dwelling in an incomplete body to use other members to supply the lack of service proper to the missing parts. It would seem that without arms and hands the artistic faculty must remain unexpressed, but we have lately seen in her studio a young artiste, who, born without arms, does excellent work, in painting and modelling, with her feet.

No one would have suspected that the admirable portrait of our Princess May, at the Imperial Institute, was painted without hands. Yet such is the case. The artiste is Mdlle. Aimée Rapin, of 8, Warwick-gardens, West Kensington. She is a young Swiss lady of four-and-twenty, who has used her pencil and brush from early childhood. Having finished her education at Lausanne, she entered the School of Fine Arts at Geneva in her sixteenth year. In the course of her studies she took first prizes in modelling and painting, and received also the first prize in portrait-painting of the highest class at the Geneva Academy of Fine Arts.

We have been much interested in one so heavily handicapped, and have had engraved a portrait of herself, and also the photographs of two portraits painted by her, which, it will be seen, are of no common order. In the words of a young Polish lady, a friend of Aimée Rapin, "God glorifies Himself in her, and, notwithstanding her deficiency, has so enabled her to triumph over difficulties that she has attained proficiency in arts which are understood to require peculiar dexterity of hand." We shall be pleased if this mention of her deprivation and of her talent should lead to her recognition as a highly-qualified portrait painter, and attract to her studio those who may give her the opportunity of putting this to the proof.

An Important Conference is announced to take place at Lansdowne Hall, West Norwood, on Sept. 27 and 28, the subject being "The Truth and Power of the Scriptures." Among those expected to take part are Revs. G. D. Hooper, W. R. Mowll, J. Hudson Taylor, Robt. Taylor, J. G. Train, John Wilkinson, James Douglas, W. Fuller Gooch, and H. E. Stone, Dr. R. McKilliam, Mr. W. H. Seagram, and Gen. Sir R. Phayre. The conference will meet each day at 3 and 7 o'clock.

STRANGERS' REST, RATCLIFF HIGHWAY.

The monthly meeting of workers at the Strangers' Rest, Ratcliff Highway, on Friday last, was presided over by Mr. J. Christian Hukins. Mr. J. T. Isaac, hon. sec., pleaded for additional workers among Germans and Scandinavians, as well as among English sailors. He was glad to report encouragingly of the Zanzibar Rest, where opportunities are opening for labour among the natives as well as seamen. Three addresses were delivered, two expository and one practical. The theme, however, was one—Christ as the subject of testimony as regards his redeeming work, the object of hope in regard to his expected return, and the Master for whom all should labour.

Dr. McKilliam's address on "Purification by the Hope" was an elucidation of Scripture doctrine directed to a very practical end. The hope is bright, and we cannot bear it about in our hearts day by day without being purified even as He is pure.

Miss Reade, of Punrooty, gave an account of the work of the Highways and Hedges Mission, South Arcot, India. For eighteen years she has toiled, having originally been accompanied by Miss Lowe. The mission was designated "Highways" because of the open-air preaching and itineration associated with it; and "Hedges" because it seeks to reach Mohammedan women, whose houses are generally surrounded by hedges for the purpose of seclusion.

Miss Reade related the circumstances of occasional stays at Cuddalore, where she was visited daily by students from the Government and Roman Catholic colleges. As a result a young Brahmin was converted, and after enduring severe persecution he was exiled for several years. The Basle Mission took him in hand, and now he is in charge of the work at Punrooty, a missionary exercising supervision during Miss Reade's temporary absence. There is a great demand for reference Bibles and commentaries among the educated young men of the district; and in order to help them Miss Reade has opened a library, which has at present 550 volumes in English and the vernacular languages. The sisters and wives of the young men have requested that books may be lent to them also ; and so classes of the community who would otherwise be inaccessible are reached, and women as well as men have shown many signs of high appreciation. Miss Reade urged the claims of India upon all whose hearts beat for the cause of Christ, and her address was listened to with much interest.

Soldiers in Camp.

Dear Sir,—I have just spent a day or two in the camp at Coate, Swindon. Miss Daniell has erected a large marquee where the men can get tea and coffee, write letters, etc. In the evenings meetings are held, and it was a great joy to me to tell the Gospel to a large company each night of Horse Guards Blue, 17th Lancers, and Dragoon Guards.

I beg the earnest prayers of your readers for Miss Daniell, and the ladies who are with her at the camp, and for the devoted chaplain who is working with them so heartily for the spiritual good of our soldiers here. W. R. Lane.

The Late MR. JOHN DERBY ALLCROFT.

THERE has been of late years a growing tendency to talk, and even to preach, of the "Gospel of Wealth," as though it were some other gospel." One has lately passed within the veil who recognised no such distinction, to whom the "Gospel of Wealth" and the Gospel of Christ were complementary influences; so that, in the simplicity of the life, a man may, as in God's sight, employ the powers and opportunities of the other. It is eternally true that Christ came to preach glad tidings to the poor, but there is a sister truth that—"hardly," it may be, but if they can endure hardness, certainly—rich men may find their abundant entrance into the kingdom of God. It is surely well with John Derby Allcroft. The public might never have heard his name were it not for the use he made of the riches he acquired, for the firm of which he was the mainspring was popularly known by another name than his. But, whether poor or wealthy, whether known or unknown, his would have been always the spirit and the desire, by the grace of God, to think and to do those things that be rightful, the things that bring a man at the last that peace in which he died.

It has often been said, and wrongly, that Mr. Allcroft was among those commercial heroes who come to London with half-a-crown in their pocket. As a matter of fact, his father, Mr. Jeremiah Allcroft, was in partnership with Messrs. Dent & Worcester, where JOHN DERBY was born in the year 1822. There he instructed himself in the details of the trade, till he was ready to go further afield and take on his young shoulders the task of developing the business in London. Many will remember its humble, almost underground, beginning in Friday-street. The present house in Wood-street is a commercial byword. The story of those years of ceaseless activity is still untold, perhaps will never be told. His friends of later days got occasional glimpses into it, and probably it differed little from those many careers of Christian commercial enterprise which are all the pride of our great city.

Meanwhile, the things that belonged to the higher welfare of his employés were never far from his mind. He was able to gauge, few men could gauge better, the value of that great work for the welfare of young men in business houses which was in those days carried on by William Edwyn Shipton in Aldersgate-street, and by Henry Bowker in the West End. To the end of his life he watched the Y.M.C.A., and sought opportunity to help it; and it was part of the considerateness of the man that he considered those who thus laboured in the Lord, and helped the secretaries in their private as well as their public interests. Later on, when his position at Christ's Hospital put the means in his way, it was to Y.M.C.A. secretaries in several cases that he turned with his promises of presentations to the Hospital for their sons. It was good to give, as he gave, £5000 to secure Exeter Hall, but it was better to be a perpetual pillar of support to men whose work is as anxious as Y.M.C.A. work is.

Wealth for wealth's sake was not one of our friend's ambitions, and he retired early from an active part in the great Wood-street house, but only to seek work—more directly Christian work—elsewhere. In the year 1849 he had become a governor of Christ's Hospital, and, happily for that great and good foundation, it chanced that the year of Mr. Allcroft's retirement from business saw a vacancy in the treasurership, the chief executive office. His capacity was no secret to his colleagues, his desire that Christ's Hospital should maintain its Christ-like character was clear enough to himself, and he agreed to accept the responsibility. We have no space here to explain all that there must be of daily drudgery in such work. Mr. Allcroft went through it all—courts and committees, public suppings, and speech-days, and special services, guiding day by day the various agencies by which the eleven or twelve hundred boys and girls were fed and taught and sent out into the world, but nursing all the time in his heart the longing that something more might be done at the church the boys attended to fill them with the fear and admonition of the Lord, and approving every earnest effort made to that end on the part of those who were in authority within the walls.

The characteristic feature of his mind, and the things that arose out of it, remain to be noticed, and they claim notice because the ecclesiastical history of the last quarter of a century is, perhaps almost unconsciously, full of them. It would be true to say of him that he was a man of few ideas, even in regard to his faith in his Master, but those few were ineradicably fixed, and the firmest of them was summed up in the word "Protestantism." He was convinced with a colossal conviction that to swerve from all that this word implies and enjoins came of evil and led to evil. Having a conviction, it was his way to act up to it. When he had made a competency, and felt that he had a stake in the country, he went further than most capitalists care to go, and bought a Shropshire estate of some thousands of acres, became a magistrate and protector of his tenants, built them good cottages, with doors so placed as to secure a minimum of cold and exposure. All these things were the logical outcome of his wealth; no Christian landlord, he felt, could do less. Translate the same principle into "the things that pertain unto God," and you have an example of the same consistency. There were certain practices in vogue, certain erections in view, which he felt to be illegal; only the law itself could decide, and the law costs money. God had given him that, to this end he would use it; for this reason the Law Reports will hand down in all its length the case of "Allcroft, etc., v. the Bishop of London." It is no secret that he grieved over the issue; but he was too strong to bear malice, and some time after he had fought and lost, he might have been seen showing the Dean of St. Paul's round the Hall of Christ's Hospital on a public occasion.

But where the law would not help him, he saw that he could help himself; he made himself patron of many livings, building some churches, and endowing others, and having yet others on his Stokesay estate, and to these he was free, or rather he was bound, to appoint men who, as he phrased it, would preach a plain Gospel without any nonsense. It was doubtless in recognition of this that the Church Pastoral Aid Society chose him as their President, and certainly no man was ever more active in promoting the principles of that staunch society.

Of the many other causes to which he gave his name and his aid, the Bible Society, St. Mary's Hospital, the Corporation of the Sons of the Clergy, it is impossible to speak here, nor yet of his short Parliamentary experience, which was more due to love for Worcester than to hankerings after Westminster. Nor shall his private life be here thrust into view. It was a temple that took many years in building; those who were privileged to enter will never forget it, but no stranger has a right to stretch his line upon it or to measure its depth or its breadth. This, however, may be said, that he could picture no greater joy than that his sons should be found walking in the truth, and after that he would have them to be honest country gentlemen. It is characteristic of the man that only when he had given thousands of pounds to the building of churches and hospitals, and to what he regarded as the purifying of the Church at large—only then did he erect for his family on his estate a mansion worthy of the position in the county to which they were called. And now that in perfect peace he has gone to his rest, he is still a reminder to his generation that "to the godly there ariseth light in the darkness." "The Lord knoweth the days of the godly, and their inheritance shall endure for ever."

A HAPPY SERVICE.

Some months ago I happened to look into the waiting-room of a small local dispensary in this city. Waiting there to see the doctor, chiefly on account of eye complaints, were some eight or nine patients. The thought arose in my heart whether I could not be of some small use in coming to read to, and sympathise in the troubles of, those sufferers, some of whom might be in want of spiritual eyesight quite as much as of physical healing. Obtaining the permission of the doctor, which was most readily given, and the aid of several suitable sister helpers, we began our little service for the Lord, which by his grace has opened out most precious opportunities of both spiritual and temporal aid.

At first the service was a trying and difficult one, owing to the various interruptions—the noise of the street, the inattention and restlessness of the patients, and also our being unknown to them. But gradually all this was overcome, and now they look forward with pleasure to the regular loving sympathetic visits made each dispensing day, eagerly listening to short Gospel stories and expositions; and opening out their troubles, and gratefully taking home suitable books and tracts.

Among those whom God has blessed, is one whose sight was so far gone that he had to be led to the dispensary; gradually his heart, like Lydia's, opened to receive God's salvation, and he is now rejoicing in his Saviour. Though poor and having wife and children, and as yet unable to resume his trade as a shoemaker, he does not murmur, and most gladly takes to any work he is given to maintain them. The doctor gives good hope of his eventual restoration so far as to resume his work, and meanwhile a few of us do what we can to help him on, looking to the Lord for aid. Maybe some who, like Bartimæus, have received the Lord's healing, might like to aid their healed brother for a little while.

But my object mainly is to draw out unto similar service some sister-helps, who, unable perhaps for the heavier toil, long for some regular and beneficial work for their Lord. In most large towns there are local dispensaries—apart from medical missions—and there are many "beloved physicians" who would be glad of such aid to supply the missing link in their service.

Obtaining the permission of the doctor or committee, and ever acting with heavenly wisdom and grace, much of real medical mission work might thus be done, to the comfort of many a sufferer, and the spiritual aid of many a soul, to the glory of God.

Cheapness and Efficiency.

BY REV. J. H. HORSBURGH.

(Concluded from our last.)

II.

Here I would conclude were it not that I want to press home a point to which indirect reference has been made already—I mean that this question is not a question "merely of saving a few pounds." Even that, in view of the woeful destitution of heathendom, is not a thing to be despised. If in America, and also in England, men are ready to go to the heathen, and are being kept back through lack of funds wherewith to send them, and if by the "saving-of-a-few-pounds" method three (or four) missionaries can be sent to inland China and work effectually, instead of one, then "saving a few pounds," in my opinion, becomes a really important, indeed a sacred, matter.

But this question of "cheap missions" lies deeper even than that. What is the hindrance that meets us everywhere? What is it that makes us turn sick, and in weak moments, were it not for God's Word, would lead us to despair, and to give up the whole thing as a failure? It is this wretched money! Oh, how gladly would we, if we could, live on fifty pence a year, instead of £50, in order to save these poor people from harm, and so much of the work from a sandy foundation. For many of us feel that the expensive living of even "cheap" missionaries is one of the greatest hindrances to efficiency, if by that we mean the ingathering of "hot" apostolic converts, and that if only we could be really "cheap," a great stone of difficulty would be rolled away, and efficiency be greatly promoted.

Our mode of living—the many pleasures and comforts with which, as it appears to the natives, we surround ourselves; the absence, in their eyes, of any self-denial; the easy life, the big house, the many servants, the expensive food, the utter indifference, apparently, with which we spend threepence here and sixpence there (a trifle to us, but a large sum to them)—all these things are a real stumbling-block, and a huge temptation to the heathen around us, who know absolutely nothing of what it has cost us to come to them, and of what it has cost our friends to send us. Nay, the only thought in their minds is how rich we are, how greatly to be envied, and, naturally, a desire to be, at our expense, as rich and comfortable as possible themselves. After a time some of them learn better. And God gives to his servants to see not a few real and blessed conversions. Yet even so, one wonders if we shall ever see in China the self-sacrificing, deeply-taught, Spirit-filled Christians, for whom we are praying, who, in their fervent love to God and the souls of their fellow-men, will literally forsake all, and follow the despised and persecuted Jesus. I say one wonders whether we shall see such men (yet, God knows how tremendously they are needed) as long as we missionaries are, in their eyes, living easy-going, self-pleasing lives.

The subject is a very difficult one. Every sixpence we spend on what the natives consider unnecessary or self-pleasing indulgences, humanly speaking, does harm. Yet we cannot live quite as the natives do; no missionaries that I know of attempt it: and certainly those who receive £50 a year, if they spend it, are a very long way off. They are really well-to-do in inland China.

I hope enough has now been said to show that the subject of "cheap missions" has a wider bearing than is generally supposed. It lies deeper than £ s. d. Those who speak of it, or write of it only from that point of view, ignore the real question.

Now for one or two closing remarks. All missionaries of any experience in China are agreed that the use of foreign money is attended with risk to the natives, and that much caution is needed. All are not agreed as to how little it is wise to spend, nor as to how little missionaries can properly live upon.

This being so, let not those who are in favour of (so called) "cheap missions" discourage those who are working somewhat differently. And, on the other hand, let it not be implied that because some missions are called cheap, therefore they are inefficient. I do not think there is one particle of proof of this, or that there ever will be. The visible results may be slow, but none the less sure, and, in the end, none the less satisfactory. Seeing that missionaries have different gifts, and are called to labour in different ways and in different kinds of work, is it not wise that our mission societies should have two branches, and give us the opportunity of working in whichever way God has been fitting us.

It may be said, Why have two branches? No one is obliged to receive more than he wishes. If a missionary finds he has more salary than he needs he has nothing to do but to return a part of it. A moment's reflection will show that this will not meet the case. A missionary who believes his life will tell best for God in China if he lives inexpensively, if he lives in a Chinese house, wears the Chinese dress, and avoids introducing English customs; if he has only the simplest possible services, if he avoids the temptation to employ people, to give away money, and, above all, the temptation to engage the Christians to do spiritual work for English pay, instead of leaving them gradually to support pastors and catechists among themselves—such a missionary will find it impossible to carry out these principles if fellow-missionaries at his side are doing differently.

No! there must be two branches and they must work in separate districts. In this way the labour of both branches will be satisfactory, and a wide wilderness area will be covered.

But whilst I say this, I do not mean to imply that the deeply-respected and highly-conscientious, faithful, and successful missionaries who (partly perhaps, from insufficient knowledge) are not able to sympathise with "cheap missions," are living in luxury, and all such nonsense as that. They are living, comparatively speaking, plainly. And it would be a very good thing if those Christians at home who find fault with them would themselves set them a better example! No, the labourer is worthy of his hire. And, judged simply from the point of view, good missionaries, in my opinion, are paid very much too little.

In conclusion, what is to be the upshot of all this? A large number of people read missionary letters with zest, discuss missionary methods, criticise, approve, blame, and lay down the law for us very positively. They feel an interest in the subject which is all very well. But it is not at all well when, in doing this, and nothing more, they imagine they are "taking an interest in missions," for missions are benefited very little, or not at all, by "interest" which goes only as far as that. No "feeling an interest in the subject," is not "taking an interest in missions." Taking an interest in missions, to be of any practical use, must mean money coming out of people's pockets; sons and daughters, brothers and sisters, coming out of people's homes; and definite believing prayer coming out of people's hearts. That is the sort of "interest" we want. A grain of it is worth a ton of talk. More missionaries! Will you send them?" Here is a vast field for "labourers" of all sorts, provided they are labourers—sound, sensible, well-tested Christians.

And let me especially emphasise the need for men and women of wide experience and spiritual discernment, who with wise and loving hands shall be able to guide the labours of others, and, by God's grace, add a hundredfold to the efficiency of the work. The tendency seems to be to discourage men of experience and send out only young missionaries. This is a mistake. Well-tried leaders are needed. They ought to come, and the Church in the name of the Lord, ought to send them—now. "BEHOLD! I COME QUICKLY!"

I do pray that anything in this paper which is of man may fall to the ground, but that anything which is of God may abide and bear real fruit for his glory.

The facts I have stated are facts, personally attested, and not theories. The opinions are mere opinions, and, as we know, "opinions differ." But whatever our differences may be, we missionaries ll we Christians can love one another. And, nk God, I believe we do.

Chen-tu, Szchuen, China, June 9, 1893.

NOTE ON MR. HORSBURGH'S LETTER.

Having had the opportunity of seeing this letter ore it is printed, I ask leave to make one remark. hen people at home talk of £50 or £60 a year a missionary in Inland China, they do not an what Mr. Horsburgh means. They imagine at a person who contributes this sum can thereby an extra missionary in Inland China, and rely maintain him there. Mr. Horsburgh does mean this at all. He means by £50 or £60 ear the missionary's personal allowances—or, if will, his "salary," though this word is hateful misleading, and ought never to be used. And reason he gives why the amount need not be re, is that "the Society" provides for a good ny things besides. "The Society," he says, s half the cost of the Chinese teacher; also vides the house in which the missionary lives, the furniture, and the repairs from time to e; also pays doctors' bills and travelling ex-ses, "as well as all other expenses connected h the Mission"; also (in some cases at least) ucates the missionary's children. Now, what 'the Society"? It is not an abstraction with a purse. It is simply an association of Chris-n people at home for sending out missionaries. erefore, when a man says, "I will give £50 a r to keep a missionary in China," he must member that, though his gift may supply the ssionary with food and clothing, other people will e to pay probably an equal sum to provide what n so simple a missionary as Mr. Horsburgh nowledges to be necessary.

With the general spirit and purpose of Mr. Hors-gh's letter I am in cordial sympathy; and I do question his facts. Indeed, I found in India some of the best missionaries of my own Society e living on allowances of about the same amount, £60 a year (at the present value of the rupee). as in China, so in India, "the Society" has to nd" a good deal beyond that. And let me, in sing, assure your readers that, although all mis-aries are not equally simple and economical, a thing as a "highly-paid missionary," or a ssionary with a large salary," does not exist at —i.e. if we use the terms in any intelligible glish sense. AT THE PORTALS.

By Rev. J. E. Rankin.

Will they meet us, cheer, and greet us,
Those we loved who've gone before?
Shall we find them at the portals,
Find our beautified immortals,
When they reach that radiant shore?

Chorus.—They will meet us, cheer, and greet us,
Those we loved who've gone before;
We shall find them at the portals,
Find our beautified immortals
When we reach that radiant shore.

Hearts are broken for some token
That they live and love us yet!
And we ask, Can those who've left us,
Of love's look and tone bereft us;
Though in heaven, can they forget?

And we often, as days soften,
And comes out the evening star,
Looking westward, sit and wonder
Whether, when so far asunder,
They shall think how dear they are.

Past yon portals, our immortals,
Those who walk with Him in white;
Do they 'mid their bliss recall us?
Know they what events befal us?
Will our coming wake delight?

THE GOSPEL IN ITALY.

The twenty-second Evangelisation and School Report of the Evangelical Church of Italy, formerly called the Free Italian Church, is a deeply interesting narrative. In some prefatory remarks, Rev. Dr. MacDougall, of the Presbyterian Church, Florence, appeals for foreign personal help in aid of the Italian Mission: "Now that a volunteer band of students has arisen for foreign missions, I expect and pray, if the Lord sees fit, that a few of these consecrated and qualified youths may turn their thoughts to Italy, and to the relief of those who have borne so long the heat and burden of the day."

A perusal of the report impresses one with the variety and stubbornness of the obstacles which the Evangelical Church in Italy has to encounter. Not only is the Papacy ever active in its opposition, but large sections of the community seem to suffer acutely from chronic poverty and want. Yet the encouragements are many and substantial. The young teacher and evangelist of Fara-Novarese writes: "After much labour, this place begins to awaken to the Gospel. The many victories which we have gained over prejudices, and the many things, little and great, which have happened, and which could not have taken place a few years ago, make us hope for a better future. The sweet savour of Christ, which goes forth from the members of this church, in a place so full of corruption, gives intense consolation and encouragement."

There are many cases of secret adhesion to the Protestant cause. A Roman Catholic woman of Civiasco, who was present at a funeral service, was so much touched by what she saw and heard that she threw in her lot, like a heroine, with the Evangelicals, saying: "I, too, am one of these"; and she has drawn up her will, in which she declares that she is to be buried by the Evangelicals! At Rimella, a place near Varallo, the people have rejected the priest, who has gone away, and the authorities have invited Sig. Furlanetto to go there to preach the Gospel. At a lecture at Genoa, delivered by Rev. Giacomo Spigno, two students from the Papal Seminary appeared, who wished to prove by arguments that the Evangelical missions had no Divine sanction. In the presence of the assembly a discussion took place in which the students were confuted, and constrained to confess that

THE WORK WAS OF GOD.

The result was the opposite of that which they hoped to secure, for some of the hesitating, instead of being withdrawn from the work, were confirmed in their adherence to it. Better still, adds the pastor: over twenty conversions, which we believe to have been the genuine work of the Holy Spirit, have taken place within our knowledge this year.

From Milan, Pastor Damiano Borgia writes:—"A month ago a young Jesuit, who had just taken his degree at the Gregorian University of Rome, came to me saying 'that his studies had brought him to see that the Church of Rome was, out and out, the negation of the Gospel of Christ.' Of this he was convinced, and so he was resolved to lay aside the frock, and to give himself up to the Gospel. As he was a native of Valtellina, I put him into communication with my colleague at Sondrio." The pastor also tells the story of the self-sacrificing philanthropy of a member of his church, which has evoked the praise of the entire Press of the city. In order to help a man who was out of employment, Pietro Mussio, a poor porter, used his spare time selling stamps and postcards. While his heart and mind were devoted to this beneficent enterprise, he heard that Sig. Loria, a wealthy Jew, had offered to the municipality the sum of £4000 for investment in the interest of the unemployed. On account of some inconvenient conditions, the offer was refused; but Mussio sought the Jew, and, having explained a scheme of his own, asked Loria to devote his entire fortune to the undertaking. Eventually Loria promised to do this, and when he died, about a year ago, he left 10,000,000 francs (about £400,000) for the scheme on behalf of which, with much struggling, Mussio had raised 1350 francs (£54). Thus, through the initiative of an obscure young man, a Protestant in a Roman Catholic country, Milan is to be provided with an institution where work will be given to all artisans temporarily out of employment, the municipality being charged with the management of the scheme!

From Valtellina, Rev. R. Wigley writes: "Owing to two causes, first the acceptance of the Gospel, and secondly the aversion which the people had to the rites, and especially to the life of the parish priest, the whole population of the village, from the syndic and the councillors down to the most humble of the people, were on the eve of renouncing the Church of Rome and proclaiming themselves Evangelicals. Unfortunately they have not yet had the courage to take that step, although it is hoped they may yet do so." The experiences of Rev. G. B. Blasi, at Chiavenna, a stronghold of the Papacy, on the Swiss frontier, is very different. The pastor writes: "Blasphemy, intemperance, gambling, theft, and fraud, united to indolence and scepticism, seem to contaminate the very air the people breathe. It is in the midst of these abominations that we are trying to plant the faith of Christ. One's heart fails one in remembering all the contumely, insults, and attacks to which we are daily subjected for Christ's sake. At Prosto and Gordona we were nearly stoned to death five times. At San Cassiano and Prata we were ATTACKED WITH SCYTHES AND SPADES.

At Bette we were driven away by menaces and cries of 'Death to the ministers of the devil!' At other villages, and indeed wherever we show ourselves, an uproar is made against us, chiefly by the women. And what we suffer is almost nothing compared to the persecutions directed against those who join our church. Woe to those who enter it! Their parents turn them out of doors, and their masters turn them from their employment. Last year twenty-four people were thus victimised. Notwithstanding all this, our faith and courage do not fail us. We have put our hand to the plough, and we will not turn back. God is on our side. Those who have joined us are few and poor, but they are brave, and ready to give even their lives for the love of Christ. And, for myself, I am persuaded that the truth which we have sown amid such difficulties will yet, by the Holy Spirit's power and blessing, spring up and bear fruit."

Throughout the report there are evidences of peculiar generosity on the part of members of the various churches. At Leghorn 400 francs yearly is collected towards the evangelisation of Italy; the poor and sick are cared for, also the widows and orphans of the church. In populous centres, such as Rome and Naples, school and Gospel efforts proceed under difficulties, but with unflagging zeal.

OPEN-AIR MISSION.

The present summer has been a season of remarkable blessing with us. Doors of opportunity and of utterance have opened on every hand, and we have been greatly prospered. The fine weather, the quickened spiritual power of many of the men engaged, both paid and honorary, and the new monthly prayer-meetings of the Mission, have all contributed to this, and our hearts are full of praise. Funds have been supplied from day to day, sufficient but not more; we are earnestly entreating the Lord to quicken the sympathies of his people, that our income may be abundantly increased.

Far more than usual has been done in seaside work during recent months; the presence of God has been mightily felt among the workers. Brief itinerant missions were held at Whitstable, Herne Bay, Birchington, and several neighbouring resorts by Mr. Gerald Coultas. Signs followed the preaching of the Word. Mr. George Pullinger and Mr. Henry M. Wright were sent for an eight days' mission on the beach at Hastings. The Y.M.C.A. co-operated. Two services were held daily, and 5000 tracts distributed; there is reason to believe that several received definite blessing.

I have been privileged to hold a similar Mission at Bournemouth, in co-operation with the Y.M.C.A. The meetings were held from August 20 to 27—on Sundays on the sands, and on week days in the West Cliff Pines. It was most encouraging to be supported by such a large number of workers, both ladies and gentlemen, residents and visitors. Rev. George Wainwright, Rev. W. H. J. Page, Mr. R. C. Morgan, and many others spoke, and it was delightful to hear, night after night, the Gospel proclaimed with God-given fervour, simplicity and power, by these beloved brethren. Local workers have, I trust, been greatly stirred, and are making arrangements to continue the meetings on Sunday afternoons and Friday evenings. Frank Cockrem, Sec.

SOUTH AMERICA.

BY MR. CHARLES H. BRIGHT.

The time seems to have arrived for entering, in the name of the Saviour of the world, this land, so long left to the undisputed sway of the devil. Many souls are being stirred up as to its needs, its almost utter spiritual destitution. Some are exercised about one part of the field, others about another. Some are contemplating entering the interior; some are seeing in the coast their field. Some are feeling for the poor oppressed Indians; some sorrow over the helpless condition of the descendants of the Spanish conquerors, ever in terror as to the eternal future, never knowing the way of life. It is to give information to those already exercised about the need of these lands, rather than to stir up others, that a few facts are collected together in this paper.

Far-off China and India are better known amongst English-speaking people than these Spanish lands. I myself always found it very difficult to get any exact information about any part of these lands to which I was thinking of going. So I feel I may be doing a service to others if I put before them some simple things that to those not directly interested may seem very commonplace or superfluous. If it in any way clears up doubts, or lightens the anxieties, difficulties, and toils of those called to or interested in the Lord's work in these fields, I shall have my reward.

When I was living in Mexico, it was no uncommon thing to receive letters addressed "Mexico, South America," or "Mexico, United States." Therefore, just a word about some simple facts of geography, may not be amiss.

Spanish America may be divided into three distinct regions, viz., Mexico, Central America, and South America. It is only with this last, and more especially a part of this last-named portion, that we are going to occupy ourselves.

Spanish is the language of all South America, except Brazil, where Portuguese (a sister language) is spoken. Every part of it is Republican in government, and independent, except the small colonies of British, French, and Dutch Guiana. Of the interior of South America, a vast portion of the richest regions has never been clearly explored. The names of the Spanish-speaking countries are Venezuela, Colombia, Ecuador, Peru, Bolivia, Uruguay, Paraguay, Chili, and the Argentine Republic. The combined population is about nineteen millions.

Discovered by Spanish explorers, and conquered by Spanish adventurers, these countries naturally came under the Spanish Crown. The rule of Spain impoverished the countries, reduced greatly the numbers of the native population, and extirpated some tribes completely. The population of Peru when under its native rulers is estimated at ten millions; to-day the whole population is less than four millions.

With the Spanish conquerors came the Spanish priests, and thus all South America became feudatory to the Pope. Lima became the headquarters of the Inquisition in South America, and it succeeded in making itself as odious as in Spain.

About 1820 all Spanish America threw off the yoke of Spain, and abolished the Inquisition. Of late years the power of the priests has been weakened in nearly all the large towns. In Chili and in the Argentine Republic there really is liberty of worship. In Venezuela and Colombia there is liberty according to the law, but in the latter country the priests are regaining their lost influence in the Government, and have now almost full control of the education. They are able much to impede the spread of the Gospel. A few months ago a priest in the port of Tumaco caused the alcalde to seize a box of Bibles, on the plea that they were "obscene" books!

VENEZUELA.

I must restrict my remarks to those countries with which I have some personal acquaintance. During the year we were in Venezuela we enjoyed full religious liberty, but since then there has been a revolution. The present Government is supported by the priests, and it has sanctioned the return of the Jesuits, and recommended their missions to the Indians. If, when the liberal reformer, Guzman Blanco, threw open the doors to Protestant missionaries, inviting them to enter the country, and actually building a temple for Protestant worship (which was never occupied), they had only accepted the opening with zeal, oh, what might have been done! No response was made to Guzman's offer. When, at last, through the labours of unrecognised individuals, a little work was commenced in the capital, Guzman's influence was declining. The little work there continues (now in the hands of the Methodists), but outside the capital nothing has ever been attempted.

For the work of the Gospel it may be divided into three regions:—1. Caracas, the capital, altitude 3,000 feet, with a beautiful spring-like, though enervating climate, and the neighbouring towns and coast easily reached from there. The coast towns are very hot and rather unhealthy, yellow fever being common, but they present the attraction of liberality of sentiment. Maracaibo is an exception to this rule. Here the fanaticism is extreme, and, besides, it is a deadly climate for foreigners.

2. The important town of Mérida, altitude 4500 feet, with the adjacent high lands leading into Colombia, enjoying a healthy climate. This is untouched ground, but even in these little mountain towns there are printing presses and much intelligence, so that a prudent worker could easily establish a witness for Christ. From Mérida the thickly-populated districts of North-Eastern Colombia can be reached without having to descend to the coasts. It is a fine country, inhabited by a hospitable people.

3. Ciudad Bolivia, on the Orinoco, with the scattered tribes of Indians up the river, which might gradually be reached. This region is said to be healthy, though, naturally there is much chill and fever.

The people of Venezuela are a mixture of Spanish and negro, with a very little of the Indian race. The Indians here do not mix with the European race, as you see them in Mexico thronging the plazas by thousands in all the large towns on market-days. As in Nicaragua and Costa Rica, they have fled from the white man, and live retired and scattered.

is a very interesting field. With the exception of the coast, where the towns are few, it enjoys a healthy climate. The interior is, compared with other parts of South America, thickly populated. The Presbyterians have long been in Bogotá, the capital (8000 feet high), but outside of this little has yet been done. The flourishing and thickly-populated mountain valleys of the west are yet untried. In Colombia the Indians are more as they are in Mexico; that is, they mingle with the other races. In the Isthmus of Panama is found a very interesting tribe, the Caribi-cunas, who still maintain their independence. They are said to be thrifty, honest and sober. But they will not permit any man of any other race, either black or white, to live among them. They are still "pagans"—that is, they believe in one Supreme Being, and worship little idols of their own manufacture, instead of the gaudily decked "saints" imported from Spain, worshipped by all the rest of Spanish America.

ECUADOR

is completely in the power of the Pope. He who is just now affecting a liberal policy in Europe, in Ecuador still rules with the iron hand of the middle ages. The Bible is declared contraband, and not allowed to pass the Custom House. No book or paper can be published that the "Church" forbids. But there are people of liberal sentiments in some parts, and our little paper has penetrated to some of the small towns. No mission has ever attempted work in Ecuador. Its utter spiritual destitution seems all the more sad when we notice that it is, probably, the loveliest country of all South America. Fully three-fourths of it are entirely unoccupied, except by Indians, and little explored. Some people have formed such a flattering idea of the work of the Romish missions among the Indians, that they cannot conceive that as yet nothing has been done really intelligently adapted to the needs of this poor people. The following extract from the account of a recent traveller in this region throws such light on the actual condition of things amongst these races that I cannot forbear quoting it:—

"There is reason to believe that the Europeans may have made these tribes retrograde. In former times they knew how to supply their own needs, and were ingenious in work. The whites have imported the manufactures of Europe, and since then the women do not need to spin or weave, nor the men to make tools. They need only go to the river and wash out some gold wherewith to pay for the cloth, the knives, and all the trinkets with which the country has been inundated. They have lost the custom of making any intellectual eff and the whites not only have neglected to o these intelligences to more concrete ideas, but h drowned them in liquor. And has civilisation nished this infantile people with doctors to allev their sufferings, artisans to embellish their life, gineers to drain the land? Do the great ra send to these unhappy creatures honourable pers who will teach them the value of things? Noth of the kind, the white trader who goes to the N in search of fortune is generally a fugitive f society; the Indian at once becomes his victim, after being 'extortionised' and robbed for a l time, he himself at last becomes a bad man.

"Besides, the system of civilisation put practice with this poor people lacks all logic. example, they wish to force the Indians to live, in the forest, but in villages; which certainly i principle of civilised society. To accomplish object it would be necessary to establish agri tural enterprises, industries that would emp arms; to accustom these men to live in one pl they must be taught some useful trade. If t would assign to the Indian some mode of ea gaining a living, civilisation would be presented him under its most seductive aspect.

"But, unfortunately, in the east of Ecuador such proceeding has been followed. A church built, the Indians are compelled to erect huts aro this temple, and they are commanded to reside the village thus formed. In such conditions, h are they to subsist? While enjoying liberty, t lived by the chase, and, somewhat, by agricultu they have in their forest their little patch, wh they plant bananas and yuca; with their poiso arrows they kill birds and monkeys. But as s as they are formed into a mission they entirely l the products of hunting. Thus it is that these lages are uninhabited most of the time; the Indi return to the forest, and the houses that surro the church remain always abandoned. From t continual troubles result. In 1875 the houses of Panos Indians were burnt to force them to co and live in Archidona. But this brutal act, from reducing them to obedience, has made th obstinate rebels, and they have retired to the fore where the whites never will be able to reach the

"I have calculated that the cotton cloth that t give to the Indians in exchange for gold dust co them fifty-three times dearer than in the re stores in Guayaquil—that is to say, two hund and twelve times dearer than in France; and these traders hardly ever get rich, because, nearly all are drinkers and gamblers, they know h to gain, but they do not know how to save. I word, they are a dissipated class, of no use to one, and for every reason I prefer the savage them."*

The above extract may especially interest th who think of forming Christian colonies. Indians of Ecuador can be best reached from P or Colombia.

though, in general, in the same condition as countries already spoken of, has some quite disti tive features. Both as regards the formation the country, productions, language, and races, may be described in three sections.

First, we have the coast region, the barren de late strip that runs all down the country to Ch Miserable beyond expression is the aspect of t coast. Only in the valleys, that occur at inter of fifty miles, or so, is anything produced. Bu has some advantageous features. Just now, least, it is cool, for it is winter (July). There two steamers weekly up and down the coast. Th are railroads at most of the valleys connecting villages around. There is a strong liberal se ment, though the law prohibits the public exer of any religion but the Pope's. The language Spanish entirely.

The climate of Lima is said to be damp, bu never (or rarely, once in five years or so) rains this coast. Consequently in most parts it is v dry in the warmer months. During the wi months—June to October—there is a heavy dew night, and often a very fine rain, or mist, wh hangs over the city. There is very little win Lima. There have been epidemics of yellow fe at times, but the country is considered healthy.

The Peruvian people are a mixture of Spanish Indian, but the negro race has largely influen the coast population; they are now disappear t now there is a new element, of which one sees mistakable traces in the poorer people—the inese. There are a large number of these here w, and they have a firm footing. Add to these e usual sprinkling of enterprising Europeans and nericans, and you will see that the population of e coast is very heterogeneous.

* Viaje al Rio de las Amazonas, per Carlos Weiner, 18 1882.

This is the first and most accessible region, but is t that where the mass of the population is found.

Second, the Sierra, or mountain region. This mprises most of the settled part of the interior. he leading families are of Spanish descent, but the lk of the population is Indian, and speak the lan-age of their forefathers, though not in its purity. echua is said to be still comparatively pure as oken by the Indians in and around the ancient pital, Cuzco, but in the departments further rth it is mingled with other tongues. Neverthe-s, a knowledge of Quechua will serve one all rough the interior, and up the north right through uador.

The Indians of the Sierra are said to be "Chris-nised"—that is, they obey the priests, and wor-ip images of the "saints" instead of the images the sun which their forefathers worshipped; or, to more exact, other images have been added to their igion, for the sun is still retained, being held up to em, when mass is celebrated, on the custodia, the e that contains the little wafer (which is also in m of the sun). So we cannot say truly that the n worship has been abolished; it has simply been ded to. No wonder they so soon became recon-ed to the new religion!

They are much given to drunkenness, the feast ys occurring so often; they are very fanatical, ng so entirely under the control of the priests, o understand Quechua. But they are said to be peaceable race, only dangerous when drunk. A owledge of their own language would give one luence among them.

The climate of the Sierra is, generally speaking, and cold. It rains heavily during the summer nths—December to March—and is dry the rest the year. It is more or less cold, as the place y be above the level of the sea. In the deep leys it is very warm.

The third region differs from both the previous es. It is the wooded region lying on the eastern pe of the Andes. Here it rains frequently all the ar round, though the wet season is in the summer nths. This is the richest but most uncultivated ion of Peru. But it is not altogether a wild and explored region given up to savages. There are rious settled and flourishing towns, which have mmerce with the Pacific Coast and with Europe, the Amazon. But these towns are few; the ater part of the country awaits, with its riches, arrival of enterprising colonists. Some books that it is a terrible country, infested by terrible ers, wild animals, snakes, and savages. But a ent traveller of Cuzco, Peru, who visited this ion as late as 1887, says it is not so. It is a althy region; he could seldom get a sight of a d animal, and as for the "savages," he was right ongst them, travelled, ate, drank, and slept with se Indians. He says they are a kindly, willing e, but have been, and are continually being, im-ed on by covetous traders. It would be useless enumerate all these tribes, for there are so many; one department there are sixteen, all speaking a ferent language or dialect. But many of them w a little Quechua, and this may make access to m possible to some evangelist who will master t difficult tongue.

THREE ROUTES.

This region is reached by three roads. From rope or New York, easily and directly, viâ Para razil) and the river Amazon. There is regular am communication right up into Peru, to uitos and beyond to Yurimaguas. Yquitos is a mmercial town of 8000 inhabitants, where anish is spoken (indeed, in all towns Spanish is oken). Also it can be reached from Lima by ailroad, passing heights of 17,000 feet (one day), d then a few days by mule to the Huallagu or ayali river, according to the point resolved upon. ere is a third way: from the Pacific coast, viâ casmayo and Cajarmaca, where the mountains be crossed are not so high. In the department which the foregoing remarks refer, the Prefect is thorised to grant to any person who solicits it, be a foreigner or a native, land to the extent of 120 ctares (300 acres). And full title is given with-t expense or delays, the only condition being that by the end of two years at least a fifth must be under cultivation; if not, the title is forfeited. Here is a chance for Christian colonists.

Thus these three regions offer three distinct fields of labour, involving different methods of work, and calling for differently-gifted men. Thus the spiritual needs of Peru call for studious men, who are willing to devote their lives to the quiet, unobtrusive, but fundamental, work of writing and translating, and supervising the press. Men with a taste for mechanical work, to print, bind, etc. Young men for exploring, robust, and who delight in danger and hardship, who will explore with a view to the necessities of missionary settlement and work—tramp evangelists, to go all through the country with tracts and portions of Scripture, scattering them freely from house to house, and speaking, singing, and praying, as opportunity may be. I speak of the most immediate needs; besides men of the above-named gifts (all, in some sense, evangelists), there will be needed men of gift as preachers, and then as pastors of the flocks gathered.

AS TO METHODS OF WORK, experience has taught that there is some advantage in each of the helps generally used—the press, school orphan asylum, colportage. By "help" I mean things in addition to the normal and ever-necessary preaching of the Word. The question will be the adaptability of any of these helps to the special field. But too much stress cannot be laid upon the fact that the aim is not to civilise but to evangelise. The civilisation will come of itself whenever the Gospel is received. Let the aim not be to educate, but to convert. If education is used, let it be but of the most elementary kind, and simply to lead souls to come and hear the Gospel, and to read it for themselves.

But for rapid evangelisation, it has always been a mystery to me why it is that Christians do not see how much might be done by a rapid, gratuitous, and wide dissemination of papers and Scripture portions by men sustained for that purpose. A few years ago somebody employed men to go systematically through every town in the United States circulating wisely and gratuitously a costly pamphlet teaching annihilation. This work must have cost some tens of thousands of dollars. It had its effect; many minds have been poisoned by that literature, so carefully, yet freely, circulated. I have asked myself, How is it that the agents of the devil show such zeal and such common sense in spreading their doctrines, and the agents of the Lord Jesus such lukewarmness and lack of thought to adapt the means used to the end sought?

With millions of people in Spanish America, who are able to read, and who have but little literature of any kind to satisfy the newly-awakened craving for food for the soul, it seems a shame that we do not take advantage of so favourable an opportunity, and circulate the sweet and precious Gospel lavishly, by millions and millions of tracts, and sustain men for this special work.

But the tracts must be adapted for the people we have in view. Comparisons are odious, so I will not allude to any class of tracts by name, but will only say that translations of tracts written for people familiar with the Bible, and living in Protestant countries (and this includes nearly all tracts written originally in English) are not suitable. We need a special literature for these countries. How blessed it would be to be able to send men all through these lands to give away lavishly such attractive illustrated portions of the Gospel as published by Mr. Walters, of St. Paul's Churchyard, London! I do not know that he has yet been able to publish these in Spanish, but I know he desires to do so.

Many seem to think that the great way to evangelise is just to send out the Bible. But only some portions of the Bible directly deal with the state of the sinner. Moreover, I have met with Mexicans who had bought the Bible, and yet felt they needed something more—they needed it explained. We are commissioned to "preach the Gospel" to herald, that is, the glad tidings, to announce the facts of Christ's death and resurrection, but also to make known the grace offered to the repentant sinner, based on these facts. To preach by the press, then, it is not enough that we print the Scriptures; we need also, in a simple manner, and in a way especially suitable to enable a person brought up in the superstition of Rome to grasp it, to explain the nature of the Gospel and its mode of reception. We will then be imitating the apostles when they explained the Gospel to the Jewish mind in the synagogues of Asia Minor and Greece.

I have said nothing about the dress or because these things do not affect the end we have in view. But one thing might be noted. The usual dress of the women is black, with the black manta folded round the head. To anyone who has travelled in these countries, this is an infallible sign that the women are, as a class, entirely under the influence of the priests. Where colours and hats are used, the priests are losing their influence. Here we see, what is not now seen in Mexico, monks in grey and brown and black walking the streets. Their power is still great. Quite a commotion they caused in Cajamarca a few weeks ago, stirring up a number of "ladies" to assault a man on the street who had become known for his liberal sentiments.

Public preaching of the Gospel is not allowed by law, but there is nothing to hinder anyone gathering souls together in a private way in any of the principal towns. Of course, no Christian is, in conscience, bound to obey a law forbidding us to do what Christ has commanded. It is simply a question of what is the wisest course to adopt so that we be not hindered in spreading the Gospel.

Mr. Penzotti, the agent of the American Bible Society, was imprisoned eight months in Callao for preaching the Gospel. He is now at liberty, and has travelled all up the coast with the Bible, and the work commenced by him is continued by Mr. Wood, of the Methodist Mission, who came for this purpose from Monte Video. Meetings are held with closed doors, and admission is by ticket.

EXPENSES.

The capital of Venezuela is easily reached from New York or England. Fare from New York to La Guaira, fifty to eighty dollars; time ten days. From La Guaira, the capital is reached in a few hours by rail. The custom-house is none too generous.

The fare from Panama to Buenaventura, Colombia, is £5; time, two days. The Colombian custom-house only permits a passenger to pass, free of duty, one hundred kilograms (220lb.). For all excess the passenger must pay one dollar and twenty cents per kilo. (Colombian silver). Therefore, anyone going there should be careful to ship heavy articles (as books, etc.) as cargo. From Buenaventura there is a railroad up to Cordova. From thence to Cali, the first good town, the journey is made on horseback: time, three or four days.

The fare from Panama to Callao, Peru, is £20 (ninety-seven dollars). There is no second-class. Time, nine days. The "South American" Company do not charge for extra baggage. The custom-house at Callao is not unjust, and the passenger is allowed to pass any reasonable amount of baggage.

Lima is a large city, and has stores well filled with European merchandise. Indeed, in most of the principal towns of these countries, one can find all the usual necessaries of life. If anything special is desired (as an oil stove or wood stove) it had better be shipped as cargo.

There are many extra expenses which one must be prepared for. Except in a few cases where there is a pier (as in Panama and Callao), embarking and disembarking is at the passenger's own expense and risk, and is charged for at exorbitant rates. And no excuse is lost for extorting extra charges. For instance, having paid to have my baggage brought to the station at Esparto, and having paid for its transportation in the train, I thought all was arranged. Not so, I had to pay the railroad hands to put it into the car. The stationmaster informed us that the railroad did the transportation, but not the handling of goods. In Costa Rica, both on the Atlantic and the Pacific side, the Government charges one cent a pound on all baggage that passes the pier. Thus the traveller will find at every turn there are unlooked-for expenses. Therefore, to all calculations of the cost of a journey to these countries, one-fifth should be added for unforeseen expenses.

I have endeavoured to give information on all the points usually inquired about. I look for the Lord to stir up the hearts of many to a more earnest interest in the rapid spread of the Gospel through all these lands still in the darkness of idolatry, though it be an idolatry cloaked (not so very much cloaked, however) under a few Christian names and phrases.

MRS. PURDY'S PARQUISITES.

By MRS. SARAH EDWARDS HENSHAW.

One day, some time since, we were summoned to the parlour to see a visitor who had sent up neither card nor name. As we entered the room, an undersized, wiry, active, elderly, quaint-looking woman rose to greet us. We were struck at sight with the brightness of her dark, handsome eyes, and the russet redness of her thin brown cheeks. Her dress was of calico, starched and ironed to a miracle, and she wore an indescribable air of independent out-of-fashion-ness, which took our fancy at the start.

She was living on a ranch not a very great way from San Francisco. She was born in England, had come over to this country in her girlhood, had spent some years in Connecticut, had married in Pennsylvania, had tried her fortunes in the West, and had finally drifted to California—all of which we learned in the course of after conversation, and noted that her speech bore evidence of her wanderings. She stood for a moment confronting us, while she darted forth a keen look from under the great round hat which was tied down, Canada fashion, at the ears, and projected immensely fore and aft.

"Be you the woman that writes in the Pacific?"

"I take charge of a column in the Pacific, for the Woman's Board. Won't you sit down?" The interview promised to be interesting.

She dropped suddenly into her chair, and revealed, as she did so, a good-sized covered basket, which stood by her side.

"Wall, now, I am mighty glad I have found you! My old man he takes the Pacific, bein' brought up a Congregational, and I read it for my Sunday readin'—leastways your part of it partiklar, and very often permiskus, too. So I felt kind o' 'quainted with you like; and thinks I to myself, the very fust time I go to San Francisker I'll take a run over to Hoakland, and see if I can make her out."

"I am very glad to see you—very glad you like our column so well; we want all our friends to like it."

"Wall, when you fust begun that column, all about the missionaries and sich, it kind o' took me, and I determined I would do all I could to raise a little money. I've knocked 'round the world consider'ble myself, though not doin' it for the heathen—which ain't sayin' I hain't never found none; but that ain't neither here nor there. But I know by my own feelin's what it is to be in a strange country, and everything queer and homesick-like—let alone the language, which must be powerful discouragin', especially if a body's hard to learn, which I don't s'pose the missionaries is, but some on 'em may be. We live on a ranch over here a ways"—with a jerk of the head—"and my old man he's toler'ble close, and no wonder, bein' we've twict been burned out, and moved three times, and hain't no children to look arter us bimeby, and old age a comin', if we live, and our sheep dyin' off the last year or two." And she made a sudden halt, looking at us intently.

Here was evidently a warm heart—one that had learned sympathy for others by its own experience; one that was too loyal, likewise, to cast reflection on anyone else in doing its own duty.

"I dare say," we replied, seeing that a reply was expected, and not knowing very well what else to say.

"Wall," she resumed, in a tone of good-natured toleration, "I knowed he had enough to see arter, and so I determined to raise what money I could myself, and give him no trouble about it. And of course I makes my own butter. So, arter that, when I churned, I puts away a little each time in a missionary jar, which I called Mexico, and we neither on us ever missed it; and arter awhile Mexico was full of butter, and we no wus off. And bimeby I sold it, and put away the money. Says I to myself"—and a smile came into her eyes—"That's my parquisites. Everybody has parquisites in these days, and why shouldn't I?

"Which it was all the same about eggs—of course we lays our own eggs. And says I to myself, 'Now, shall I parquisite two eggs out of every dozen, or two layin' hens? which I conclude to preempt two young layin' hens, me naming 'em Japan and Turkey. And bein' lonely like out there on the ranch, and no one to talk to, I conversed with them as if they was folk. And I declare for't, I raly think they understood me; for arter I had told them two or three times they was parquisite hens, and must lay accordin', and shouldn't have no excuse about grain and gravel, 'cause I would give 'em plenty of both, them two hens went to layin' to that degree that I couldn't have done better myself; and they out-cut-ca-da-cut-ed me out to them nests that much, and that reg'lar, that it really seemed as if they had the missionary on the brain. And they laid me forty dozen of eggs, did Japan and Turkey, last year, and I got two bits a dozen for 'm all round—which was pretty good parquisiting for two hens—and the money put away with the fust—do you see?" And she came to the usual sudden stop, and waited for me to speak.

"Certainly. What wonderful hens you must have!"

"Yes, that was pretty good. And then there was my calf, which my husband bein' so keen for money, of course we doesn't eat our own calves, but sells 'em. And one of our cows she dropped a calf that was a poor puny little creatur', and the butcher he wouldn't give nothin' for it, and my husband he said it would cost more'n it would come to, to raise it; and he was for knocking it on the head, and sellin' the pelt, which I begged him ag'in it, and said I would raise it on skim milk, which wasn't good for nothin' to nobody, if he would let me have it; and he said I might if I wanted to, and was a great fool for my pains. So I took it; and the rain came on, and I went missionaryin' out to the shed every mornin' and every evenin', and hot milk to carry to it—which it a'most sucked the end of my finger off larnin' to feed—and wet my feet and slippers down into puddles, and got rained on tremenjus, and had the rheumatiz dreadful, me feelin' afraid all the time I shouldn't make nothin' of her, but determined to try. And after some months of such work she took a start.

"And the way that calf growed when it set about it beat all you ever see. And I named her 'Parquisite,' and shortened her into 'Parkie'; and she growed into a handsome heifer, and began to knob out on the forehead, and me a tellin' her how good-lookin' she was gettin', and she a lookin' at me kind o' cur'us like, as if she was a thinkin' on it over, and a runnin' after me whenever I come where she was, and a rubbin' her nose on my shoulder, and me a tellin' her how much butter she would be a givin' me bymeby, and what a stidy hincome she would be for the missionaries; and one day a man rode up to the door, and jumped down from his horse.

"Wall, my husband he took him all over the ranch, and they looked at the wheat and the vineyard, and the fruit and the stock, and they looked at Parkie a long time, and seemed to be a talkin' her over; and I was awful proud (gre't fool!), 'cause I thought they was admirin' her. Then the man he staid outside and my husband he came in, and went through the kitchen where I was, and says he, careless-like: 'I'm thinkin' of sellin' the young heifer.' 'What young heifer?' says I, never thinkin' of nothin', and, says he, kind of sharp-like, 'The calf,' and says I, jumping up, 'What, my calf?' and, says he, mighty scornful, 'Your calf! It's my calf, I'd have you know'; and then he went out to the man ag'in.

"I sot down and bust out cryin'. My husband is awful sot, when he is sot, and I knew it wasn't no use to say nothin', and I just cried like a great baby; and with tears all runnin' down, I watched the man drive away my Parkie, and she a hangin' back, and he a whippin' her—and she never struck before in 'er life. And just then my husband came in, and says he, as if he was a makin' up for all, 'You can have ten dollars of the money, if you want it'; and that made me mad. I didn't say nothin', but I just looked at him; and he didn't have no call to stay in that kitchen the rest of that day, I tell you. And I took on two or three days all by myself, and got mad every time he spoke or came a-near. And one day as I sot by the kitchen table, with my work done up and a clean apron on, he walked in and threw a ten-dollar piece into my lap, and says he, 'There is the money I promised you'; which I caught it and threw it right back at him, just as hard as I could, and it hit him and fell on the floor; and he laughed, and went out milkin'.

"By that time I had got to be awful wicked, and I sot thinking to myself about St. Paul, and how he says Sarah obeyed Abraham, calling him lord. But we get the other side of that story in the Old Testament, which it is pretty easy seen how Abraham had to give up to Sarah, and let her have her own way; and what would she have said if he had gone and sold her pet camel, I would like to know?

"Wall, the money laid on the floor three da and me a-sweepin' around it, and it seemed as couldn't tech it. Which at last I made myself and pick it up, and put it with the rest of my quisite money, and me a-blubberin' while I did And maybe it won't do no good to the missiona on account of so behavin'—which I did ask Lord's pardon for gettin' mad over it, and hope be forgiven.

"And here is the money," she said sudde producing her purse; "and I hope you won't fuse it because I acted so. And if you hav mind to make me a life-member with it, there be some to spare." And she placed in my h thirty dollars, in three shining gold pieces—fruit of much toil and self-denial. "And," she, sinking her voice, and swiftly lifting up uncovering her basket, "I want to know whet missionaries like hard-biled eggs? I have brou some down, and if you think them three l missionaries would like 'em, I want you to 'em to 'em. They'll keep, for I biled 'em my fifteen minutes by the clock. And it would ple Jap and Turkey most partiklar if they could und stand, and I shall tell 'em, and they're all I've now to talk to, butter not being alive-like, Parkie being took away. And if I should tell that their own eggs which they've cackled ove hard-biled, and sent to the lady missionaries would encourage them like, maybe. Which, if can't send 'em to heathen lands, p'r'aps the bo would like 'em—leastways the yolks, as many who won't eat the whites."

As she spoke, she rapidly emptied her basket the table near, and hurried away, leaving me gaz in a half-dazed condition at the pile of hard-boi eggs, while I unconsciously held the shining eag her generous donation, clasped closely in my ha

POETRY IN GOSPEL ADDRESSES

A verse or two, if appropriate- not forced i may prove very impressive. The recital of a l piece is not expedient. That may become a n performance. If the subject spoken of has spe reference to the emotions of a person just awaker those stirring words of Isaac Watts will be unison:—

> O Thou that hear'st when sinners cry!
> Though all my sins before Thee lie,
> Behold them not with angry look,
> But blot their memory from thy Book.

If the address has special reference to the subj of repentance, a child's hymn may teach him, w hath an ear to hear, afresh:—

> He who, repenting, turns from wrong,
> Adds joy unto the angels' song.
> He who repents, and yet doth ill,
> Hath need of true repentance still.
> For true repentance ever means
> Not merely sorrow for our sins,
> But that these sins our souls condemn,
> And turn for evermore from them.

If the subject of an empty, unprofitable life been referred to, the following may stir up the piring embers, and lead a hearer to exclaim, "G God, forbid!"

> Ah! who shall thus the Saviour meet,
> And bring but withered leaves?
> Ah! who shall at the Saviour's feet,
> Before the awful judgment-seat,
> Lay down, for golden sheaves,
> Nothing but leaves—nothing but leaves?

If the subject has had special reference to coming judgment, the address may well be clo with the following from Luther's hymn:—

> "Great God! what do I see and hear,
> The end of things created;
> The Judge of mankind doth appear,
> On clouds of glory seated.
> Low at his cross, I view the day
> When heaven and earth shall pass away,
> And thus prepare to meet Him."

And, finally, by this:—

> "Jesus, thy blood and righteousness
> My beauty are, my glorious dress;
> 'Midst flaming worlds, in these arrayed,
> With joy shall I lift up my head."

CAPE COLONY.—On the last Sabbath of July admitted thirteen to membership in the church h —four of them by baptism. We hope to see m more coming forward and confessing Christ as t Saviour. We have many discouragements in work—many are trying to serve two masters. Th say they are Christ's, but they still continue to se the gods of their fathers—they do not want to br altogether with the old heathen customs.

THE CHICAGO CAMPAIGN.

lore than half the proposed term of the six nths' Moody evangelistic campaign in Chicago expired. The daring experiment of holding a es of daily religious meetings, for three months, dozen different localities, during the busiest, est season of the year, amidst all the attrac- s, diversions and oppositions of the great Colum- Exposition, and at enormous expense, has ified itself. The predicted defeat and failure e been averted by a magnificent success. The and love and unconquerable energy of Mr. dy and his staff have been divinely vindicated. rom a comparatively small beginning the work swept out into a wide compass, embracing as res of operation about ten churches, seven halls, theatres, and five tents, which are moved from strategic point to another as occasion requires. north, the west, and the south sides of the have been reached in a succession of powerful effective services. From 200 to 300 Christian kers have been engaged in the campaign, under capable leadership of evangelists and Gospel ers of wide reputation, among whom are Major W. Whittle, Rev. R. A. Torrey, Revs. Jno. Neill and J. M. Scroggie, of Scotland, Ferd. verea, Mr. Merton Smith, Mr. F. T. Pierson, s. D. B. Towner, F. H. Jacobs, and J. H. ke, Mrs. F. T. Pierson, and others, with Mr. dy at the head, and all under the auspices of Chicago Evangelisation Society.

n aggregate of about 120 Gospel services, exclu- of meetings for prayer and counsel, have been weekly, fifteen on week days and from twenty- to thirty on Sundays. As many as from 00 to 40,000 persons have been reached with Gospel in song and sermon on a single Sunday ese evangelistic forces. In several cases all- ervices have been held in tents, with an attend- and interest simply amazing. The great Hay- et Theatre, with a seating capacity of over , was packed on a Sunday with over 3000 le, with an overflow so large as to fill the ire Theatre opposite with over 2000, while fully nore failed to gain admittance.

Forepaugh's mammoth circus tent from 0 to 20,000 people heard the Gospel from Mr. y and his singers, in a service that was simply ue in its impressiveness and power, and orable for ever to many who were unused to the uip of God.

e readiness and even eagerness of non-church- people, many of them of the worst character, sten to live, stirring, warm-hearted Gospel hing and singing, in the face of all the rful counter-attractions and opposition of a ed, Sabbath-breaking city, and in spite of essive heat and discomfort, is to many Chris- people and pastors a startling and humiliating ation.

e third month of the campaign has been ed upon with gratitude for past success, and expectation of coming triumphs for the el of Christ. Every soul rescued from sin, and believer quickened into new life and activity gh these meetings, is regarded by faith as a and promise of still larger results to come.

believe this is the best day Chicago has ever said Mr. Moody in his last memorable ser- in the Empire Theatre. "Before the World's loses, we shall have great blessing. Think of eople from these meetings carrying the sacred into all places where they go. Now let us ians ourselves be quickened and filled with the Spirit, that we may be ready for our God- opportunity to do our part in this great work. Church of God would only wake up, we should the greatest revival the world has ever seen."

another occasion Mr. Moody said: "We are to win this battle if we hold on long enough. k I have not seen anything in America that been more encouraging than the work in go in the last three months. I believe we see signs and wonders in these days. It as if there is a wave of salvation about to ver this land."

e of the most remarkable facts of this religious ment is that it has enlisted the sympathies of ian people in all parts of the world. Letters legrams convey their assurances of interest, ten also substantial material help to support nterprise. And, better than all else, there is ceasing volume of united prayer going up to behalf of the work from thousands in the Old World and the New. A number of churches and great Christian conferences have made it the subject of special united supplication. Surely the united prayers of thousands are being answered in these days, the Spirit of God is resting in power upon the evangelist and his co-workers, and the salvation of the Lord is being revealed.

H. B. Hartzler.

80, Institute Place, Chicago, August 10.

In a communication to the Chicago Interior, Mr. Hartzler writes:—A new sensation has been experienced in the neighbourhood of the notorious Haymarket, where once a band of policemen were torn to pieces by the dynamite bombs of the Anarchists. Soon after the opening of his campaign Mr. Moody tried repeatedly to secure one or more of the theatres in that stronghold of vice and crime, to hold religious services, but money could not buy the privilege. The theatres expected to reap a golden harvest from Sunday performances during the World's Fair season. It was taken for granted that their greatest opportunity had come, and it must be improved. But to the amazement of the managers the expected throngs failed to appear, and they were compelled to close, while eager multitudes crowded to hear the preaching of the Gospel by Mr. Moody and his associates.

Both the Haymarket and the Empire theatres are now, and have been for weeks, occupied by the Moody forces, and the latter has been leased for daily use, about a dozen religious services being held there each week. A mission has also been planted in the heart of that sin-blasted district, in a building known as Institute Hall. The leaven of the Gospel has been fairly introduced into the corrupt and corrupting mass, and it is working in the usual way of power unto transformation and salvation.

The attempt thus to gather congregations for religious services in those great theatres, in the midst of a very hell of saloons and vile resorts of all kinds, was at first regarded by many as a daring, if not a foolhardy, experiment. But faith and love dared to go forward where to sight all was dark, and, as usual, God vindicated and honoured the faith He had inspired. The experiment is successful. Thousands upon thousands of people, unused to song and prayer and Gospel preaching, have in those places been brought under the gracious influences of the Word and Spirit of God, and many are to-day in the way of a new life in Christ Jesus.

It was inspiring and almost startling to see how God rebuked the fears of the faint-hearted that the people would not go to religious services in the theatres. By hundreds and thousands men and women of all classes and conditions, with a large proportion of the wicked and the vile, came thronging into the great buildings, until all seats and available standing-room were occupied, while a human overflow of hundreds filled the streets. And this has been repeated day by day ever since. God Himself has signally honoured the faithful testimony of his servants. The Gospel in preaching and song has been with power. Abandoned sinners have been convicted and converted, and lukewarm, backslidden Christians have been restored and renewed. In the Empire Theatre daily evening services are now being held, with two afternoon meetings for women only, and three mass meetings on Sundays. The necessary expenses of rent and advertising are about 500 dols. a week, partly provided for by freewill offerings of the congregations.

The impression made by the services on those from non-Christian lands may be seen from the following note, addressed to Mr. Moody, which is a sample of many daily received in his office. The writer says:—

"Dear Mr. Moody,—Please send me twelve tickets to your meeting in the Haymarket Theatre, on next Sunday morning, for a company of Japanese gentlemen, representing their country at the Columbian Exposition. They say they greatly desire to attend the services. They would be pleased to have seats together."

THE DEFEAT OF SUNDAY OPENING.

In a brief article in Our Day for August, Rev. Wilbur F. Crafts rings out a joyful peal of thanksgiving for the satisfactory ending of the Sunday opening struggle at the World's Fair. After reciting the successive steps taken by the promoters of a quiet and holy Sabbath, he says:—

"A victory greater than all before it was the demonstration, beyond the fears of pessimists and beyond the hopes of optimists, that the American people have a deep regard for the Sabbath: a demonstration made by the failure of Sunday opening, through the covering of three-fourths of the exhibits by the rich, the staying away on the Sabbath of three-fourths of the poor that were expected, and of Christian people generally on week-days, also in order to defend the Sabbath. The last victory was the vote of the Directory by twenty-four to four to rescind the Sunday opening rule. . . Although at this writing there has been no suspension of the injunction issued by Judge Stein, we have no fear of Sunday opening with Congress about to meet, and liable to collect from the gate-fees the value of the forfeited souvenirs, if Congress or its constituency should be offended by another breach of faith.

"Let honourable men, friends of the day of rest and worship, thank God and take courage. Twice we have seen the power of Christian public sentiment, expressed by letters and petitions, and otherwise, securing action and non-action of Congress on this matter. Later, Christian sentiment caused the prosecution of the directors, which was reluctantly undertaken by the administration. And in Chicago both Commission and Directory have been constrained at last to right action by the same Christian public sentiment."

ON THE LEBANON.

Mr. Theophilus Waldmeier, of the Friends' Syrian Mission, writes: "I am writing these lines up in the new house, and from here I am overlooking the village of Brumana; and, comparing the present improved view of the houses with that of 1874, when we began the mission here, we cannot but be pleased with the improvement of the whole village in respect to its outward appearance. As this place is improved in its secular condition, so it is also greatly bettered in religious respects. The Greeks have learned that there is no salvation but through faith in Jesus Christ, our common Lord, and are quite aware that He is the Heart of all the living Churches; only the Maronite Church, which is dead, claims the Pope to be its head. The Druses are very friendly towards the mission, and are doing what they can to protect and favour it in every respect, saying, if their Saviour from China does not appear within the end of the nineteenth century they will become Protestants. But the whole population agrees that God has sent the Friends' Mission to Brumana. They say, "This mission has done more good during its short existence than all the bishops and priests have done here throughout the course of the past thousand years.'

"From this house I can see Beit Mary, Ras el Metn, Arsoon, Saleema, and the first houses of Bzibdeen. In all these places we have schools through which we can bring the light of the Gospel into the villages, and in Beit Mary, Mansourieh, Ras el Metn, and, of course, in Brumana meeting-house, we have regular meetings for worship, and some of them are very well attended. When I remember the beginning of this mission, how hard it was to open a meeting for worship at Brumana, I am now astonished to see that this can be done without trouble and opposition. I remember how I was obliged to ask, beg, and flatter the people to allow me to open a school for their children; and now I have a number of applications for opening new schools in different villages before me, but I am sorry to say we have not means enough to comply with these petitions. The population were afraid of us at the beginning, and now they have opened their hearts, villages, and houses, to all those who come from Ain Salaam. For this we must feel encouraged and thankful. Of course, we must not forget that the dear doctor is riding on his horse from village to village, to do good to the poor sick people, and I think there are few souls of the 66,000 of the inhabitants of this district of Metn who have not come under the notice of the doctor of Ain Salaam, saying nothing for all the other districts, from which he had many patients also. This, of course, makes the people thankful, and they begin to meditate on the power which induces him to do them so much good, and it is not very difficult for them to think that he who does so much good must necessarily have a good religion in his heart."

The entire communication is given in a very interesting "Occasional Paper," dated July, copies of which may be had on application to Isaac Sharp, 12, Bishopsgate Without, E.C.

African Missions Visited.—11.

BY D. A. HUNTER.

In my last letter I told of our expectation to pass through a German mission station on the evening on which I wrote. We duly reached the station and could see the influence of Christian teaching on the natives, their homes, and surroundings. Unfortunately the missionary was away at a conference in the Spelonken, so I was unable to get much information. The same applies to the next German station we passed through a few days later. However, we are following the missionaries up, and hope to see them either in conference with their brethren, or to meet them on their homeward way.

Some miles further on we visited a native kraal where works a Zulu, who has an interesting history, if the facts related to me be correct. It has probably already been told in print, but will bear repeating.

Some years ago, when a boy working in Kimberley, he engaged as cook with two Englishmen, who were going into the interior to shoot big game. These men both fell sick, and one died. When the second also found himself drawing near to death, he called this boy and said to him: "I am going to die, but I do not fear death, for I am a Christian. Put your hand over my heart, and promise me you will be a Christian too." The boy obeyed, and watched by his master far into the night until the end; and he dates his conversion to that time.

Returning to Kimberley he received instruction, and worked under the Dutch Reformed Church as a native evangelist. He next accompanied a gentleman on a missionary tour, and was left at this kraal we visited, where he is now working under the Cape General Mission. We did not see him, as he is at present on furlough, visiting his home and friends in Natal; but we saw the wagon in which he travels around the country, and I photographed the native girl, one of his own converts, who is to become his wife.

On Friday evening we outspanned near a native location, and were not allowed to forget the fact all night long. It was full moon, and they were holding a dance and performing heathen rites, which are commonly practised by the natives here. The drunkenness and immorality which accompany these dances is terrible to think of. Our boys told us they dare not go near the kraal on such an occasion, for they would not be allowed to leave it alive.

Over Sunday we camped near the largest native location I have yet seen. There is a range of picturesque hills, or "koppies," as they are called, rising out of the plain, and round the base of these are clustered the native kraals. Here a youth, Voltien Makapan, is chief. He is probably twenty years old or thereabouts, and still unmarried.

I went over and visited some of the kraals on Sunday forenoon, and inquired for the native teacher, but he was away preaching at a distance. Many of the glimpses of native life were most interesting, but the tumbledown appearance of the little church indicated little interest in Christianity, and one could see how sadly mission work is needed.

We went over on Monday morning with our cameras, and this time found the native teacher. He could speak English fairly well, and from him I learned that he had gone from there years ago to work in Port Elizabeth. He there became a Christian, and married a girl from the Lovedale Institute. They now teach in his home, and work for the Master, but find it very uphill work. The people are so taken up with their dances and other heathen customs, they do not care to have their children learn, and the children may not go to school without the consent of their parents. We saw a lot of the boys being taught the heathen dance, while a group were stoning a dog to death upon the hillside in a most barbarous fashion, and revelling in the poor brute's agonising cries.

Returning to my wagon, we met the young chief riding with one of his men. The chief speaks neither English nor Dutch, but his companion spoke English well. We suggested to him that he should encourage the school, but he replied that he could not do much. His people did not want it, and as he had no children to send he could not set them an example. After some talk, he said he would be glad if we could call at his kraal on our return journey.

So far as I can make out, he does not want any white missionary, but only the native teacher now there, and the Zulu, whose story I have told above, and who has preached occasionally to his people. It is, however, difficult to get at the exact facts when one has to speak through an interpreter; but if we pass anywhere near on our southward journey, I shall accept his invitation, and see what can be done to help on the school and preaching work in so large a centre of native life.

A CHINESE MAN OF BUSINESS.

Mr. Mao, the first Christian of T'ungkeo (a village lately visited), is a man of meek disposition. Before his conversion he smoked opium, and both sold and drank wine. Since professing to be a Christian, however, all these habits have disappeared, and he has made decided progress in spiritual things. He brings Christianity into his every-day life; consequently, although naturally a quiet man, he exercises a great influence, and is respected for his uprightness by all in the village. He trades chiefly in cloth, but sometimes sells bedding, bed-covers, bedcurtains, etc., and visits some of the markets within a few miles of T'ungkeo.

On one occasion, some two years ago, he bought a pair of bedcurtains at Tu-san for taels 0.45. After returning home he took them with other things to the market at Tang-kung, fifteen li from T'ungkeo. He sold them that day for taels 1.00 on trust; but the man who bought them, after keeping them for two months, returned them again, saying his wife would not let him have them. Some men of the same trade, and who have their stalls close to Mr. Mao's, persuaded him not to take back the curtains, saying, "You surely won't take them back! Get the money for them." Mr. Mao answered, "No, if he does not want them, I shall take them back, as it would only mean a row to insist upon having the money." He thereupon took back the curtains, and the man was so pleased and surprised at getting rid of them so easily that he continued bowing to brother Mao for quite a long time, as the custom is that when once a bargain is struck for anything, the money is to be had, whether by fair means or foul. Mr. Mao's fellow-tradesmen, upon seeing this, remarked, "You Christians are very weak persons—afraid of such a man as this." A few days afterwards was market-day at T'ungkeo, and the curtains were again displayed upon Mr. Mao's stall. During the day a man, well known to Mr. Mao, bargained for them for about taels 1.10. He took them, promising to bring the money next market-day. When that day arrived the man appeared, but instead of bringing the money, he also had brought back the curtains. He sidled up to Mr. Mao's stall, and commenced to talk about the weather, trade, and everything else but the curtains, being afraid to speak of them, knowing that ordinarily the mere mentioning of the subject would bring down a torrent of abuse upon himself. After a long time, Mr. Mao said, "Have you brought back the curtains? Don't you want them?" The man then explained that he had no money to pay for them, and would be grateful if Mr. Mao would take them back again. "But you won't take them back, will you?" chimed in his companions. "If the man has no money to pay for them, what am I to do?" asked Mr. Mao. "He bought them—make him pay for them," they answered. "But if he has no money he cannot pay for them," said Mr. Mao, "and as we Christians do not believe in quarrelling, I shall take them back again." "Well, you 'Jesus religion' people have no strength whatever," said they. "Last market day, at Tang-kung, you made good profit on them, and to-day the same, and both times the persons have brought them back, and you just take them without saying a word. You will never make a living in this way."

About a week after this Mr. Mao and the other cloth-sellers went to the market at Ta-t'ang, fifty li from T'ungkeo, Mr. Mao still being in possession of those unfortunate bed curtains, which were fastened on the outside of his load. Upon reaching Ta-t'ang, and before they had time to unfasten their goods, a man came up and began to examine the curtains, saying he wanted to buy a pair. Mr. Mao requested him to wait until they had taken some breakfast, but the man, who was in a hurry, paid down taels.1.30, and took the curtains. Mr. Mao's companions were looking on all this time with much astonishment, and when he had preached to them on patience and trust in God, they co only say, "Your God does certainly help and prot you when you trust Him." The curtains were one topic of conversation all the way home the n day, and about all his companions could say "The God of the 'Jesus religion' does h those who worship Him," and "if it had been we would have abused the men who brought th back, and perhaps have lost both curtains money."

THOUGHTS AT SWANAGE.

I found a deserted garden,
Though the blossoms were passing fair,
And the bramble and myrtle together
Were entwined in a tangle there.
Then I thought of the Garden of Eden
Where roamed the happy pair,
But where sin and sorrow together
Had wrought such a tangle there.

I found most beautiful colours
In the sea beneath my feet;
And the rocks and the foam intermingled
Made up a picture complete.
Then I thought of the colours in heaven,
And the rainbow around the Throne,
And of Him who sat upon it,
Like a jasper and sardine stone.

I found most delicate seaweed
Strewn on the beach around,
And the pearly and fragile sea-shells
Lay on the sandy ground;
And I thought of the beach where Jesus
Went on his lonely way,
But where Simon and Andrew his brother
Were blessed for ever and aye.

I found the sea-birds whirling
In their flight so strong and free,
Their white wings flashing and gleaming
As they dipped in the azure sea.
And I thought of the Psalmist David,
And his plaintive song of love,
As he yearned to rise to his Father
On the strong bright wings of a dove.

I found a view so entrancing,
That I gazed and I gazed again.
No words can describe the beauty
Of the sea and the skies aflame.
And I thought of the sea of crystal
Mingled with fire above,
And of them that had gotten the victory
Singing their songs of love.

I found a stretch of greensward,
Bounded by forest trees;
The grand white clouds sailed o'er me,
Driven fast before the breeze.
Then I thought of the grass where Jesus
Made the people rest that day,
As He blessed the loaves and fishes,
By the disciples given away.

I found the sweet wild flowers
In rich luxuriance grew,
Butterflies basked upon them
Of every form and hue.
And I thought of the mount where Jesus
Pointed across the fields,
Bright with the hues of the lilies
Which that Eastern country yields.

I found the cattle browsing
On the hill above the vale,
While the shepherd gently tended
His sheep in distant dale.
Then I thought of the Heavenly Shepherd
Laying down his life for his sheep,
And his promise, his faithful promise,
For ever his own to keep.

I found most fragrant perfume
Borne on the sweet fresh air,
While the chime of the distant joy-bells
Spoke of a bride so fair.
Then I thought of the Bridegroom coming
To meet his bride in the air,
And his joy when He shows his redeemed o
The place He had gone to prepare.

I found the sea most peaceful,
On its breast rocked the boats of toil,
And the lap of the waves at even Tossed the weed on the sandy soil.

Then I thought of the Sea Tiberias
In the misty light of morn,
Where Jesus met the toilers,
Cast down, perplexed, forlorn.

I found a sky of glory,
Of purple and grey and gold,
And the beauteous sun, declining,
Lit the cliffs in their outlines bold.
And I thought of the sun Christ Jesus,
Who illumined this earth for me,
And who caused the rays of righteousness
To light up the cursèd tree.

I found a church where the Saviour
Is offered to all who will,
And where hymns to the praise of Jesus
Swelled with triumphant thrill.
Then I thought of the Church in glory:
At his feet they prostrate fall;
Their head is Christ, Lord Jesus,
Who filleth all in all.

I found a happy Sunday,
And it filled my heart with rest;
God's wondrous glories touched me:
Praise! praise! to Him most bless'd.
For it made me think of that Sabbath
That awaits his saints above,
Where Jesus reigns in glory,
And we see that God is Love. A. E.

WORK IN NORTH LONDON.

The North London Gospel Samaritan Mission is g a useful and much-needed work. Founded in expressly to assist in reaching the poorer inhabi- of Upper Holloway, it has yearly developed in ilness. At the Mission House, Grove-road, el services, prayer meetings, Bible classes, ren's services, Dorcas and mothers' meetings, are conducted, and are proving fruitful sources iessing. Several young people having been ght to Christ at the meetings, a branch of the tian Endeavour Society has recently been ed. The Sunday evening evangelistic services, cted by Mr. Henry Bird in the Holloway Hall, been greatly blessed: believers have been kened, backsliders restored, and the unsaved led e Saviour. Several open-air meetings are held y, some of which are largely attended, that on ay evening being specially owned of God.

n important feature in the work is the pro- nce given to house visitation, in which two rs, supported by the Mission, are wholly en- d. By visiting the homes of the poor, minister- o the spiritual and bodily needs of the sick and g, and with practical sympathy and love seeking tract the godless and indifferent to the Lord s, they are reaching those whom the ordinary ces fail to touch. A sick woman was visited ne of the sisters. She was found in a dying ition, and "without Christ." The Saviour was nted in all his ability and willingness to save, Holy Spirit blessing the message to her salvation. lingered but a few weeks.

E GROWTH OF THE TEMPERANCE MOVEMENT

e Congregational churches of Great Britain is n by statistics published in connection with the ninational Total Abstinence Association. In nd it appears that all the ministers are total iners; in Scotland 95 per cent. of the pastors all the theological students; while with the gelical Union section there are no exceptions r among the pastors or the students. In nd and Wales the proportion is not so large. f 2725 ministers nearly 2100 are abstainers, ut of 381 students 352 are thus enrolled.

GLASGOW GREEN EVANGELISM.

I spent Sunday afternoon and evening on Glasgow Green, crowded by tens of thousands of people lounging about on the grass or gathered in knots listening to noisy harangues, or more frequently to debates on various matters. The most casual observer could not, however, fail to notice amongst these little groups clustered here and there, three assemblages of larger dimensions. Clearly at these points the attraction, whatever it might be, was more potent than that presented by the discussion of socialistic, sceptical, anti-vaccination, and other theories propounded in the scattered circles. Making my way to these great gatherings—one of which must have numbered several thousands—I found that in each case the attraction was the Gospel.

The first I joined, beyond the Nelson Monument, was listening quietly to a keen and clever exposé of the errors and treacheries of Rome and particularly of the unscriptural character of priestcraft. A few years ago such open-air defenders of Protestant truth were almost torn in pieces—for the Irish swarm in the vicinity of the Saltmarket; now a fair hearing has been gained.

Passing on to the second great meeting (in Jail-square) which had caught my eye, I found it was being held by the workers from the Tent Hall of the Glasgow United Evangelistic Association. The singing was admirable, the speaking clear and faithful, while among the dense crowd earnest men and women were quietly pushing their way, distributing Gospel leaflets and inviting the hearers to the evangelistic meeting about to be held in the wooden tent.

Determined to find what was the attraction at the third gathering I had noticed, I left this company and hurried on to the foot of Greenhill-street, where thousands stood round a fine choir and body of preachers, which proved to be from Trinity Free Church (Mr. Mackay's). If the closing address was a fair type of what had gone before—as doubtless it was—then one could not but thank God that so many had listened to words so full of Gospel power. The meeting concluded with the unexpected announcement that "Gipsy" Smith was beginning a special mission in the adjoining Church (Trinity), and all were urged to come and hear the gipsy tell of God's saving love. Crowds turned their steps towards the building, and within a few minutes the church was packed. I remained but a little while, being anxious to get to another service. It was long enough, however, to see that the audience was large and the preacher in splendid voice and spirits.

Ere I reached the wooden tent, in the Saltmarket, the service had begun, and Mr. William Clyde had plunged into his subject, Sin making man afraid of God (Gen. iii. 10). As the preacher enlarged on his theme, many seemed cut to the heart; two men close by me were every now and then wiping the tears trickling from their eyes. One poor woman, shawl over her head and barefooted, just behind me, seemed to listen as if her life depended on it, and while Mr. Clyde portrayed the misery of sin's reaping, she groaned deeply and burst into tears. Somehow, I felt there was great power in the place; and the after meeting showed that it was so. God's blessing manifestly rested on the words spoken and the Gospel sung—for two young ladies sang admirably sweet solos.

These few notes of observations will stir many to prayer that God may strengthen such workers and give great power with the Word declared amongst tens of thousands bent only on pleasure and self-seeking.

To the above I may add that at Monday's noon prayer meeting in the Christian Institute, Mr. Mackay, the earnest minister of Trinity, reported great blessing at Gipsy Smith's meeting. All over the church, he stated, men and women were weeping, and at the close a number passed into the inquiry room and not a few professed decision for Christ.

In the noon prayer gathering delightful details were also given of a remarkable day at Shepperton on the preceding Sabbath, where, I gathered, Richard Weaver's two sons opened a mission, and at all three services sinners were convicted and some professed conversion. The speaker at the noon meeting said that "In all my twenty-four years' experience of evangelistic work, I have never witnessed such blessing and seen so many cut to the heart." Mr. William Grove is also evangelising in this city, while at the Mizpah Hall Mr. R. Maclean is having grand gatherings.

A MISSIONARY FAREWELL.

It is an excellent custom in the church at West Norwood, of which Mr. Fuller Gooch is pastor, to have a congregational missionary meeting on the first Monday of each month. Last Monday's meeting was one of very deep and special interest. It was a valedictory to five missionaries who sail in two weeks for China, to engage in work in connection with the Inland Mission.

Few living men have been honoured to do so much for Chinese missions as our beloved friend and brother, Mr. Benjamin Broomhall, the secretary of the Inland Mission. As our readers will recollect, he has not only contributed lifelong personal service and advocacy to the work, but has already given four of his children—two sons and two daughters—to labour in the vast field. That is a form of consecration which means much, and implies very real self-denial; though it has its blessed compensations. In the outgoing party are Mr. Hudson Broomhall and Miss Gertrude Broomhall, both of whom have seen service in the field, and are now returning, after a season of furlough at home, to the lifework of their choice. Mrs. Hudson Broomhall, who was an earnest and effective worker as Miss Miles, returns with her husband. The remaining two of the party are Miss Grace Brown, daughter of Pastor A. G. Brown, of Bow, and Miss Moore, a member of Mr. Brown's church.

The proceedings of Monday evening were most impressive and pathetic. Pastor Gooch, who presided over a large company, having spoken some warm introductory words, Mr. Broomhall, sen., unfolded in brief the overwhelming spiritual needs of the great Chinese empire, and told something of what has been done in recent years to meet that need; especially referring to the work of the Inland Mission, which has now 437 workers in fourteen provinces, besides some hundred odd affiliated missionaries attached to other societies. Mr. Broomhall's summing up of the whole matter was this—that as yet there has been next to nothing done by the Christian churches to meet the needs of China, not to speak of the needs of the great heathen world. He quoted the very expressive simile of an Indian convert that "the Gospel is the only quinine for the fever of the human heart"; how great then is the call on those who have experienced its power to give this grand specific to those who suffer in darkness and ignorance. Mr. Broomhall commented tellingly on the wrongs that Great Britain has done to China in past years through the opium traffic; he said that Mr. Hudson Taylor and himself will likely be called on to give evidence before the Opium Commission.

The addresses by the five outgoing friends were of such deep interest as to hold the close attention of the meeting. Miss Brown spoke joyfully of the prospect before her, and, like all the others, entreated earnest prayer on their behalf from the stay-at-homes. Mr. Hudson Broomhall translated and read a charming Chinese letter to his wife received that day from a native pastor, who had been at one time a Buddhist priest. He was converted through the study of the New Testament, and is now an able pastor of a native church of a hundred members and as many inquirers. Mr. Broomhall said that he and his wife had been assigned to the charge of the Mission Home at Hankow, where they would be able to render service to workers coming and going to and from distant stations.

Mrs. Hudson Broomhall, having given some encouraging experiences of work in Shansi, mainly as recollections of this native pastor, with whom she had worked, Miss Gertrude Broomhall spoke of the necessity of the workers backing up their testimony by a consistent life, if they would influence those among whom they laboured. The utter hopelessness of heathendom without Christ was vividly pictured, and all was made the basis for an earnest appeal to the home Christians to uphold the missionaries in bands of faith and prayer. Miss Moore added a few simple but touching words as to her own call to the foreign field, where she hopes to work chiefly in nursing the sick and ministering to them the words of this life.

The outgoing party will be further farewelled at meetings in Pastor Brown's East London Tabernacle on Monday evening, and at Highgate-road Chapel, on Wednesday evening, September 20. On Thursday, 21st, they sail for China.

HELPING FOREIGN MISSIONS.

Dear Sir,—I was pleased to see in your issue for August 17 some reference to efforts that are being put forth by my good friend Mr. Nath. Northey, of N. Malvern, and others, for the advancement of the Redeemer's Kingdom in foreign lands. Mr. Northey doubtless is insisting on a great, though oft forgotten, truth, viz., that our souls and our bodies and our means are all alike the Lord's. If I understand my friend aright, the object of the meeting at Malvern was to deepen a sense of this truth in the hearts of Christian people, and to devise plans whereby those who are not able to go abroad may, to the best advantage, utilise their spare time or money for carrying out the Saviour's commission to his disciples.

With present-day concern about the untold millions who pass over into eternity every year without having even heard of a Saviour, willingness to help would, if wisely directed, lead to astonishing results. My friends at Malvern have already sent me as a practical beginning a handsome sum towards helping my mission. I pray that wisdom and grace may be granted to them, and that their example and efforts may influence many to work and pray in the spirit of Mr. Northey's proposals.—Yours faithfully,

Oscar Michelsen.

"A PERFECTIONIST SNARE."

Sir,—Your able correspondent, Mr. Thomas N. Neatby, is "dismayed" to find Mr. Thomas Cook maintains a doctrine of "intention" which reminds him of the Jesuit doctrine, so skilfully ridiculed by Pascal. Not that the doctrines are identical, or even similar; for, as Mr. Neatby is well aware, they are entirely different, and as a matter of fact, opposed to one another. Only to put the matter in that striking way may serve a very useful controversial purpose.

He asks, "Is Christian perfection nothing but sincerity of intention?" adding, "If so, very many wicked men, including Saul of Tarsus, must have been Christianly perfect." The answer is: (1) There can certainly be no Christian perfection without "sincerity of intention," or, as Mr. Cook expresses it, "a sincere aim in eveything I do to please God." Looked at from one point of view, this is indeed "the sum and substance of Christian perfection." But, of course, looked at from a different point of view and in a more comprehensive way, it includes much more, as Mr. Cook is careful to explain in his tract. Christian perfection, I may say, is not the perfection of an unfallen creature; not the perfection of the resurrection life; not perfection in knowledge, wisdom, or power; not the absence of the liability to sin; but simply the perfection of love, including, of course, "sincerity of intention." (2) Mr. Neatby also thinks that if Christian perfection is "nothing but sincerity of intention," it follows that many very wicked men, including Saul of Tarsus, must have been Christianly perfect." To my mind, if that were the case, which is denied, it would not follow. How Saul the persecutor could be a "perfect Christian" before he was converted Mr. Neatby must please explain. Why, some "imperfectionists" whom I know contend that he never became a perfect Christian; such an attainment, according to them, being absolutely impossible.

One thing is certain: those who believe in Christian or Scriptural perfection, as contradistinguished from "perfectionism" (properly so-called) and "ultra-holiness teachers," do not lower the standard of God's requirements. In fact, we are continually being charged with raising the standard too high. However, all we contend for and insist upon is that we should love God with all our hearts, our neighbours as ourselves, and our fellow-Christians, whether perfectionists, imperfectionists, or advocates of Scriptural holiness, with a pure heart, fervently. And whoever may oppose, we must strenuously contend that our Heavenly Father does not require his adopted children to be or to do more than by his all-sufficient grace is possible (Eph. iii. 20-1).—Yours faithfully,

Charles Garnett.

[We have received other letters on this subject, for which we have not space. Mr. Garnett's letter has, we understand, the imprimatur of Mr. Thomas Cook.]

THE INCREASING DIFFICULTIES of obtaining new licences is shown by one case that is reported, in which a firm of brewers surrendered six beerhouse licences in order to secure one full licence, and by other instances in which similar offers, to a lesser extent, have been refused. Opposed licences have gone over, of course, to the adjourned sessions, which will probably afford renewed points of interest to the careful observer.

POPERY IN CANADA.

A story of religious persecution is told in the Montreal Witness which shows in vivid colours the undying spirit of intolerance that attaches to Romanism, where it is not fettered by public opinion:—

The power of public bigotry and religious fanaticism to operate a miscarriage of justice was most strikingly exemplified on August 16, in the prosecution of J. Gendreau by the city of Sorel, Que. The defendant is charged with having, on August 5, "disturbed the public peace by provoking, making, or causing useless, illegal, and unbecoming discussions, shouting, vociferating, insulting wayfarers or persons in the streets and public places, disturbing and incommoding passers-by, and causing disorder and assemblages, contrary to municipal police by-laws, and against the provisions of the statute in such case made and provided."

In proof of this charge six witnesses were examined. These witnesses all testified to the fact that Mr. Gendreau was sitting on a bench in the public park; that he was surrounded by a party of thirty to forty persons, who were putting questions to him on religious subjects. This crowd had collected around Mr. Gendreau unsolicited by him. They saw him sitting on the bench and stopped of their own accord to ask their questions. These same witnesses proved that when the crowd had reached the above number Mr. Gendreau remarked that he had better go away, to which some of those present replied that it would be better for him. Gendreau then left, followed by the shouts and insults of the assemblage. One witness called for the prosecution testified that Gendreau was talking quietly and politely to one of the party when others began to insult him, whereupon the defendant went away, as sworn to by the other witnesses.

Mr. Gendreau was arrested on the charge above stated, and on August 16 was convicted and fined 5dols. and costs in all 19.55dols., in addition to his own costs in the case. Recorder Dorion, of Sorel, in delivering judgment, said Gendreau was the sole cause of this gathering. Religion was altogether too much discussed, and a stop must be put to it.

It may be stated that the Protestant Mission at Sorel has had immense difficulties to contend with in the prosecution of their work. The present work was begun in May, 1892, and ever since that time the missionaries have been subject to the insults of the people and the anathemas of the local clergy. Crowds assemble around the Protestant meeting-house and shout and create disturbances unchecked by the authorities. Sunday after Sunday the ministers in charge of the work are denounced from the pulpit of the Roman Catholic Church.

Notwithstanding the great difficulties they have to contend with, Rev. Mr. Cote and Rev. Mr. Burwash report splendid meetings at their hall. The meeting hall is packed to overflowing every Sunday evening. Large numbers are deterred from attending, owing to the denunciation of the local Roman Catholic clergy. A number of conversions are being made, and the pastors express their determination to push forward the good work and hope yet to see their efforts crowned with great success.

THE Y.M.C.A.

An Association has been formed for Waterfoot and district, near Manchester.

The membership of the Ipswich Association has increased from 142 to 351 since the new premises were entered.

The Camden-road Association is nearly thirty-four years old. It is one of the many institutions which become the poorer by the death of Mr. J. D. Allcroft.

Twenty-eight new members were admitted by the Bombay Association during July. Mr. McCann, who has been sent out by the English National Council to help the work in India, is engaged in a canvass for funds for the Bombay work.

The Clapham Association introduces a new feature into its autumn session—a weekly meeting for the special benefit of the Mission Band workers. Addresses will be given by various members on particular aspects of the Gospel invitation and a discussion will follow.

The association building recently erected in Cork is now almost ready for occupation, but £1000 is needed to free it of debt. Two friends have offered to contribute £100 each if the balance is raised before November 1. The address of the secretary is 54, South Mall, Cork.

In connection with the Westbourne-grove Association, special Friday-night lectures were delivered during July and August, and will be continued during the present month. The annual sermon will be preached this year in St. Matthew's, Bayswater, by Rev. Henry Dening, rector of St. Werburgh's, Bristol.

Mr. Frank Gaylord, who has been engaged in re-organising the work in Paris during the past years, has returned to America. Mr. Gayl efforts have been eminently successful. He r sented Mr. James Stokes, of New York, who co buted £16,000 towards the cost of erection (£40 of the Paris Y.M.C.A. building.

The North Midland District Conference is for Wednesday, October 18. The Derby Young for September says:—"The programme is to in an interesting contribution from Mr. MacI M.A., on the forward movement of the Y.M. and other attractive features. In the evening a public meeting will be addressed by Mr. Bem Dr. T. J. Barnardo, and other popular speakers.

SCOTTISH NOTES.

Since the induction of Rev. J. Mackay to Tr Church, Glasgow, the communion roll has risen 380 to 960.

Mr. William Scott, of Dundee, who died on Au 22, at the age of 67 years, was a devoted serva the Lord Jesus, and a most liberal supporter of sionaries.

Rev. David Johnston, D.D., minister of Ha Orkney, has been appointed Professor of Div and Biblical Criticism in the University of Aberd vice Dr. William Milligan, resigned.

Five members of the Edinburgh Town Co voted against a proposal to confer the freedom o city on Lord Roberts, because of his action in tion to vice-regulation in the Indian forces u his command.

At several of the Clyde watering places, suc Dunoon and Millport, meetings for the children been held on the shore every day during the sum months. These meetings have been well atte and greatly enjoyed.

IRISH NOTES.

Evangelistic services have been held in the P Church, Howth, by Rev. A. J. Moore, Vica Christ's Church, Lisburn.

Open-air evangelistic services have of late held on the pier in Kingstown, and also in Ph Park, Dublin, in spite of considerable oppos from the roughs.

The Methodist City Mission, Belfast, has de on taking a new departure, and has resolved to a hall capable of accommodating at least 2000 sons; the Dublin Central Mission expects to mence operations next month.

The Irish Society, notwithstanding much poli unrest, never has had a more prosperous year the last, when it found abundant openings for religious instruction of the Irish speaking, Roman Catholic portions of the population.

The converts of the Irish Church Mission Moyrus, co. Galway, have of late endured r annoyance and persecution at the hands of hostile Roman Catholic population. Much pray being offered that God will overrule the wrat man, and use the present distress to win some the darkness of Romanism to Gospel freedom and CATHERINE PENNEFATHER MEMORIAL.—In "Summer Number" of Service for the King, the gestion was made that a memorial should be r to the late Mrs. Pennefather. The Septe issue of the same magazine states that from quarters the wish has been expressed that memorial should take the form of measures for maintenance of the work which was Mrs. Pe father's life-long interest. This work, how covered so wide a sphere that some definite br had to be selected as especially associated with honoured name. Notes and Comments.

NEXT week we purpose giving portraits and sketch of Miss Grundberg and Miss Wennberg, Christian workers in St. Petersburg.

A ten days' mission in the City of London will be held by Rev. W. H. Aitken, from Sept. 19 to 29, in St. Mary's Church, Aldermanbury. Daily meetings will be held at 1.15 and 7.30 p.m.; on Sunday at 11 and 6.30, with a meeting for men at 3 p.m. Young men and young women are specially invited to attend the general meetings. Mrs. Baeyertz, the well-known Jewish lady evangelist, will commence a two weeks' mission at Westbourne-grove Baptist Church on Oct. 1.

Mr. A. R. Fenn writes from Leganetos 1, Madrid, Spain:—"In The Christian, August 3, page 9, there is a good little bit of common sense upon convents, 'Inspection or Suppression?' which we think should be scattered by millions, with a heading, say this:—

"CONVENTS:

"Important to Protestants and Roman Catholics.

"It would make a leaflet for giving away or enclosing in letters. Let it be translated and circulated in the R. C. countries of Europe, as well as in Great Britain and the States. It may be, if we are not given over to 'indifference and hardness of heart,' that it may contribute to the fall of one of Rome's abominations, and to open the eyes of unsuspecting young women about to be entrapped in these prisons." [Anyone is more than welcome to print and circulate it.—Ed.]

Last year at Grindelwald the Conference was considering the feasibility of the reunion of the Churches on the basis of the four conditions formulated by the Bishops at Lambeth. The result was something like an impasse, although by some Nonconformists the articles as to the sacraments was regarded as a necessity, and that relating to the historic episcopate with no very decided disfavour. The difficulty rather lay in the question within what limits "Churchmen" could recognise the present pastors of Nonconformist churches as qualified to "administer the sacraments."

This year, however, the question of the reunion of the Churches seems to have given place to the far more important one of the Unity of Christians. This must at least be the beginning of any union or reunion of Churches, and although Rev. Charles Williams regretted that Prebendary Webb-Peploe did not regard it as so near as he did himself, yet these and the other speakers at that meeting seem to have been near to each other in spirit and in purpose.

We regard this with unfeigned thankfulness. And while these brethren are seeking to heal the more outward breaches, cannot others follow their example in seeking to minimise our differences in other respects? How much joy we might receive and give if we were looking on the pleasant side of one another, trying to discover the truth rather than the error, the Christ rather than the wicked one, in our brethren!

The reproductive power of thought had a happy illustration in the phrase used by Rev. Charles A. Berry, at Lucerne, in his address on "The Gospel and the Democracy." He spoke of "the explosive power of a right principle." Everyone would at once remember Dr. Chalmers' famous saying—"the expulsive power of a new affection." Some of these phrases have become almost as familiar as Bible words, and no doubt owe their charm and influence to their being a happy rendering of some great Christian truth. The Church will never forget Augustine's words—"Thou hast made us for Thyself, and our heart is restless till it rest in Thee"; nor these: "Take my heart, Lord, for I cannot give it to Thee. Keep it, for I cannot keep it for Thee." Luther's saying is the watchword of Protestantism: "The doctrine of justification by faith is the mark of a standing or a falling Church." George Whitefield does not usually get the credit of having been a suggestive preacher, but his is the saying: "I do not preach for life, but from life." His words to students are golden: "I hope you will enter into your studies, not to get a parish, nor to be polite preachers, but to be great saints." And to ministers: "Beware of nestling." Spurgeon's saying is a happy one: "God wants nothing but your wants."

"These things were written aforetime for our instruction." Pre-eminently true of the Scriptures, these words are also true of a good deal of history, especially Church history. Thus Michelet says of the influence of Abélard: "All became smooth and easy. He treated Religion politely, he handled her gently, but she melted away under his hands; he reduced religion to philosophy, morality to humanity." Surely, there is a warning in this experience for all the ages. A religion which assails human selfishness, as does Christianity, which insists that the "carnal mind is enmity against God," can never make everything smooth and easy, but must make many things hard and disagreeable. It has not been given to please, but to save, men. The open and avowed enmity to it of some is less dangerous than the polite treatment of others.

We have pleasure in calling attention to a valuable paper in The Thinker for August on "The Miraculous Conception and Modern Thought," by Professor Orr. The point he gradually and surely finds his way to is this—that the soul of Christ required a fitting physical organism, which was provided by the miraculous conception. Following up the theory of Dr. Wallace, that the body of man may be accounted for by evolution, but that his rational nature demands the admission that a superior Power—God—intervened, and bestowed the great gift, Dr. Orr says:—

> The view which postulates a supernatural cause for the mind of man, and hands over his body to the ordinary processes of evolution, is untenable. For, see the difficulty in which such a view lands itself. It is a corollary from the known laws of the connection of mind and body that every mind needs an organism fitted to it. If the mind of man is the product of a new cause, the brain, which is the instrument of the mind, must share in its peculiar origin. The higher mind cannot be put into the simian brain. From the human brain to the ape brain there is, as science tells us, "an abrupt fall," and no links have yet been discovered to fill up the gap between. Evolution, on the theory in question, has brought up the brain of man's simian ancestor to a given point; then a higher cause comes in to endow the creature with rational powers separated by a wide gulf from the degree of intelligence previously possessed. But of what use would these powers be if a corresponding rise did not take place on the organic side? And on the terms of the hypothesis natural evolution has no means within itself to effect that rise. The conclusion we are driven to is that the production of a higher type of organism—the distinctly human—is the correlative of the creation of the higher type of mind, and a special supernatural act is needed for both.

It is easy to see how Dr. Orr can apply this analogy to "the greater mystery—the production of the bodily nature of the second Adam." A perfect soul implies a perfect organism. But if Christ be "the Word made flesh," then there must be a corresponding organism for Him. "The origin of one like Christ is, view it as we will, a miracle." Here, again, the simple words of Scripture anticipate the findings of science and philosophy—"A body hast Thou prepared me." Dr. Orr says very truly, "The view here taken"—in his article—"is strengthened if we observe how commonly in practice belief in the miraculous conception and in the sinlessness of Jesus stand or fall together."

Mr. Wm. Charles Braithwaite has presented to the Peace Congress at Chicago an interesting and suggestive paper on the "History and Work of Peace Societies in Europe." We pass over our English societies, which are the oldest of all, the Peace Society having been born on June 14, 1816, four days before the first anniversary of Waterloo. We are thankful to note that on the Continent, where the Peace movement is almost entirely the growth of the last thirty years, it has gained a marvellous hold. The Familistère of Guise was founded to destroy industrial war by bringing capital and labour together in harmonious co-operation, and has had great success. Its Peace Society sends delegates to the Peace Congresses. The Association of the Young Friends of Peace has done excellent service among French University students. There are no less than seventy-five Italian societies. The Protestants of France and Italy are specially interested in the movement; the Romanists in every land keep apart, and if they do anything do it by themselves. In Servia Nazarenes are willing to go to prison rather than engage in military service; "in Bulgaria Quaker views find ready acceptance." Mr. Braithwaite thinks that the Slavonic peoples have a rooted dislike of aggressive war. In Denmark, Sweden, and Norway, the Peace movement is national almost in its character. The Danish society has seventy local committees and about 8,000 members. In Germany, Holland, and Spain, the cause has a footing.

Mr. Braithwaite's paper, which may be found in Messiah's Kingdom for September, contains one statement which appears to us to need great qualification. On the Continent, owing to the action of the Romish Church, "the main stream of peace advocacy flows from men who are inspired by humanitarian motives. The religion of humanity by which the fetters of many a superstition and many a tyranny have been broken, gives a high place among the articles of its faith to the great ideas of the brotherhood of nations, and the solidarity of their interests." Now, how many superstitions and tyrannies could be enumerated which mere humanitarianism has broken? We are quite ready to admit, and we do it with mingled pain and pleasure, that this great work is, on the Continent, largely in the hands of men "who follow not with us," but we dare not look, and we are sure Mr. Braithwaite does not look to humanitarianism to carry it through. No heart was ever so susceptible to pity, so moved by injustice, as that of our Saviour, and yet his gracious works were done in obedience to the Father, not simply to gratify a human emotion. We need that fine motive at the centre of all our work. It originated the Peace movement, and in it alone will be found the impulse, the endurance, and the patience to carry it through.

A grievous wail comes from Cambridgeshire because of the smallness of the harvest. No doubt there is failure in some respects, but we always think it is well to remember the compensations, of which so little is said. One crumb of comfort is afforded by The Cambridge Express, which says that its inquiries have elicited the singular and gratifying fact, that, whereas in many villages the population is steadily declining, in those where allotments have been provided in a liberal spirit, the population has remained fairly stationary. Better still, this paper can say that where industries have been planted in villages the population is increasing. This question is vital to our national well-being, and has a close relation to the spread of the Gospel. If we can bring prosperity back to country life, and retain the people in small communities, we shall find it far easier to influence them there than it is to influence the masses in the cities and towns.

The Trades Union Congress listened to some wise words from its President, Mr. Monro, who, on the subject of strikes, told his fellow-workmen that he believed it an act of criminal folly to hint at or recommend a strike until all the resources of civilisation have been exhausted in the endeavour to avoid such a forlorn hope. He affirmed that in that part of the country, the north of Ireland, locks-out are more common than strikes. He expressed the hope that one outcome of the Royal Commission on Labour will be to formulate such a system of conciliation and arbitration as will diminish the chances of industrial warfare breaking out. Pity but it was done at once, for the violence and wickedness which have marked the present coal strike in Yorkshire, Derbyshire, and Wales, make one almost despair of men. There surely must be some cause of irritation not generally known, which is goading the colliers to these desperate measures.

Mr. Monro had some wise and courageous words to say to the Congress on the moral aspects of life. He asked whether the working men of to-day are much nearer the standard of true manhood than their forefathers were? Whether they had made progress in the full sense of the word? Whether they were using their increased leisure and the talents vouchsafed to them for their own benefit or for that of mankind? He became very direct and personal by quoting some words of a great statesman on our national sin of drunkenness, and added, "How true these words are each individual in this hall can testify, and while acknowledging the truth this moment, how prone some of us may be to give them practical illustration before the day is over!" He concluded by expressing the fervent hope that each of them in their several spheres might endeavour to make their own lives and the lives of those around them higher, healthier, and happier. Very sad was the comment on these manly words when, three days later, 600 Yorkshire colliers threatened a brewery, and were kept from injuring it by free drink being brought on to the road. They destroyed property to a great extent, and not the less for being inflamed with drink. Working-men will be masters of the situation when they are masters of themselves.

The Century for this month seems to contain one of the best illustrations of how to prove anything from figures. In an article on "The Census and Immigration" it appears to be shown beyond all contradiction that the foreign population which is always pouring into the United States is mainly the source of the poverty and crime that have to be dealt with. Thus, of the convicts in penitentiaries, 48 per cent. are of native parentage, while 52 per cent. are of foreign birth and parentage; of juvenile delinquents 39 per cent. are of native parentage, and 61 per cent. of foreign birth or parentage; of the paupers in almshouses 41 per cent. are of native parentage, and 59 per cent. of foreign birth or parentage, but of those 59, only eight are born in the States, while 51 are foreign-born. All the trouble, therefore, comes from abroad, and the conclusion is, that something ought to be done to restrict, or at least to sift, an immigration which furnishes more than half the paupers, while supplying only one-sixth of the total white population.

In an article on "Idleness and Crime," fifty pages further on, we are told that the number of white male prisoners in all the prisons, penitentiaries, and reformatory institutions in the United States in 1890 was 52,894. Of these 38,156 were native-born, only 13,869 were foreign-born; nearly three-fourths of the convicted criminals are born in the country, and more than half of them of American parents; little more than one-fourth are foreign-born. These figures are traced out into many details. "What they show," says the writer of the article, "is that American boys are becoming criminals and filling our prisons because of lack of occupation. . . . It is to the cities that the swarms of foreign labourers come, finding ready admission to all trade-unions, and filling the places which American boys would have were they permitted to learn the trades." Thus again the conclusion is reached—keep out the immigrant. We doubt if it can be done, or, if done, whether it would work a cure.

In unison with the recent letters of our correspondents, Captain J. Kearney White and Mr. J. Townsend Trench, Sir Edward Reed says:—

With the armoured citadel intact, and an unarmoured end destroyed, the ship is in imminent danger of upsetting. The Victoria was bound to capsize with the injury she received. There were other shi that were equally bound to capsize when they we injured in the same manner, the reason being th instead of the armed citadel being the major part the structure, and the unarmoured ends the min portion, we had chosen to make the unarmoured en the major part, measuring more than half the enti length of the ship. The ships likely to capsize in similar manner, if they received like injury in pea or in action, were the Agamemnon, Ajax, Ann Benbow, Camperdown, Collingwood, Colossus, Edi burgh, Howe, Inflexible, Rodney, and Sans Pareil.

Power is coming into the hands of th people, but are we any nearer to the verific tion of Cowper's aphorism—"War's a gam which, were their subjects wise, kings wou not play at"?

A salutary movement has been inaugu rated at Liverpool which should have an im portant bearing on Saturday early closin and Sunday rest. It is proposed that aft half-past three on Saturdays letters shou remain undelivered till Mondays. Unnece sary work to postmen and business men wou thus be got rid of. Really urgent matte might be met by telegraphic or messeng service, which, as the cost would be mor would be confined to absolutely necessa work.

FAREWELL TO MISSIONARIES.

On Monday evening the East London Tabernac was crowded with friends of missions, the object the meeting being to say farewell to workers abo to proceed to China under the auspices of t China Inland Mission. The proceedings had peculiar interest, from the fact that Miss Gra Brown, daughter of the esteemed pastor of t Tabernacle, was one of the party. As fact, the Tabernacle congregation is beco ing increasingly devoted to the mission caus and reasons are not far to seek, for or a year ago the pastor gave his daughter Nellie work in the same field to which Miss Grace is abo to proceed. And, should Divine Providence smi upon the evangelistic purposes of Mr. Brown family, the end of this spiritual movement a stimulus is not yet; for, all being well, anoth daughter, Lucy, will next year take up mission wo in Africa. In a sense, being truly human, the past laments these departures from his household, but the same time, with heart and soul, he r joices that God has accepted of his best, a is deigning to employ his loved ones for the pr motion of his glory and the spread of his kingdom the regions beyond.

In the course of a few remarks, Mr. Brown r minded his church and congregation of its intere in the mission field, for already it has several r presentatives abroad. Now shortly Mr. Pitman w go from among them to South Africa. Miss Moo as well as his daughter Grace go to t Flowery Land. After a brief address by Mr. Broomhall, secretary of the C.I.M., a few wor were spoken by Miss Gertrude Broomhall and th recruits already named, also by Mr. Huds Broomhall and his wife, who are returning, aft spending a season of furlough at home. Songs consecration and pledging to service were sung wi vigour; and having urged his people to give ther selves more fully and practically to the work world-wide evangelisation, the pastor gloried in t high calling to which some had already responde The joy of seeing his children engaged in missio work was, he said, worth all the heart-aches involv in bidding them good-bye.

CHRISTIANITY AND SCEPTICISM.—Rev. Alex. Harrison, B.D., Evidential Missioner of the Chur Parochial Mission Society, will give addresses Exeter Hall, from Sept. 17 to 22 inclusive. Subject —Sept. 17, 3.45 p.m.—"The Being and Love God"; Sept. 17, 8 p.m.—"The Holy Trinity" Sept. 18, 8 p.m.—"The Christian Doctrine of R pentance"; Sept. 19, 8 p.m.—"The Christia Doctrine of Faith"; Sept. 20, 8 p.m.—"The Rel tion of Faith and Works"; Sept. 21, 8 p.m.—"Th Atonement"; Sept. 22, 8 p.m.—"The Christia Doctrine of Conversion." These subjects will treated in a popular manner by the lecturer, who h met in debate some of the leading sceptics of th day, and is familiar with the difficulties felt by ther

The Spirit of God.

In "these last days" God has made Himself known in a threefold Personality, which of old was not so plainly revealed. "When the fulness of the time was come, God sent forth his Son, made of a woman." "The Word was made flesh." He came from the bosom of the Father, to declare Him, and to offer Himself up as the perfect sacrifice for sin. Having accomplished the work He came to do, and ascended again to the Father, He sent down the Holy Spirit according to his promise. Thus, another Person has come to take the place of Him who has gone away. We now know God as not only One in his essential Being, but in this threefold revelation of Himself in the working out of the great plan of Redemption.

If this presents a paradox to the reasonings of the human mind, it is only so long as we measure the Divine nature by our arithmetic, and say that two cannot be one. But here we have to do with God's arithmetic. His nature is not subject to the finite laws that govern ours. Witness one of his first recorded acts. When God created man, in his own image, male and female created He them and said, "they two shall be one flesh" (Matt. xix. 5, 6), He showed that He has other ways of reckoning than by the laws of matter. And thus making man in his own image, He made the human relationship of Father and Son separate persons, yet one in nature and in likeness, in affection and interests. Or again, in the human organism, the body and the spirit have functions entirely distinct, yet the two compose but one man. If it be so in earthly things, we may surely accept as reasonable what the Bible reveals of the threefold Personality in the Unity of the Godhead.

On this, however, we do not dwell. The purpose of the present paper is to direct attention to one special point ever present in the teaching of the Scriptures respecting the Spirit of God. Wherever He is spoken of, it asserts the supernatural. His work is that of direct Divine action, as distinguished from that of Nature and its laws. Let us look into the evidence.

By the Spirit of the Lord the Judges wrought their victories, as Othniel (iii. 10), Gideon (vi. 34), and Jephthah (xi. 29), and Samson, did such works of miraculous strength. Or the prophets: Joseph was "a man in whom the Spirit of God is" (Gen. xli. 38); Daniel, "in whom is the spirit of the holy gods" (iv. 8, 9, 18; v. 11, 14). "The Spirit" on Eldad and Medad (Num. xi. 26, 29) simply describes the supernatural power, as on Saul in 1 Sam. x. 6, 10, xix. 23, though without saving value to him. And strikingly thus on Balaam, Num. xxiv. 2.

David declares (2 Sam. xxiii. 2) "the Spirit of the Lord spake by me, and his word was in my tongue." Micah (iii. 8), "I am full of power by the Spirit of the Lord." Isaiah (xlviii. 16), "The Lord God and his Spirit hath sent me." And prophetically of the Christ (lxi. 1), "The Spirit of the Lord Jehovah) is upon me." And so the New Testament constantly affirms of the prophets of old that by the Spirit they thus spoke of Him that was to come (see Acts i. 16, xxviii. 25; Mark xii. 36, Heb. iii. 7, ix. 8, x. 15; 1 Peter i. 11, 2 Peter i. 21).

See of "the Spirit" in Isa. lxiii. 11-14, and again lix. 19. "When the enemy shall come in like a flood the Spirit of the Lord shall lift up a standard against him." "My Spirit remaineth among you" (Hag. ii. 5) as God's strength present in their weakness. And we have the full force of its meaning in the word to Zerubbabel, "Not by might, nor by power, but by My Spirit, saith the Lord of hosts" (Zech. iv. 6). His miraculous agency is obviously implied in Kings xviii. 12 and 2 Kings ii. 16. Compare with these Acts viii. 39. "The Spirit of the Lord caught away Philip."

Observe how the New Testament opens with the great miracle of the Incarnation. "The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee." "That which is conceived in her is of the Holy Ghost." These words affirm the setting aside of the laws of nature. And He who thus came into the world was anointed with the Holy Ghost and with power (Acts x. 38). The Spirit descended like a dove and abode upon Him. Full of the Holy Ghost, He passed through the temptation, and entered on his ministry (Luke iv. 1, 14). When He said "The Spirit of the Lord is upon Me," it told how He, whom they wondered at as Joseph's son, could so speak and act. By the Spirit of God He cast out demons (Matt. xii. 18, 28). It was written, "I will put My Spirit upon Him." Therefore they who attributed his miracles to Beelzebub "blasphemed the Holy Ghost." God gave not the Spirit by measure unto Him (Jno. iii. 34). While here He was not only the Revealer of the Father, the manifestation of his love, the fulfiller of his will in Redemption, but in Him the Holy Spirit was dwelling, and in Him exercising his special function of supernatural power.

Then when the Son had accomplished that for which He was incarnate, and which only as incarnate He could do; when He had offered Himself up as the sacrifice for sins, had risen from the dead and gone away again to the Father: He sent down as a gift to his people the Holy Spirit to do what yet remained to be done, "another Comforter," to take his place on earth, to bear witness of Him, by miracle, or utterance, or whatever is of direct Divine operation on the hearts of men. Of miraculous power of testimony there is much in the Acts—we may have to refer to it again. Of his presence in the Church for direction and command, see Acts viii. 29, x. 19, xi. 12, xiii. 2, 4, xvi. 6, 7; and Luke i. 15, 41, 67, ii. 26. Matt. x. 20, Mark xiii. 11, and Eph. iii. 5 are examples of direct revelations by the Spirit.

Of his work in the heart, space will admit only to refer the reader to such texts as Jno. iii. 8, vii. 39, xiv. 17, etc., xvi. 8, 13, 15; Titus iii. 5; Acts ix. 31; Rom. v. 5; 1 Peter i. 2; 1 Thess. iv. 3; Eph. v. 9; Gal. v. 22; 1 Cor. ii. 14; 2 Cor. iii. 3; 1 Cor. xii. 3-11; Eph. i. 13; 2 Cor. 1. 22 and v. 5; or again see Eph. v. 18, iv. 30; 2 Tim. i. 14; Jude xx.

In all these, one of the ever-present attributes of the Spirit is the exercise of direct Divine power, the supernatural, as in contrast with the operation of nature and its laws. Let this be recognised, and it will go far to settle some great question which science and criticism are wont to dispute.

I.—OF INSPIRATION.

It is the fashion to talk of the "inspiration" of philosophers and poets, ancient or modern, as if it were of the same "Spirit of God" who wrote the sacred Scriptures.

In whatever sense, or whatever degree, the natural conscience or intelligence may be under a Divine influence, in whatever sense men may choose to call this the "Spirit of God," there is a great gulf between it and the Spirit of God in the Scripture sense, and the inspiration which it affirms. You cannot, however you may attempt it, put the two on the same platform. Either the Scripture, being what it declares itself to be, stands altogether alone on its own ground of inspiration; or, not being what it declares itself to be, sinks to the lowest level of human fabrication, and forfeits all claim on our respect. For those who choose the latter alternative, we do not write. But it is strange to find that any who profess to fear God, and believe in Christ, should be guilty of thus throwing contempt on the Scriptures of truth. All that can be gained by exalting the wisdom of men as "Scripture" is to degrade the Word of God. And since no infallibility, or even certainty, can attach to the former, so it is denied to the latter.

Those for whom "Modern Thought" claims it, never made that claim. They would one and all disown it. The Bible takes its stand on that claim. It will meet us on no other terms. It will accept no lesser homage than that due to the authoritative Word of God. "God said," "The Lord spake," "Thus saith the Lord," is the key-note of the Old Testament. "It is written," is the key-note of the New. On nothing do Christ and his Apostles insist more firmly than this. "The Scripture must be fulfilled." "Holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost."

Yet there are operations of the Spirit of God which do not imply "inspiration" in the sense of 2 Tim. iii. 16. If the reader will examine the texts already cited of his work in the hearts of men, the difference will be plain enough. The one not the less supernatural, though it be only in measure as the heart is yielded to its constraining power. In the other, the lips possessed and used by God for the utterance of his words.

In this latter aspect of power on testimony, "the Holy Ghost" is distinctively used throughout the Acts of the Apostles. Though in the former sense the Spirit was given in John xx. 22, they were not "endued with power from on high" till the Holy Ghost came upon them, making them witnesses. It was characterised by the supernatural gift of utterance. To this, important as it is in relation to our present study, we can here direct attention, as marking the difference between the Divine working of the Spirit in the heart, and the distinctively "miraculous" gifts of which we read in the Acts. Another point remains more especially to be examined.

II.—OF CREATION.

If the full meaning of the words were given to them in the reading of Gen. i. 2, there would be no attempting to explain the process of action by the operation of physical forces ranging over vast geological periods. When the earth, which was then "without form and void," was framed as it now is for the habitation of man, it was the work of "the Spirit of God." With this great miracle the Old Testament opens, as the New opens with the great miracle of the Incarnation. God thus, in the beginning, introduces Himself to man as the Almighty, who having made nature and its laws, and using them wherever and so long as He sees fit, yet did then, and would whenever He pleased, act independently of them by his own sovereign power. "The Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters." This asserts it to be the direct, supernatural work of Omnipotence. It forbids the attempt to trace it to any other agency. It mocks the vain attempts of human science to account for it by any natural processes.

And it is manifest, too, that we are at issue with the fundamental teachings of Scripture wherever we think to explain its phenomena by natural causes. The Bible takes its stand on the assertion of a present living God; not a Baal, bound down by the laws of nature (1 Kings xviii. 27), but the God of Elijah, whose fire can consume the sacrifice and lick up the water in the trench. Miracle, the super-natural, is to Scripture what the blood is to the flesh. Without it, the Bible were a corpse, and is so to those who thus eliminate it. Such may treat it as a "subject" for dissection. But happy are they to whom God is a living God, and his words are words of eternal life. W. Collingwood.

THE EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

Conference at the World's Fair.

Christian visitors to Chicago will do well to time their movements so as to be present at the International Christian Conference to be held under the auspices of the Evangelical Alliance during the second week of October. Indeed, the practical way in which modern methods of reaching the masses are there to be considered in detail, should make this conference of the greatest importance. Christian union and co-operation are the leading topics, but the position of the Church towards the sociological problems of the day will be fully studied, and the present condition of Protestant Christendom reviewed by representative men.

The special feature of the conference, however, will be the comprehensive sectional gatherings for the discussion of the various branches of home work enumerated in the following list, each topic being in charge of a successful leader in his or her own branch.

Evangelistic.—Christian work in the factory town, mining camp, lumber camp, and lodging-houses, and among discharged prisoners. How to reach the non-churchgoing foreign population and working men, house-to-house visitation, athletics in reaching young men, object talks and lantern sermons, the evening congregation, open-air services, tent work, rescue work, cottage meetings, industrial missions, deaconesses, the Salvation Army.

Reformatory.—The churches and the suppression of vice, social purity, organised charities, political reforms, tenement houses, substitutes for public-houses, coffee-houses, criminal administration.

Educational.—The churches and the kindergarten, university extension, Chautauqua circles, popular lectures, music classes and concerts, parish and town libraries, reading rooms and manual training.

Social.—The churches and local guilds, mothers' unions, domestic circles, college settlements, working girls' clubs, boys' clubs and brigades, and tee-to-tums.

Sanitary.—The churches and public baths, cooking classes, trained nurses, fresh-air funds, outing clubs, and holiday houses.

Economic.—The churches and labour bureaus, new England kitchens, savings banks and provident funds and benevolent pawnbroking.

Miscellaneous.—Institutional methods of church work, parish houses, a working church, how to utilise church buildings during the week, the problem of the country church, pleasant Sunday afternoons, duties to servants, failures in Christian work.

The mere perusal of this list is in a high degree suggestive, reminding the worker what has been done and what may be done. If the proceedings are published in a handy form they will be of very great value indeed. J. E. B. M.

THEATRICAL EMPLOYEES.—On the invitation of a number of ladies and gentlemen, a gathering of "ladies of the ballet," "chorus ladies," and "dressers" employed at several London theatres and music-halls assembled at the Waterloo-road Chapel schoolroom on Wednesday, September 6. After a substantial tea had been partaken of, Mr. W. Forbes delivered a brief address, urging the adoption of total abstinence and the acceptance of Christianity. A number of hymns were sung as solos, in which the audience joined, and the guests seemed thoroughly to enjoy the entertainment provided for them. In addition to the tea-meetings, the sick have been visited, some have been admitted to hospitals and convalescent institutions, many cases of distress have been relieved, and others helped in various ways. Contributions to enable Mr. W. Forbes to continue these tea-meetings, can be sent to him at 71, Tollington-road, Holloway, N.

Education and Missions.

AN EXPOSITION AND DEFENCE.—2.

BY REV. E. STORROW.

[It will be perceived that these papers are in reply to those by Mr. Phillips in our issues of June 1, 8, 15. The subject is of great interest and importance, and it is well that both sides of the question should be stated.]

Education in India has undoubtedly a high place as a missionary agency, probably higher than anywhere else. There are adequate reasons why it should be so. But it stands in a very secondary place to preaching, and the most ardent educationalists are content that it should be so. But it has not that undue amount of agency given to it which its decriers suppose. Mr. Phillips says:—

> In the Presidency towns educational missionaries predominate out of all proportion. In Madras there are about fifteen, as against two who preach in Tamil.

If that be so, it should not be so. Nevertheless, if quite correct, the statement conveys a very misleading impression. That proportion, it may safely be averred, prevails in no other city in India. There are but three Presidency towns, but it is in these precisely that Anglo-vernacular institutions are stronger than anywhere else, because they are desired for special local reasons. But India is an empire of villages, and where there are missionaries, their spheres are mainly evangelistic, with the supervision of common vernacular schools. But even in large cities there is far more vernacular preaching than Mr. Phillips's hasty generalisations would lead any one to suppose.

It should be remembered, to the honour of the missionaries, who gave the first great impetus to the higher education for a class, not all classes, that they hoped to raise up a great army of powerful native preachers. They did not wholly fail in that aim, and results they but dimly foresaw have come, of which their successors should take more note than they do, and which it is safe to say will fill those with gladness in the land where there are no shadows. Of course, the greater proportion by far of missionaries should be vernacular preachers, and preach to the heathen: and the missionary societies should jealously guard against undue and disproportionate devotion in other directions as well as that of education. The educational missionaries are jealous for the preaching of the Gospel. Next to the joy they have when conversions take place, is their satisfaction when their converts become preachers. It is safe to say that neither in Madras nor any other city in India where there are educational institutions, does any day pass without the public preaching of the Gospel in the streets, markets, or bazaar chapels. In connection with some such institutions there are organisations for regular preaching of the Word in the surrounding districts.

But facts will prove that educational missionaries and scholars in their schools are not so numerous as is supposed. The following figures are taken from the "Statistical Tables of Protestant Missions in India for 1890," though the line between preaching and educational missionaries cannot be rigidly drawn. It is but a general distinction.

Foreign ordained agents	857
Foreign and Eurasian lay preachers ...	118
" " " teachers	75
Native ordained ministers	797
Native preachers unordained	3,491
Native Christian teachers	5,297
Non-Christian	3,132
Anglo-vernacular male schools	460
Scholars	53,564
Vernacular schools	4770
Scholars	122,193

Seeing that not six per cent. of the whole population can read or write; that educat is greatly desired; that it is the most pow ful of all human agencies for the overthrow popular Hinduism; that not more than in 1000 of the population is in a boys' miss school: there is surely no just cause why t arm of missionary strength should be mo restricted than it it is.

The outcry against its assumed expensi ness is equally misleading, the assumpti being that the whole or greater part of t cost of schools is borne by the missiona societies, whereas no form of missionary s vice is so self-supporting, and the higher t education the less is the proportionate cost a society.

Take, for instance, the three largest instit tions in Calcutta. That of the Church Scotland had, last year, in its college depa ment, 446 students, and its school 525 bo The expenditure, almost entirely in nati teachers' salaries, was Rs.25,222. The incor was: from college fees, Rs.14,633; sch fees Rs.6370; Government grant, Rs.680 local subs., Rs.727; total, Rs.28,530.

The Free Church of Scotland Instituti had 944 students and scholars. The tot local cost was Rs.28,980. The income in fe was Rs.23,294; Government grant Rs.806 total, Rs.31,360.

The London Missionary Society's Instit tion: scholars and students, 572; local expe diture, Rs.13,500; income from fees, Rs.10,01 Government grant, Rs.3000.

Other cases equally favourable could cited. Here are the main features of t Madras school of the Church of Scotlan pupils, 602; total expenditure, Rs.17,23 income, Rs.16,609.

Referring to a school at Vellore, with 3 scholars, the report says:—

> The total income was Rs.7460, the expendit Rs.7535. The deficit was paid out of the surplu of 1887, '88, and '90. Taking one year with anoth the income of the school for six years has not o paid the expenditure but left a balance of Rs.454 the credit of the school. This large mission sch has thus been carried on for six years without co ing one penny to the Mission Committee.

Thus, with the exception of the time of very few missionaries, the entire expenditu is met by local resources. Other insti tions may not have reached this high lev but the general policy is toward it.

But I concede that what has been stat would hardly justify such schools, unless th principles, aims, and results were adequa And they are. (1) No agency can be imagin more powerful for the overthrow of mode Hinduism, than the education given in we conducted mission schools. For, as Hindui is based on utterly false science, true kno ledge, even in its rudimentary forms, rend a belief in it impossible. I need not sh here that the overthrow of this evil syste would be an infinite gain.

(2) But the destruction of heathenism only a part of its aim. It is essentially c structive. It strives to put Christianity in place, and the educational missionaries tea the cardinal Evangelical truths of Christian not only with an emphasis, but an intelligen equal at least to that of missionaries a where, or ministers at home.

(3) Educational missionaries have am opportunity—far beyond that of the itiner missionary, however zealous and able—press certain great truths and principles the attention of their pupils, of the first i portance to them and to Hindu society. I instance, they teach them to think for the selves, and to act on their convictions. Nothi is more strange to the English mi in the framework of Hinduism than t ms it has of repressing all individual will l separate action. With the community a ndu will do anything, without it he will only do nothing; but he does not feel that re can be any obligation on him to act. ristian education teaches them the high ms of truth, justice, humanity. It dis- dits caste, transmigration, the unjust atment of women, and not only by its dency but direct teaching, opposes the false timents and the pernicious customs so in- erately prevalent and powerful in Hindu iety. It is educational, therefore, in the ghest, noblest, broadest sense.

And observe, its influence extends far yond the scholars in its schools. Among ple so intelligent and observant, there is ch interchange of thought, and on no sub- ts more than on those relating to the ths and principles of Christianity. These read and talked about in zenanas, bazaars, l among students and scholars in purely tive and Government schools, to a remark- le extent. And on such topics missionary in- tution students, who are supposed to be autho- ies, do know a good deal, and with the con- t of young men, are not slow to tell what y know. That there is a remarkable ount of Christian knowledge throughout dia, especially in the upper and educated sses, is undoubted, and mission education claim the first place in producing it.

(To be concluded.)

DIVINE COMFORT.

"Thou comfortest me."—Isa. xii. 1. (R.V.)

Sometimes, when slowly battling on,
And when my strength is almost gone,
My eyes too dim with tears to see
The Saviour who is watching me;
And ears so filled with earthly sound,
That e'en his loving voice is drowned;
Then darkling, out my hand I hold
That He may take it, and enfold
Me, childlike, on his tender breast.
Then, when my trespass is confessed,
And, while in his embraces pressed,
He kindly wipes away my tears,
Bidding me cease from all my fears,
And makes the promise new to me,
"Most surely I will be with thee."

Services at Margate.

On Sunday last Mr. Monro Collings, of Gosport, has been earnestly labouring in Margate for past three months, held most successful closing vices. In the morning a large number of people gregated to hear the Gospel upon the sands. In afternoon the children and their friends, who daily met Mr. Collings upon the sands, united in appy gathering to say good-bye. "The Lord with you" was the speaker's subject, enforcing need and preciousness of the friendship of rs. The affectionate responses of the children re most encouraging.

In the evening a large meeting was held at nger's Hall-by-the-Sea. The Holy Spirit was sent in great power and blessing, as on the evious twelve Sabbaths. The Psalmist's prayer, Bring my soul out of prison, that I may give thanks to thy name," was solemnly and lovingly urged a plea for all. A number stood up to express ir desire for this blessing. I believe that, as at ry previous service, light and liberty were the ppy result. A short open-air meeting upon one the bathing stages brought the day's work for rist to a close. E. J. P. Francis.

HOLLAND.—The Orphanage at Neerbosch, ected by Heer John van 't Lindenhout, is a grand dustrial institution. It has now over a thousand nates. Most of the children are taught singing, d now and then they make tours. The songs ich they render set forth Evangelical truth, promote the circulation of the wholesome tempe- nce and Christian literature which is printed at Orphanage.

World-Wide Evangelisation.—4.

Who that is acquainted with the devoted Mr. Horsburgh can read his deeply important letter in The Christian of August 31 and Sept. 7, without admiring his self-denial? Together these two utterances show that Christianity, both nominal and genuine, is only as it were playing with the heathen and Mohammedan world: I mean so far as the utter insufficiency of the number of labourers is concerned. Moreover, our present methods are not calculated to supply the necessary labourers in a hundred years. We have not only not improved upon the methods of the first century, but in a most important respect have slidden backwards—in fact, we have backslidden. But the Lord warned us of the tares following the good seed (Matt. xiii. 25).

In the first century, in the midst of persecution—I would almost say with the benefit of persecution—although forbidden to preach, Peter and John not only ignored the prohibition, but went to the company of believers, who, with one accord, lifted up their voice to God, saying, "Grant unto thy servants that with all boldness they may speak thy Word."

Thus the entire community, male and female, young and old, rich and poor, masters and servants, and slaves, prayed that they might boldly speak. Thus certainly upwards of five thousand preachers and disseminators of Christ were coined at once out of God's mint, learned and unlearned, but every one stamped as good coin; and, note well, stamped by the Holy Spirit, not to be hoarded, but expressly stamped to be circulated. For mark those words, "Grant unto thy servants" (Acts iv. 29), not "thy apostles" merely, not "thy missionaries" or thy learned men, not thy males only, or thy adults, for "babes and sucklings" comprehend, even boys and girls, and even slave boys and slave girls.

Why thus? Because no man must have the glory; "For it is not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord."

Ah, yes, but those vast and rapid creations of new creatures were immediately after the Saviour's days. Aye, true; but true also in many a time since and in many countries, and, moreover, I believe what we are encouraged to look for now in our days—unless the Lord's hand is shortened that it cannot save. But his hand is not shortened. In that glorious hour He regenerated multitudes of a nation whose people we now think so hard to convert, viz., the children of Israel, and those Jews and Jewesses then started at once to disseminate the glorious glad tidings. But both Jews and Gentiles were filled with joy, and joyfully spread the news as glorious glad tidings.

What is his command upon us in this year, 1893? After centuries of being oft-times like dogs sleeping in the horse's manger, and barking off every lean famishing horse that would come to eat, and live by the good corn that we merely lie upon the top of, whilst the poor horse needs to eat it that he may live,—look at this moment upon the hungering, the unsatisfied, persecuted Jews, and the millions of heathens and Mohammedans in China, in Asia, and in Africa that are perishing with hunger, whilst we have enough and to spare!

The neglect of Christendom has lasted long enough. O that we had continued to take Pentecostal methods, and we might have had Pentecostal blessings. But in these late, if not last, days let us awake from our sleep, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall even yet make bare his wonder-working arm. When we pray let us believe that we have the petitions we ask, and we shall have them.

Meanwhile, I fear that persecution goes on in Russia. I fear the rapid compulsory propagation of Mohammedanism goes on in Africa, whilst we—too often separated in different cliques—merely pray for more "missionaries" instead of unanimously lifting up our voice in the glorious prayer in Acts iv. 29, "Grant that thy servants may speak the word with boldness." But this paper will not have hit its mark if it merely begets more prayer for missionaries. No, no. Once again let us with one accord go back to that Pentecostal prayer, "Grant that thy servants may speak the word with boldness." God's train has its steam up, and is ready to start with a praying host of men and women and children of all colours, praying with one heart and one soul for all believers, Jew and Gentile, black and white, even the most ignorant, that thy name may be hallowed, thy Kingdom come, thy will be done on every sea, in every land, as it is done in heaven. Do not let us think we are out of our depth in so praying. 'Tis but part of what Christ taught us, and what we call the Lord's Prayer.

CONFERENCE IN THURINGIA.

The eighth annual Blankenburg Evangelical Conference began its meetings on August 28, and continued till the 31st. The arrangements were, as usual, made by Fräulein von Weling, assisted by Pastor Kaiser; and were very complete and satisfactory. One feature seems to be unique. The visitors are accommodated in the Evangelical Alliance House, a beautifully situated and admirably conducted pension, belonging to Fräulein von Weling, and in an adjoining villa they meet for meals at a common table. No charge is made, but visitors can contribute what they please, placing their offerings in a box in the dining-room. These opportunities for social intercourse were greatly enjoyed.

The day's proceedings began with breakfast at seven, prayer-meeting from eight to nine, conference from half-past ten to half-past twelve, lunch at one, conference from two till half-past three, dinner at half-past six, and an evangelistic meeting at eight closed the day.

Among the visitors who took an active part in the proceedings were Pastors Jellinghaus, of Gutergotz; Claassen, of Calw; Gerlach, of Forst; Büttner, of Kelbra; Dietrich, of Stuttgart; Horst, of Mansbach; Eckert, of Fürth; and Kaiser, of Blankenburg; Colonel von Knobelsdorff, of Berlin; and Herr Wilms, of Düsseldorf; while telegrams showed the warm interest felt in the gatherings by absent friends.

The subject of conference was the "Life of Prayer: its conditions, its hindrances, its exercise, and the promises by which it is fed." On the last evening, an address on "The Second Coming of the Lord" was given by Pastor Horst, after which the friends gathered at the Lord's table; the service and the Conference being closed by the singing of the German version of "God be with you till we meet again."

It would be a great encouragement to Christian brethren in Germany and Bohemia, some of whom "hold the fort" in the face of grave difficulties and harassing persecutions, if Christian friends from Great Britain and America could be present at this annual Conference. The warm welcome given to the one brother from England who spoke, showed how cordially our German brethren appreciate the sympathetic presence of visitors from English-speaking lands.

PROTESTANTISM IN ITALY.—Dr. Matteo Prochet has received a fresh token of esteem and respect. He has been recently promoted to be Commendatore of the Order of the Crown of Italy. Professor E. F. Key-Words of Life.

Rev. F. B. Meyer, B.A.

THE RECIPROCAL INHERITANCE.

Throughout the Old Testament there runs the double thought of our inheritance in God, and God's in us. "The Lord is the portion of mine inheritance, and of my cup." So sang David in that Psalm of resurrection hope which supplied befitting words for the Pentecostal references to the Risen Christ (Psa. xvi. 5-6). "The Lord's portion is his people, Israel is the lot of his inheritance." So sang Moses in his swan-song (Deut. xxxii. 9). And, as we shall see, this two-fold aspect of one deep conception interpenetrates the heart of the Apostle's teaching in this Epistle.

Eph. i. 14. Inheritance and Inherited.—In the opening paragraph of this epistle the Apostle works up to this as his climax, that the Holy Spirit is given to us as the earnest of our inheritance. And, obviously, inasmuch as God is the earnest, nothing less than God can be the inheritance. The indwelling of the Holy Spirit, sealing us with the likeness of Jesus, is, so to speak, the first-fruits garnered from the earliest harvest accruing to us from our heritage, which is God. In the same verse the Apostle describes us as being God's own possession, which is not yet fully acquired by Him, though fully purchased; but which is awaiting its full occupation in that day of glory, when not a fragment of the purchase of Calvary shall be left in the power of the grave, but body, soul, and spirit shall be raised in the likeness of the glorified Saviour.

In the first clause of this verse, he therefore speaks of that inheritance which is ours as heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ. In the second, he speaks of ourselves as that inheritance upon which the Son of God so set his heart, as to be willing to obtain it by the sacrifice of the glory that he had with the Father before the worlds were made. We are therefore in turn inheritors and an inheritance.

Eph. i. 14, v. 5. The Saints' Inheritance in God.—When an emigrant first receives the title-deeds of the broad lands made over to him in the far West, he has no conception, as he descends the steps of the Government office and passes into the crowd, of all that has been conveyed to him in the gift of the parchment. And, though acres vast enough to make an English county are in his possession, rich and loamy soil, or stored with mines of ore, yet he is not sensibly the richer. For long days he travels towards his inheritance and presently pitches his flimsy shanty upon its borders. But even though he has reached it, several years must pass before he can understand its value, or compel it to minister, with all its products, to his need.

Oh child of God! Thy estate has been procured at the cost of blood and tears; but thou didst not buy it. Its broad acres have been made over to thee by deed of gift. They became thine in the council chamber of eternity, when the Father gave Himself to thee in Jesus. And they became thine in fact, when thou wast born at the foot of the cross. As soon as thou didst open thine eyes to behold the crucified Lord, thou didst all unconsciously become heir to the lengths and breadths, and depths, and heights of God!

No sooner has the emigrant reached his estate, than he commences to prospect it. He makes a circuit of its bounds; he ascends its loftiest hills; he crosses and recrosses it that he may know all that has come into his ownership. And this is God's message to thee, oh Christian soul! Look from the place where thou art, northward, and southward, and eastward, and westward, for all this land is given to thee! Precious things of the sun and of the moon, for God is light; of the ancient mountains of his faithfulness, and the everlasting hills of his truth; of the fountains and brooks of his love, that gush spontaneously forth to satisfy and enrich.

But next to this, the emigrant encloses some small part of his inheritance, placing around it a tentative fence or partition, and on this he begins to expend toil and skill. The giant trees are cut down; and their roots burnt out or extracted by a team of horses. The unaccustomed soil is brought beneath the yoke of the plough. The grass-land yields pasture to the cattle, and there is not a square inch of the enclosed territory that does not minister to the needs of the new proprietor. But not content with this, in the following year he pushes his fences back further into the depth of prairie or forest, and again renews his efforts to compel the land to yield him her secret stores. Year after year the process is repeated, until, perhaps when twenty years have come and gone, the fences are needed no longer because the extent of occupation is commensurate with the extent of the original purchase.

Let every reader mark this, that supposing two men obtained a grant of an equal number of acres, if other things were equal, their wealth would be in exact proportion to the amount of use which each had made of his special acres. If one had learnt a swifter art of appropriating the wealth that lay open to his hand, he would be actually, though perhaps not potentially, richer than his neighbour. All which is a parable.

The difference that obtains between Christians is not one of grace, but of the use we make of grace. That there are diversities of gift is manifest, and there always will be a vast difference between those who have five talents and those who have two, in the amount of work done for the kingdom of God. But as far as our inheritance of God is concerned, there are no preferences, no step-children's portions, no arbitrary distinctions. It is not as under the laws of primogeniture, that one child takes all, while the younger children are dismissed with meagre allowances. Each soul has the whole of God. God gives Himself to each. He cannot give more, He will not give less than Himself.

If then you would know why it is that some of God's children live lives so much fuller and richer than others, you must seek it in the differences of their appropriation of God. Some have learnt the happy art of receiving and utilising every square inch (if we may use the expression) of that knowledge of God which has been revealed to them. They have laid all God's revealed character under contribution. They have raised harvests of bread out of the Incarnation; and vintages of blood-red grape from the scenes of Gethsemane and Calvary; and pomegranates and all manner of fruit out of the mysteries of the Ascension and the gift of the Holy Ghost. In hours of weakness they draw on God's power; in those of suffering, on his patience; in those of misunderstanding and hatred, on his vindication; in those of apparent defeat and despair, on the promises that gleam over the smoke of the battle, as the Cross before the gaze of Constantine; in death itself, on the life and immortality which find their home in the being of Jehovah.

Begin to make more of God. Do not be content to pray to Him, but make use of Him. His precious things await appropriation. Learn what it is to lift your heart in every moment of need, and to inhale by a deep spiritual inspiration just that quality in Him which is appropriate to your need, and when claimed, dare to believe it is yours, though you have no other evidence than his Word.

The analogy that we have quoted, however, fails us utterly in its final working out. The emigrant at last covers his estate, its mines become exhausted, its forests levelled, its soil impoverished; but when a million years have passed, the nature of God will lie before us as utterly unexplored and unexhausted, as when the first-born son of light commenced like a Columbus in the spiritual realm to explore the contents of the illimitable continent—God.

When we were children, the map of Africa gave us a few scattered names around the coast line, but the great interior was blank. Modern maps containing the results of the explorations of Livingstone, Stanley, Burton, tell another story of river, savannah, table-land, and of myriads of inhabitants. Probably, ere long the whole will have been opened up to European civilisation and commerce. But with God this shall never be. We shall never know the far-away springs of the Niles and Congos of his nature, we shall never unravel the innermost secret of his being.

Eph. i. 18. God's Inheritance in the Saints. What an extraordinary combination. It is a mystery that God should find his inheritance and portion in the love of men and women like ourselves. But that he should find the riches of glory in them! this passes thought. It can only be explained by a piece of farming that I learnt recently.

The other day, when travelling in Scotland, I was introduced to some farmers whose soil was naturally of the poorest description, and yet, in answer to my inquiries, I found that they were able to raise crops of considerable weight and value. This seemed to me very extraordinary. Out of nothing, noth comes, is the usual rule. But they unravelled mystery by telling me that they put in, in enrichi manure, all that they took out in the days of gol harvest.

Is not this the secret of any grace or wealth th is in Christian lives. Not unto us, not unto but unto Thee, O Christ of God, be the glory! Wh ever Thou dost get out of us, Thou must first put And all the crops of golden grain, all the fruits Christian grace, are Thine from us, because Th hast by thy blood and tears, by the sunshine of love, and the rain of Thy grace, enriched natu which in themselves were arid as the desert barren as the sand.

But we must see to it that we keep nothing ba There must be no reserve put on any part of being. Spirit, soul, and body must be freely yiel to the great Husbandman. We, who are Go tillage, must make no bargain with his ploughsha and withhold no acre from the operations of Spirit.

This is the curse of Christian living. Here is reason why God is so little to us. We are me enough to wish to make all we can of God, and give Him as little as possible of ourselves. But it a compact that will not hold. Love will only g itself to love. The shadows of secrecy or rese on either side will blight a friendship in which the conditions seem perfectly adjusted. And ma a life that might grow rich in its heritage of God dwindled and marred, because it sets a limitat on God's heritage of itself.

Give all thou hast to God. As He bought, so Him possess, everything. He will fence and k thee. He will bring fruit out of thy rockiest natu as the Norwegians raise crops on every scrap of s on their mountain slopes. He will put into th the grace that thou shalt give back to Him in fr He will win for Himself a great name, as He tu thy desert places into gardens, and makes wildernesses blossom as the rose.

THE TROOPING SEASON.

It was an interesting sight last week to see four Indian troopships lying in Portsmouth Harbo Serapis, Malabar, Crocodile, and Euphrates, w "Heaven's light our guide" emblazoned on th bows, and their distinguishing hues of green, bla yellow, and blue on their newly painted wh sides, waiting alongside the embarkation jetty their annual contingent of young warriors for far-distant Eastern possession. The Serapis the firs vessel to start last Thursday, and she be followed by the others at intervals of abou week, each in their turn bringing back men valided home, on furlough, or whose time is pired, till the trooping season comes to an end abo next April. The Serapis had on board the regime of 5th Dragoon Guards, 600 strong, besides drafts the different regiments out in India, numbering all upwards of 1200 men.

The workers from the Soldiers' Institute, Por mouth, were well to the front, as they always a on these occasions, giving parting advice a counsel. The commanding officer of the Cava Depôt, Canterbury, might be seen going from group of men to another, bidding good-bye a giving a word in season. As night drew on, a some amount of quietness was secured, meetings w held in different parts of the vessel, and individu conversations took place.

During the trooping season, the workers at Soldiers' Institute would be glad to welcome Chr tian men, and introduce them to their comrades Christ on board, if the names were forwarded. can get the names where there are Soldiers' Hon or Y.M.C.A.'s at work amongst soldiers, but a number of depôts we have no means of communi tion, except through the medium of the pre Printed forms to fill up with names will be forward on application to me.

PROSELYTISM IN TAHITI.—In the course of very interesting communication, dated Papie May 2, given in the September issue of the Jour des Missions Evangéliques, M. Brunel says:—" weeks ago a Roman Catholic Bishop and seve monks and nuns arrived at Tahiti. The same s brought eight Mormons. More recently a Seven day Adventist mission boat from America anchored before Papiete; it is distributing age more or less throughout Polynesia."

Apocalyptic Scenes.

XXVI.

THE "YEAR DAY" PRINCIPLE.

It is desirable at this point, having come to the ose of the first main series of visions, and before ommencing our examination of the second, to ex- lain what is known as the Year Day Principle of nterpreting the chronological periods mentioned in he Apocalypse, and to state the grounds on hich that principle is based.

The principle is briefly that a day in symbolic ophecy represents a year; consequently, a month ould represent thirty years, and 1260 days, or 42 onths, 1260 years. The grounds on which this rinciple rest are as follows:—

1. In a symbolic prophecy, it would clearly be incon- ruous, or out of keeping with the rest of the revela- on if, while all the events prefigured therein were con- eyed by means of hieroglyphs, the chronological eriods contained in it were described by literal rms. It is, to say the least, a reasonable assump- on that the same method would be employed in oth cases.

2. Such a method would be specially adapted to ecure the double object of the prophecy, viz., to onceal while revealing, and to reveal while con- ealing. This was essential to the evident purpose f God that the Church should be kept in a state of onstant watchfulness and expectation of her Lord's turn. Yet He knew Himself, as we all know now, at nearly two thousand years would intervene tween the departure and the return of the Lord sus Christ. To have stated this plainly the prophecy which foretold in enigmatical nguage the history of that long interval, ould at once have deprived the early Chris- ns of the incentive to watchfulness; for ey would naturally have argued that there could no possible advantage in watching for an event ich Christ had told them could not occur for any centuries. By employing a hieroglyph, the eaning of which would not be, and, indeed, was ot, apprehended for a very long time, to describe e periods which were to be the measure of certain ents in history, the truth was revealed, as by all e other symbols in the Apocalypse, and at the me time concealed from those whose watchful ndition of soul depended upon their being ignorant the duration of this dispensation.

3. Taking, then, for granted that in order to tain these two objects—namely, the harmonious inciple of construction, a composition of the pro- ecy (that is, by the uniform employment of mbols) and the concealment from those from om it was important to conceal the length of the sponsation, the next position to be established is at of the suitability of the symbol used to denote ronological periods. Now it is clear that the mbol must be on the same scale as the other sym- ls employed. The scale observed in the Revela- on is a minature one. A great empire is repre- nted by a wild beast, a kingdom or dynasty by a rn, the Church by a woman, and so on. To have opted a totally different scale in describing riods of duration from that employed to denote e events occurring during such periods would dently have been a complete violation of the rmony of the book. The scale must be propor- onate; and to signify a year by a day, or its 0th part, is the employment of the same miniature ale of representation which applies to the scenery the great drama. The period of the lesser revolu- on of the earth, a day, is used as the symbol of the eater, a year.

4. The use of a day to represent a year was one hich could be gathered from other Scriptures. hus we find that the sentence on Israel in the sert ran as follows:—"After the number of the ys in which ye searched the land, even forty ys, each day for a year shall ye bear your iquities, even forty years" (Num. xiv. 34). As the elve men were types of the twelve tribes, so the rty days were typical, a representative of the forty ars. Again, Ezekiel is commanded to enact a pe, to become himself a living emblem of the use of Israel, by lying first on his left side for ree hundred and ninety days, and then on his ght side for forty days (Ezek. iv. 4). The pro- et was a type of the nation, his recumbent posi- on a type of its degradation; and as he was a iniature emblem of a large nation, so the days re a brief emblem of a long period. Therefore it is said to him, "I have appointed thee a day for a year' a day for a year" (margin).* Once more, if not absolutely as certain, it is extremely probable that our Lord adopted the same symbolic kind of expression when, announcing to "that fox" Herod the dura- tion of his ministry, which was three years, He says: "I do cures to-day and to-morrow, and the third day I shall be perfected. I must walk to-day, and to-morrow, and the day following" (Lu. xiii. 32, 33). It certainly was not literal days that our Lord meant. Did He not employ the term in the typical or symbolic sense which had already been given to it in the Old Testament?

5. The year-day principle is strongly supported by the notable instance of the seventy weeks of Dan. ix. 24. The literal translation of the expres- sion is, as is well known, "seventy sevens," and wherever the term "sevens" is used by itself in the Scripture it invariably denotes seven days. As the period predicted is proved by the fulfilment of the prophecy to have extended over a period of four hundred and ninety years, there is no alternative but to conclude that the seventy weeks, or "sevens" of days, were employed to prefigure as many weeks of years.

6. It is further supported by the instance in which it was declared that Nebuchadnezzar's mad- ness and bestial condition were to last for "seven times," Dan. iv. 16, 23, 32. These "times" are acknowledged to mean years. Seven days would have been too short for the purpose; seven centu- ries could not have applied to a man's lifetime. But while predicted as literal years, and fulfilled in literal years, they were symbols of a much longer period. The whole occurrence had a symbolical meaning. Nebuchadnezzar was a typical, or repre- sentative man; he was the representative of the long succession of Gentile rulers who were to bear sway over the earth until the coming of the Son of Man as King of Kings. The debasement of the kingdoms of this world was symbolised by his in- sanity and degradation to a bestial condition (a con- dition subsequently prefigured in the vision of ch. vii., where the four world-empires are represented by four wild beasts), and denoted the "times of the Gentiles" (Lu. xxi. 24). Seven "times" or years would consist of 2520 days, and be consequently symbolical of the 2520 years during which these "times of the Gentiles were to last."

7. The Church of Smyrna was to "have tribula- tion ten days." There is no record in history of any persecution lasting for that literal period having occurred. But the seven Churches were represen- tative of the whole church then on earth, and probably also prefigured the phases of spiritual life which would be exhibited in the Church of Christ all through the dispensation. This is evident, firstly, from the use of the number seven, denoting com- pleteness, as the seven spirits in ch. iv. denote the One Spirit in his fulness; secondly, from the call to every one that hath an ear to hear what the Spirit saith unto the Churches, and thirdly from the fact that other Churches existing at that time in Asia, e.g., that at Colosse, are not addressed. It is well known that the last great persecution of Diocletian lasted for exactly ten years, namely, from A.D. 303 to A.D. 313.

8. That "the three days and a-half" during which the witnesses lie unburied (Rev. xi., 9) are symbolic, is proved by the fact that "we have about thirty passages in Scripture, where three days are men- tioned to define an interval, and four where four days occur; but nowhere else is the fraction of a day introduced into such a measurement of time. . . . If the Holy Spirit had intended natural days only, would He have used a preciseness in the statement of time, which is nowhere else employed, in nearly forty examples, not even in that most important of all instances, the resurrection of our Lord?"

9. The period of the domination of "the beast" is fixed (Rev. xiii. 5), as forty-and-two months. He was to be the eighth (though also of the seven) head mentioned in ch. xvii. 9-11. Of these five had fallen, the sixth was in existence in John's day, the seventh was to continue a short space, the eighth was to last for forty-two months. Thus the whole interval from A.D. 96, the date of the Apoca- lypse, to the destruction of the beast, is divided into three parts—the remainder of the sixth head, the "short space" of the seventh, and the forty-two months of the eighth head, or "the beast." Now, since the first is only a remainder, and the second expressly predicted as short, we should naturally expect the third to be the longest in duration. The whole period is already 1800 years; how, then, is it possible to suppose the third to be only three years and a-half? The second, in that case, must be still less, and the first, a fractional remainder of the sixth, would have to be extended over the whole of the rest of the time. If, however, the forty-two months denote 1260 years, all is harmonious and intelligible.

A supposed objection has been taken to the year- day principle, on the ground that it would require the thousand years, or millennium, to last for "three hun- dred and sixty thousand years." But this, though at first sight plausible, has really no force. The reason for expressing in hieroglyphs the different chrono- logical periods mentioned in the prophecies which related to the dispensation to elapse during our Lord's absence was probably that the Church should be kept in ignorance, for a very long time indeed, of the length of the interval. This, as we have seen, was es- sential if she was to occupy an attitude of watchful expectation of her Lord's return. The periods in question are therefore described in a variety of ways, the longest of them being expressed by three different terms—"a time, a times, and half a time:" a thousand, two hundred, and three-score "days," and "forty and two months." This fact is alone sufficient to lead to the supposition that the expressions had a mysterious character, and were designed to convey a hidden meaning.

But when this dispensation has been wound up, when the time of waiting is over, and there is no longer any need for watchfulness, the Church being with the Lord, it is no more necessary to conceal the period of her reigning with Him (prior to the everlasting state) by means of mysterious and vary- ing symbols. It is therefore expressed by one and the same term, "a thousand years," no less than six times. The hieroglyph is no more required. The year-day principle obtains no longer.

Such are the main grounds on which the Year Day principle rests. And it is believed that the more carefully and candidly they are examined the stronger will they appear. Assuming the principle to be true, one most important conclusion follows. If the "times," "months," and "days" referred to above are to be understood literally, the "seven- eighth" head of the beast—in fact, the beast itself —may be, as contended by some, an individual. If, on the contrary, they are to be regarded as symbols, in which a day stands for a year, then the period of its domination must be twelve hundred and sixty years, and the beast must denote, not an individual, but a succession of individuals, or powers.

[The arguments briefly given in this paper will be found in more extended form in Professor Birks' "Elements of Prophecy," the Rev. E. B. Elliott's "Horæ Apocalypticæ," and the Rev. Dr. Grattan Guinness' "The Approaching End of the Age." It is from those works that I have drawn much that is advanced in the foregoing paper.]

* Note.—It may be objected that both these periods, being predicted in years and fulfilled in years, the literal fulfilment of chronological prophecies is to be expected. But in these instances the prophecies were not symbolical. The point is that in each of them a day is divinely appointed as the type or representation of a year, the prophecy an- nounces that the type will be realised in years.

COLPORTAGE IN HERTFORDSHIRE.—Mr. Cop- ping has continued his labours in Hertfordshire throughout the past year, in the course of which he has visited nearly the whole of the county. He has also paid visits to Romford and Colchester in Essex. Mr. Copping will be glad to receive a supply of Bishop Ryle's "Gospel Tracts," which should be sent to him at 27, Villiers-street, Hertford.

THE BARCELONA PROTESTANT COTTAGE HOS- PITAL has for its principal object the care of mem- bers of Evangelical Churches and foreign Protestants who need medical skill and nursing. Besides these, persons more or less interested in the truth, and whose consciences reject the teaching of Rome, to which they would have to submit if they entered the Roman Catholic hospital in the city, have also been received. The report for last year states that thirty- eight patients were treated, receiving a total of 1107 days' nursing, so giving an average of about three per day throughout the year. Of these, twenty-three left the Hospital perfectly cured, five more or less benefited, three died, and seven remained under treatment on December 31. The patients have been mostly Spaniards, members of various Evangelical congregations in Barcelona and neighbourhood; but, besides these, there have been nine foreigners—of French nationality, five; German, two; English, one; and Swiss, one. Reports and information will be gladly furnished by Miss A. Von Mieleçka, care of the vicar, St. John's Vicarage, Ryde, Isle of Wight.

For the Young.

THE STORY OF A WASP.

I suppose that most of my young readers have had the opportunity of watching that singularly beautiful creature, which, in the months of summer will often come "buzzing" about us in the garden path, or, finding its way through an open window, will pay us an occasional visit at our morning meal. Its presence usually fills us with considerable fear, for to be stung by a wasp is by no means a pleasant experience; yet we must remember that that sting, lying in its tail, is after all its only means of protection and defence, and that it will scarcely ever harm us unless we foolishly begin the attack.

I have often thought when I have been watching the ant, the bee, the common house-fly, and the spider, what a vast amount of pleasure my young friends might derive if they would but take the trouble of finding out all that may be known of of these interesting little creatures. And now for my story.

I was seated at breakfast one bright summer morning not long since, when, the window being open, in came Master "Wapsie" buzzing around me, and finally settling, strange to say, on the edge of my cup. I was just about to pour the drains of my tea into the basin at my side, when suddenly "Wapsie" capsised, and tumbled headlong into the bottom of the basin. There it lay on its back, tossing about, and vainly seeking to regain its former position. At first the plunging, kicking and struggling were of a most desperate character, and every moment I expected to see the little creature again on its feet and making for liberty!

But, alas! this was not to be! There it lay, with its head just sufficiently raised above its body to prevent it from drowning, its tail moving incessantly to and fro, whilst its tiny legs and feelers were exerting themselves to their utmost capacity, battling with the air, and seeking to find something upon which to cling and thus deliver their owner from its perilous position.

Round the bottom of the basin the little creature wriggled its way on its back, making one or two vain attempts to climb the slippery sides, but only to fall back again into its former position, there, I knew, to lie, struggle, and presently die! All this, of course, happened in far less time than it has taken me to tell you, and I was determined to release it. Putting my hand carefully into the basin, and placing the handle of a small knife close to the feet of the little creature, I noticed that instantly its tiny feet seized the handle of the knife, when I gently lifted both from the basin, and placed the wasp on the white cloth which covered my table.

Was it grateful, do you ask? That I cannot say. Perhaps it was like some boys and girls whom I happen to know who scarcely understand what gratitude is, and take every kindness shown to them as a mere matter of course. One thing, however, I did know, and that was that it gave me real pleasure to be kind even to a wasp! Kindness always brings its own reward. No sooner had the little creature been removed from the basin and placed in a condition of safety, than the cleaning and drying process began, and most interesting it was, I can assure you, to watch the manner in which it quickly cleaned first its wings, then its head, and finally its body, the whole process occupying about two minutes. I then noticed that it lifted its wings as if to see whether all was ready for its departure, and the next moment away it soared gaily into the sunshine!

That, my young friends, is the "story of the wasp." And now what lessons do you think that simple incident taught me? Well, first, I was reminded that, beautiful though the wasp was, it possessed the power of inflicting great pain by means of its poisonous sting; and I could not help recalling the fact that while God had made us in the "likeness of Himself," we too might cause an immense amount of pain by that little member, the unruly tongue. I thought of the number of tears and broken hearts that had been produced by a tongue that had learnt to sting; and how necessary it was for all who wished to make others happy to pray continually "Keep Thou the door of my lips."

Another lesson taught me was this—that in a thoughtless and unlooked-for moment we may suddenly be plunged into a condition of great danger. Little did that wasp, with its fine silken wings, expect to be so quickly and easily capsised, and to find itself the next moment in a place of peril, lying helplessly on its back, and likely in a very short time to be drowned! You and I, like that wasp, when we think that we are quite safe, may suddenly fall under the power of some unexpected temptation, and unless we are constantly prepared, and on the watch against sin, may be overthrown, and find ourselves quite unable to regain our former position of happiness and peace. What need, therefore, that we should ever make the prayer of the Psalmist ours, "Hold up my goings in thy path, that my footsteps slip not."

The next lesson: I noticed that the wings which God had given to the wasp, and which enabled it to soar in the air, after it had fallen into the basin, instead of becoming a help proved a hindrance, and only tended to prevent the poor creature from crawling even to the sides of the basin when it desired to do so. And I could not help reminding myself that sometimes to-day the very gifts and graces that God has given to us may, if we fall into sin, become a means of keeping us down, and of hindering us even in our attempts to rise again to a new and better life. The grown-up people who happen to read these lines will understand, perhaps better than you can possibly do just now, what I am trying to convey, but in years to come you will learn the sad lesson that some of our greatest privileges and blessings (our talents, for instance, and our money) may, if we sink into sin, become the means of dragging us down lower and yet lower as the years roll by (for the loftier the height the deeper the fall), until at last we perish "without God and without hope."

Just one other lesson, and it was this—After the wasp had fallen, and as it lay helpless on its back, it must certainly have been drowned had I not gone to the rescue. It could not possibly have saved itself! Neither can we. Fallen, helpless, and lying in our sin, we, too, need a Saviour. Jesus has come to be that Saviour, and to do that for us which we could never accomplish for ourselves. He saw that there was no eye to pity, and no arm to save, therefore his own arm brought salvation. And as He stands before us, stretching out his strong hand to deliver us, let us pray that our faith, like the tiny feet of the wasp, may lay hold of and cling to Him, and we shall then find that He will lift us up out of our sins, deliver us from their power, and we shall soar away on joyful wings to dwell "in the heavenly places" and in the sweet sunshine of his own dear love. Boys and girls, don't forget the "story of the wasp!"

SAY "NO."

Haggai ii. 12.

BY HENRY THORNE, EVANGELIST.

We fight for the right
With a masterful foe:
And if we would win
We must learn to say "No!"

'Tis easily said
With the tithe of a breath;
Yet on it may hang
The great issue of death.

When tempted in bye-paths
Of evil to go,
'Tis best to reply with A positive "No!"

When evil approaches
To darken our way,
"No" lifts up a protest
And waves it away.

When in the saved soul
Satan seeks for a place,
This brave little "No!"
Shuts the door in his face.

When Satan appears
As an angel of light,
"No" always declines
To be gulled by the sight.

The guardian of goodness,
To evil a foe,
A friend of the soul is
That little word "No!"

O Thou who wast tempted
While dwelling below,
Enable thy servants,
Like Thee, to say "No!"

"I'VE KNOWED WHAT IT IS."

Are any of our helpers given to grumbling at their food? Do they sometimes say they don like rice-pudding, and they won't eat plain brea and-butter? Do they sometimes get in tempe because mother insists that this or that must eaten? Some children do behave in this way, b we'll hope they do not belong to the League Pity. Still, in case there should be one or tw black sheep—or should one say black lambs?— amongst our helpers, let them listen to this litt story.

Some small boys at tea: one of them giving hi self great airs, saying he "certainly should not e stuff like that," pointing with scorn to the good, whol some bread-and-butter before him. The other bo thought him a very fine fellow, Charlie being a so of leader amongst them. They got quite defiant last to the kind matron who was giving them the tea, insisting that bread-and-butter they would n eat, and bread and jam they would have! Present a little voice was heard from the other end of th table, and Freddy D——, one of our shelt children, spoke. "Please hand me the bread-an butter," said he; "ain't I just glad to have it! Y see, I've know'd what it is to be starving!" Th boys finished the despised bread-and-butter witho more ado.—League of Pity Paper.

MISSIONARY MEETING ON THE SANDS.

Perhaps the sands at Exmouth have never be turned to a better use than they were on the afte noon of Thursday, August 24. Friends had be invited to meet to hear an address on the work the C.M.S. in Uganda. The young friends were s to work to gather shells and seaweed to enable o of the workers (Mr. Harry Lloyd) to make a map Africa on the sands. The size of the map w eight yards square, and after the sand had be flattened and watered, and the parallels of latitu and longitude carefully drawn, the coast line w formed with shells, shaded with seaweed, a places of importance marked with large labe There were about 300 people present at the mee ing, and many were the remarks made on t accuracy and beauty of the map. For more tha an hour, under a hot sun, all listened intently the story of the spread of the Gospel in that da land.

NOTES ON DAILY READINGS.

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 17.—PSALM XXXVIII.

The Psalmist reminds God of his dependence upon Him, and tells the story of his sorrows (1-14). Perhaps he was suffering from bodily pain, or it may be that he uses the figure of severe physical disease to describe his spiritual anguish. Heart and flesh fail, as sore pain sweeps in successive paroxysms over him. Simultaneously with this there was a deep consciousness of sin. "Mine iniquities are gone over my head" like sea-billows. Moreover his friends stood apart, and enemies came near. It is thus that at times accumulated griefs betake us, and we are as a dismasted, rudderless vessel that rolls in the hollow of the waves, threatened with destruction. But amid all, our desires may constantly rise up to God (9), and there may be the comfortable assurance that He is nigh at hand, sitting like a refiner at the crucible, careful that the pain should not be excessive, and waiting until his own face is reflected in the metal.

As in so many other psalms, this gets more hopeful as it approaches its end (15-22). The Psalmist rises from desire to hope, and to an assurance that his God will answer. He confesses his sin, he rests in God his salvation. O troubled heart, remember how much in this psalm was applicable to thy Lord. He has trodden these burning coals before thee, He knows thy sorrows, and He sympathises as only a fellow sufferer can. He will haste and save thee.

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 18.—PSALM XXXIX.

In the opening verses (1-3) David describes the circumstance out of which this psalm sprang. The presence of the wicked had stirred him to the quick, but he had carefully refrained his speech. There are hot moments in our lives when we do well not to say all that is in our heart. But if our feelings must express themselves, then let us get alone, and speak out our heart to God. A softened tone settles on our speech as soon as we enter into his calm and holy presence.

The frailty of man (4-6). How frail we are! Not only in our physical life, but in our resolves. No autumn leaf more so. And when we think of eternity and glory of God, how wonderful it is that He should take notice of us! We are but vanity, as breath (5), and our walk through this world is like the shadow careering over the mountain side, which before you can cry, Behold! is gone. Let us not, therefore, be disquieted by what men are, or speak, or do.

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 19.—PSALM XL.

This psalm follows appropriately upon the two former, in which the Psalmist has been detailing his sufferings. Here he celebrates deliverance. But a greater than David is here. Heb. x. 5 puts verses 6-8 into the lips of Christ, and we can hear his voice speaking through these olden words. In deep distress (1-3), the soul has no alternative but to wait patiently until the Lord inclines and hears. The horrible pit is a "pit of roaring," that is, of roaring waters. What Jeremiah experienced literally (Jer. xxviii. 6-12) we pass through in our spiritual experience. God will leave no child of his there, but will lift us to stand upon the rock and will fill our mouths with new songs.

When we are delivered let us put our gladness to music, and embody it in consecration (4-10). Let us not hide God's love in our hearts, but tell it out. The bored ear (6) in reference to Ex. xxi. 6, means obedience for ever, utter consecration, the submission of the will. This is dearer to God than ceremonial observance. Let our coming feet and willing obedience always answer the call of the Book, and let us seek to do God's will with delight. Righteousness, faithfulness, salvation, lovingkindness, and truth, what themes are these!

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 20.—PSALM XLI.

Again we stand in the shadowed chamber of suffering. These four psalms all bear marks of physical anguish, and celebrate that watchful care that broods over the lonely hours we spend away from the busy engagements of life. The Psalmist draws the contrast between those that considered him in his pain (1-3) and his enemies who spoke evil against him (4-12).

Look after God's poor, and God will care for you in the day of evil. The blessings that you have sought to give will come back to your own soul. The Lord will put his everlasting arms for you to rest on, and He will turn, or change, your bed when you are sick (R.V. marg.). What a lovely conception of God as the nurse in the room where feet need to be velvet-shod, and voices to speak in their softest tones.

The enemy takes advantage of our weakness. Our sin is the occasion for his attack. Whether it be our direst foe, the evil one, or false friends, or open enemies, they take advantage of us in hours of pain, as the birds of the desert gather around the drooping camel. But there is One who never leaves or forsakes. He delights in his own equally when the beauty or health is devoured by corruption as when it flushes the face, for his delight in his saints depends upon his everlasting love, and the redemption which is in Jesus Christ. Let us claim his upholding grace, and ask that we may be set before his face for ever.

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 21.—PSALM XLII.

The Waterbrooks (1-3).—Oh, to yearn for God like this. The gazelle suffers much from thirst in its arid plains, beside being often heated in the chase. It brays for water. But who of us has felt thus in spiritual longing for God? What a comparison between God and a living fountain of water, always fresh, leaping up amid the rocks, cooling the sultry air and filling it with music! We can never quench our thirst on the salt brine of our tears, but our God will do more than allay the fever-crave. He will be in us a spring of water that leaps up to everlasting life.

The Blessed Past (4-6).—Exiled to the Hermons, beyond the Jordan, the fugitive recalls the splendid pomp of the house of God, and the festive joy of the crowds in which he had shared; and the memory, by force of contrast, makes his isolation and loneliness the harder to bear. "Why droopest thou, O my soul, and frettest so upon me?" We remember the lines that tell of the peaceful hours once enjoyed, and the Holy Dove driven from the breast. The similar experience of a later minstrel.

The Bitter Present (7-11).—The deep of soul anguish within is answered by the deep of hapless circumstance without. It were enough to make the soul think that God had forgotten and forsaken. And the taunts of the ungodly, Where is thy God? are like dagger-stabs in the heart. It is awful to think that the worst insinuations of our foes are finding some shadow of justification in God's apparent abandonment of the soul that clung to Him. But amid all these is the throb of hope. He remembers the past, but he also remembers God (6). He encourages his soul to hope. He assures himself repeatedly that he shall yet praise Him for these very sorrows. He is sure that Divine loving kindness will come at dawn, whilst he sings through the night. He says that the health which goes forth from God's face (5) rests upon his own (11), and makes it flush with the glow of returning vigour (Kay).

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 22.—PSALM XLIII.

Outcast from his kingdom, the Psalmist appeals to God to plead his cause (1). When we are wronged let us take our complaint to God. He will avenge us speedily. Christ pleads our cause in the court of heaven, and against all the accusations of hell. He also delivers from deceitful and unjust men.

Mark these names for God in these two psalms. God of my life: God of my strength: God, the gladness of my joy (4 R.V. marg.) Speak well of thy God, even though his back seems turned upon thee!

Thy light and thy truth (3) may refer to the Urim and Thummim. That would indicate that our way home should be tested by constant appeals to God for direction. Or we may think of these two as guardian angels, conducting us home, while goodness and mercy follow.

O God, teach us how to love Thee, and exult in Thee, as this sweet singer did. Let our nature be as a well-tuned harp swept by thy touch and making music. Thus shall our souls lift themselves again into the light, and begin to wait with new hope.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 23.—PSALM XLIV.

What God Did (1-3).—The land of Canaan was God's distinct gift to his people. Joshua and his mighty men did little more than present themselves before the armies of their foes, God scattered them. So our inheritance of spiritual blessing is not won by our efforts or merits, but received as a gift. Jesus procured it for us with sweat of blood.

Therefore Heroic Trust (4-8).—God does not live only in the past, He is the same to-day as yesterday, and if we are living in fellowship with Him, occupying the position and doing the work He has assigned to us, we shall find Him fighting for us. But you must own Him as your King, if you expect Him to command deliverance for you.

A Sorrowful Confession (9-22).—In spite of all that God has done, or is willing to do, we sometimes seem exposed to hopeless defeat, oppression, and misfortune, "sore broken and trodden down so as to be a haunt of jackals and covered with the death shade" (19). At all such times let us retain our integrity. It may be that there is no controversy on God's side with us, that we have not forgotten Him, or dealt falsely with his covenant. If we have, we must repent, and do the first works. But if we are not conscious of heart-declension, then we have a perfect right to pour out our souls, in the arousing appeals with which the psalm closes, and be sure that God will answer speedily (23-26).

INTERNATIONAL S. S. LESSONS.

SEPTEMBER 24.

REVIEW OF THE QUARTER'S LESSONS.

GOLDEN TEXT, ROM. x. 17.

Paul's visit to Europe, with which this series began, took place during his second missionary journey, about A.D. 52. His imprisonment in Rome, with which the series closes, extended from A.D. 61 to 63. All the remarkable events intervening were crowded into about ten years of the Apostle's life. No man ever did in so short a time a work so great, and fraught with such mighty issues, and in spite of such powerful opposition.

Very few notes are necessary for review. Let the places visited, or the most prominent ones be pointed out on the map, and recall some of the features peculiar to each place, and the chief incidents which occurred. This will serve to illustrate the golden text. In every place where the Apostle preached the Word of God, it proved itself adapted to the people, and was received by faith with some.

The lessons of the series may be gathered from noticing:

1. The opposition which Paul had to meet.—Every place visited will furnish some illustration of this. Who were his most powerful adversaries? and how did they seek to oppose him?

2. The use God often made of these opposers.—He not only defeated them; but He made their efforts to further his own designs. The evil spirit possessing the maid at Philippi led Paul into the prison where the jailor's family were converted. The opposition of the Jews in Jerusalem only helped to carry Paul as a witness for Christ to Rome. All God's adversaries are sure to be outwitted, however successful they may appear to be.

(3) The power which accompanied Paul in every case.—Men might oppose him, but they could not ignore him. They might speak contemptuously of his message, but they were bound to acknowledge the power that rested upon him. Kings, governors, rulers, are influenced by him; and on the ship during the wreck he is a much more important individual than the captain. Learn to regard a life as successful, not when its outward circumstances are favourable, but when it is manifestly lived in God's company.

(4) The helpers God raised up for Paul.—Elicit the names of some. These prevented the apostle from being discouraged.

(5) The contrast between Paul and others.—Place over against him such persons as Felix, Festus, Agrippa, Drusilla, Bernice. Their earthly position was much superior to his, but who would not choose Paul's position and prospects rather than theirs? But these persons are representatives of similar characters to-day. They were brought within reach of the Gospel; some of them were powerfully affected by it, but none of them yielded to it. Their conscience and their judgment were in revolt against their passions; they knew the right, but were not willing to forsake their sin. Be not imitators of them.

MAURITIUS.—Dr. Symons, late Royal Horse Artillery, writes to us from Funchal, Madeira:—"A letter just received from the Archdeacon of Mauritius informs me that in the progress of a fire which has devastated the principal business part of Port Louis, the Temperance Institute, a large establishment which was organised a few years ago for the benefit of sailors and soldiers especially, has been totally destroyed. Prior to the opening of the Temperance Institute, there was no place in Mauritius where sailors on shore could obtain rest and refreshment, without resorting to one of the numerous houses where strong drink is sold. Archdeacon Matthews, who kindly consented to be president of the Rest and Institute when I vacated the post on my departure from Mauritius, is anxious that the work should continue. Outstanding accounts have to be met, and from £100 to £200 are urgently required. On account of the late disastrous hurricane, and for other reasons, very little money can be collected on the spot for temperance work. Communications may be forwarded to the Archdeacon at Port Louis."

Sketches from Sicily.—3.

BY REV. O. GOLIA-MAURO, GIRGENTI.

CHRISTIAN AND SOCIAL WORK IN GROTTE.

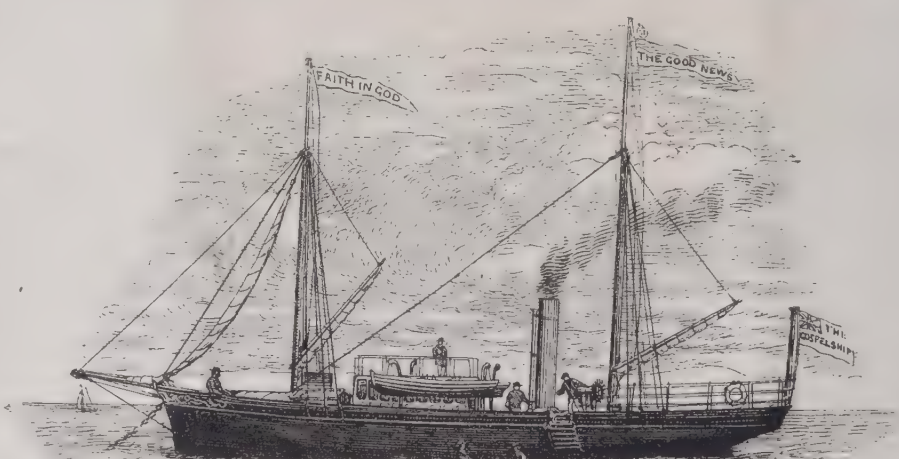
Who speaks of Grotte, speaks of one of the most turbulent places in Sicily. This country town, of which the foundation dates to an epoch much more ancient than Rome, has something really savage about its customs. Thus the women will dress themselves in men's clothes, go out in the evening and effect their vengeance, for weapon often wearing a long knife under the skirt. Nothing can be more dreadful than the murders committed during the carnival. Mothers and wives, after having expected in vain the son or husband during the night, find in the morning on the doorstep their dear one in a pool of blood, still masked and robed in the fancy clothes of the evening before. Last autumn, within ten days, seven murders were committed, some with diabolical cruelty.

It is not then astonishing if blasphemies, gaming, and wine, play a great rôle amongst the population. The taxes are fixed in a most arbitrary manner, the poor widow paying more than a rich councillor, and when a poor workman cannot satisfy these claims, they take his chairs, tables, even the bread from the cupboard, and the pieces the children are in the act of devouring. One day an old man was transported on his bed into the street, that his hut might be seized in lieu of money to satisfy the demands.

What influence in this republic of immorality have the Roman Catholic priests and their church? None! unless for the worse; and to such a point that now the people believe nothing, and speak only to accuse them of scandals. Indeed, all know that each has one at least, if not two, concubines, and their venality, as usurers and traders in mass for the souls in purgatory, forms a large part of general conversation, as well as that they are priests simply for a living. One of them, who lives openly in sin, and ridicules the pretended miracle of the mass, was asked, "But why are you a priest?" "Oh," he replied, "it is a trade like any other." This same I have seen direct the procession of S. Joseph. The one carried in triumph and religiously adored by the multitude as the husband of the Virgin Mary, was the old road-sweeper, who, an hour after, was dragging himself quite drunk along the street, and with his indecent buffoonery making those laugh who before had worshipped him as saint.

It is in such surroundings that our little church, with its forty-six members, detaches itself from all superstition and corruption. By the side of the church are our day schools, which this winter have received 200 children (the workmen proudly speak of them as "our schools"), the night school with its 120 scholars, all miners, and the catechumen class with twenty-nine pupils. From the latter, one was received into the church at Pentecost — quite an exception for her age, a young girl of thirteen years, but her seriousness, her clear ideas, her ripe character, the opposition that she encounters in her family, where she evangelizes continually, make her a little exceptional Christian.

All this did not seem enough to the elder Signor Dimino, who desired an independent sphere of activity, where he could work in view of social and spiritual good. So last spring, he, with three young deacons, started a circolo (circle), which they named Savonarola, with the aim of reformation in the ideas and manners of the village. Our evangelicals became the heart and head of the circolo, which soon saw its numbers increase to sixty. They have a reading-room always open, with papers and religious books. Popular lectures have been given on drunkenness, gaming, the Day of Rest, blasphemy, mass, the Ten Commandments, etc. An old man of eighty years of age, but still young in energy, although a Catholic, said to me one day, "I have never wished to belong to any society in my life, but I am one of the circolo, because there they speak of the Gospel, and go forward with the Gospel," and such is indeed the case. There our leaders find many opportunities for religious conversation, and I myself occasionally have spoken of Christ to sixty or 100 persons, united to talk together of a Sunday.



But as Grotte is essentially a mining place, our brethren, not yet satisfied, began to ask themselves if they could not find means of exercising a good influence on all these workmen of the worst kind.

SIGNOR DIMINO.

So in February last our elder and deacons laid the foundation of a workmen's society, "Fascio dei lavoratori," which after a few months has already attained to 1000 members. It provides doctor, medicines, and other helps to the families, and, what is still more important, arouses the conscience through the influence and Christian energy of those who direct it. For example, it is forbidden in the rules to those belonging to the Fascio to get intoxicated, to game, to blaspheme, and most marvellously since its existence crime has diminished to almost nothing. In this manner the salt of the Gospel penetrates all the life of the population.

Last spring the workmen were all on strike. The authorities sent to the spot a company of soldiers, but force could not hold back that mass; arms were on the point of being used, when all at once they saw on a balcony a young man—it was one of the deacons, who persuaded the multitude calmly to disperse. His influence was stronger than 100 soldiers with their guns. This same young man, with the courage of a John the Baptist, discoursed one day in open air, before more than 600 workmen, against adultery and concubinage. The gentlemen of the municipality, bitten to the quick by the tooth of truth, accused him as an exciter of disorder, and by base untruths got him fined 25 francs. That did not touch the courage of our reformers, whose lives were menaced more than once in the corners of the streets; they surprised men with revolvers under their mantles, who awaited them on several occasions. But God preserved them miraculously, as one said to me, and they have ever more and more the esteem of the population. It is to these that people run for counsel, and, in fact, place themselves in their hands. When one dies, it is no longer the priest whom they call, as formerly, but the heads of the Fascio, so that often on the road to the cemetery one sees the cortège being led by the elder, Signor Dimino, or one of the deacons, who, arriving at the spot, proclaim Christ and the resurrection to sometimes 300, sometimes 500, and sometimes even 1000 persons.

MR. HENRY COOK'S GOSPEL SHIP.

(See conclusion of sketch, page 18.)

THE LATE MR. LOWITZ.

I am sure the many friends of the late Rev. James Lowitz, of Algiers, will regret with me his sudden removal. The English winter residents in that charming resort ever found, in his kindness of heart, every welcome and courteous attention which his long residence enabled him to give, and as an elder in the Presbyterian Church, built by the munificence of the late Sir Peter Coats, he will be greatly missed with his congenial smile and ever-ready help.

He had been suffering much for some time from rheumatism, and sought relief from a course of the baths at Aix-les-Bains, and wrote home cheerfully expecting relief from their use; but ere his letter arrived he was suddenly carried off by cerebral hemorrhage on August 27, in his sixty-eighth year, to the heartfelt grief of his beloved wife.

From the year 1851 he was engaged as a missionary to the Jews, under the direction of the British Society for the Propagation of the Gospel among the Jews, and laboured in Morocco, Tunis, Gibraltar, and Algeria; and his great experience and knowledge of the languages spoken in North Africa induced the Committee of the British and Foreign Bible Society to appoint him in 1882 as their agent for Algeria, Tunis, and Tripoli, which position he occupied up to his lamented death.

How are we made to feel by the removal of so many of the Lord's servants, the words of the Prophet Zechariah, "The fathers—where are they? and the prophets—do they live for ever?" Yes, they may pass away, but "the words and the statutes of the Lord"—"take hold." The Word of the Lord which our dear friend was employed in disseminating "endureth for ever"; his work is not lost, it abides, and has proved a word of life to many poor souls in the countries of Northern Africa.

I am sure I may be speak the sympathies of your readers for dear Mrs. Lowitz in this severe and sudden affliction, that she may be sustained by Divine grace, and strengthened in her promising work among the Spaniards of Algiers; and she knows their language. I may add that she was a great help to her husband by her sound judgment and considerable experience. She begs me to say that she would send a letter of "faire part" to many friends, but asks them to accept this notice as written by her desire for their information as her excuse for not doing so.

I may add, as a resident in Geneva, that M. Dardier, agent of the Société Evangélique de Genève, who met with a grievous accident in falling down an ascenseur, owing to feebleness of sight, and broke his arm and thigh, is now lying in a private hospital in Geneva. I saw him yesterday; he is calm and collected, and hoping soon to put his feet to the ground. I ask prayer, too, for him, as another faithful labourer.

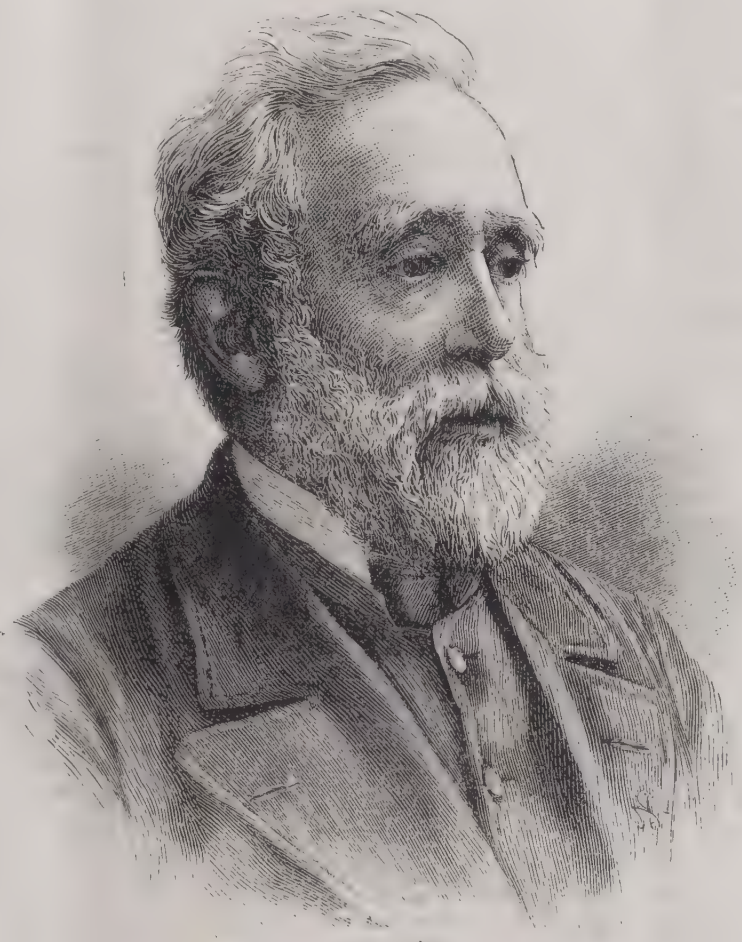
Geneva, Sept. 5.



The Late MR. HENRY COOK,

OF THE ENGLISH AND FRENCH COASTING MISSION.

THE subject of this sketch was suddenly called to his rest at the French mission house in Deauville. For over forty years, faith in God impelled and invigorated him to go forward in the service of his Master as a pioneer worker among poor neglected children, east and west country fishermen, sailors of all nations, and also, during the past few years, on the coast and rivers of France.

Henry Cook was born at Portsmouth in 1824; his father was a prosperous publican who intended bringing his son up to the "trade." At the age of fifteen he ran away from home and joined H.M.S. Revenge. For the experience gained on board this and two other men-of-war he was ever deeply thankful; for in all probability, had he never been a sailor he would not have felt so keenly interested in the men who go down to the sea in ships.

His first serious impressions seem to have been received during a severe storm while on a voyage from Gibraltar to Malta in the year 1840. He prayed for deliverance from a seafaring life, which he could not bear; and promised the Lord that he would give up sin and become a Christian, if once more permitted to reach his native land. This promise, so often made and broken by sailors in distress, was faithfully kept; and when at last, through the mercy of God, his ship was paid off on October 16, 1843, his first thought on the following Sunday was to attend the Wesleyan Chapel, Gosport. Here he heard the Gospel of the grace of God lovingly preached. After attending this ministry for some time he was led to accept the Lord Jesus Christ as his personal Saviour.

During the three years that he served in the Navy he was employed in the painters' crew, and thus having obtained a fair knowledge of that trade, he was accepted as an improver by a painter and house-decorator in the town of Gosport. About this time he joined the Wesleyan Church, and became deeply interested in the Sunday-school, where he successively filled the offices of teacher, librarian, and superintendent, besides that of society steward.

In a few years Mr. Cook commenced business for himself, and secured a large and lucrative connection. The stores and back part of his business premises were situated in the very lowest part of the town. One Sunday afternoon in 1853, meeting a crowd of ragged and shoeless boys and girls who were spending their time in sin, he was led to ask whether they did not go to Sunday school. Being answered in the negative, he asked, "Will you come to my store next Sunday afternoon and hear about the Lord Jesus?" Several readily responded, and thus the ragged school was commenced. After patient, persistent effort, love begat love, the unruly conduct of the scholars gradually changed, and he was enabled to tell them of Jesus and his love. Sunday evening services were inaugurated for the parents, and an appeal was made to the inhabitants of the town to assist in building a school and mission hall. Money came in from all parts of the country so that he was enabled to purchase ground and erect the hall. Here he started a free day-school for poor children, and opened an industrial home for destitute boys, many of whom are now holding responsible positions in naval and merchant vessels.

Very soon the boys' school became far too strait for the Sunday-evening Gospel services, besides which a place was sorely needed for the girls. So Mr. Cook and his helpers had recourse, as always, to prayer. Again the Lord heard and answered his servants' cry, and another building was added to the Mission, which is still known as the Seamen's Bethel. Previous to this, Mr. Cook felt called of God to give up his business, and give all his time to mission work, and to cast himself and family wholly upon the Lord for support.

No sketch of Mr. Cook would be complete which did not mention the names of his two friends the late Marquis and Marchioness of Cholmondeley. At the beginning of his work they sent for him and encouraged him to continue his missionary labours. For many years they gave him their prayerful and practical sympathy and support in the way of money gifts.

For visiting the ships of all sizes and sorts in the harbour and at Spithead, a large boat was secured. In this, with a crew of boys from the Industrial Home, our friend would row from vessel to vessel with his freight of Gospel books, in this way evangelising sailors of all nationalities. This interesting and encouraging work afloat led Mr. Cook to seek a vessel which might be fitted up as a Gospel ship and stationed at the entrance of Portsmouth Harbour, for the use of merchant sailors. For many years, with occasional short trips to Spithead, the lightships, St. Helens, the seat of his patron, she remained there. But presently his coast was enlarged, and at the invitation of the east country fishermen he followed them down the coast to Brixham] Plymouth, Par, and in later years even as far as Penzance. The risks run and dangers encountered in that Dutch vessel will never be known. At last she went ashore in a gale of wind, and was sold for what she would fetch. Soon after she was replaced by the Annie. In response to the earnest entreaty of several French brethren, Mr. Cook sent the new vessel over to Trouville and Honfleur, and as he was unacquainted with the language, Count Bobrinsky, a well-known Russian nobleman, filled the gap, and freely preached the Gospel to hundreds of French people. Night after night the ship was crowded with an eager, anxious throng, both below and on deck. Fruit still remains of that first French mission.

In September, 1883, a lady living in Devon invited Mr. Cook to hold a drawing-room meeting at her house. At this meeting he gave an account of the interesting work on the French coast, and told how eagerly the people came on board to hear the Word of God. This cheering news led his invalid lady friend to offer £350 towards the purchase of a new vessel for the French coast, provided a similar sum could be raised. Through the goodness of God this offer was accepted, and a new vessel, the Mystery, secured for the work. Other ports were visited, and like blessing attended the visits of the little vessel. To tell of the clear cases of conversion at the different places visited would occupy too much space. Enough to say that thousands of Romanists heard and believed the undiluted Gospel.

In 1887 a vessel was built expressly for the work, at a cost of £1250, named The Herald of Mercy. In the providing of this Gospel ship and also for meeting the needs of the work at critical seasons of need, Mr. Cook experienced in a marked way the faithfulness of a promise-keeping God.

As an outcome of many missionary visits to Trouville, a large mission house was built in that port. Seven years ago a visit of an interesting character, and followed by far-reaching and blessed results, was paid to Folkestone. The work then begun amid much opposition is still continued at the Fishermen's Bethel, built and supported by a well-known Christian gentleman residing in the town.

Despite many obstacles, Mr. Cook succeeded in getting before he died a screw steamer. She cost over £2340, is 85 feet long, and comfortably seats over 100 people. (See engraving on p. 16). Some friends feel that the trouble Mr. Cook experienced in connection with the building of the vessel, added to the anxiety of getting the money, hastened his end. Now the worker is gone. The Mission, we believe, is still to be carried on by his widow, who for the past fifteen years has been so closely associated with him. Our readers, we are sure, will pray that God's richest blessing may attend all her efforts, both in the upbringing of her three children, and in the continuance of the work which her devoted husband commenced.

Dr. Dykes on the Gospel.

Regent-square Presbyterian Church was re-opened on Sabbath last, after being closed for a time for renovation, a work which has been very effectively carried out. The preacher at the morning service was Rev. J. Oswald Dykes, D.D., whose subject was "A Gospel for the Age." Taking his text from St. Luke ii. verses 10 and 11, Dr. Dykes said: In reopening to-day, and in a sense rededicating this historic church to the sacred purposes which it has served for a period now equal to the life of two generations, it seems to me appropriate that we should review under the light of present day needs and ideas that central evangelical message of salvation which has so long been and is still to be the theme of this pulpit. The London, indeed the England, of to-day is a very different place from what it was in 1827, when Edward Irving began his meteoric ministry within these walls. Other ideas are in the air. New problems, political and social, occupy men's thoughts. In an age of change like this the intellectual and religious attitude of the public undergoes alteration with singular rapidity. And if the Christian preacher finds no new message to utter, at least he must utter his message to men who listen with other ears, and measure his words by other standards than their fathers'. One thing at least we must confess. If a good deal in the Gospel of Christ has come to sound to the ears of many less credible than it used to be, so that the preacher has greater difficulty in winning sympathetic audience, this is not because the public has grown less interested in the mighty announcement of the Gospel: the announcement, that is, of a salvation and of a Saviour, which ought to be good news for the whole people. Christianity, as an angel from heaven heralded it, as Jesus Himself proclaimed it, as the first age received it, was glad tidings, which, like new wine, wrought a contagious intoxication of joy among the common people, because it announced salvation, deliverance from evil, and a present kingdom of God on earth.

I do not know in what better phrases than these you can describe the conscious need of our time, its most clamant want. What is it the restless hungry heart of modern nations is crying after, through voices who best interpret its strange, half-articulate longings—what but the bringing in of a new and better social condition, a state marked by righteousness, peace, and joy for the whole people, a new diviner order of society, in which men shall dwell together as comrades in helpful fellowship, serving each the need of all, so that wrong and want and wretchedness shall be banished from the land, and a golden age shall dawn of justice and peace, plenty and contentment Again men are dreaming such dreams as shone before the soul of Hebrew prophets like Micah and Isaiah; dreams of a reconstituted state, of a regenerated society, of a kingdom of God on earth. And Christianity, which came into the world as the professed fulfilment of such Messianic dreams—Christianity is being openly challenged to fulfil them now. It seems, therefore, as if the preacher who knows both his age and his message ought to have something pertinent to say, and something acceptable to the men of to-day.

But no one can fail to notice that the modern world attaches a different conception to the word "salvation" from that which has been traditional in the Church. What the Church has always placed in the forefront of her message has been the salvation of the individual from sin and from the consequences of his own sinning. It has exhorted men to seek to have their souls saved from guilt and condemnation and Divine wrath by the forgiveness of their sins. It has sought to produce saints or holy individuals by gathering them out of the world and training them into fitness for another better world to come. And certain types of earnest Christianity—as, for example, the Evangelicalism that awoke in the end of last century and flourished in the first half of this—have carried this so far as to sacrifice everything else to personal salvation, or the securing of heaven for individual believers when they die. Now, with the revival of a keener social instinct, it has become the fashion to deride this as pure selfishness in the guise of religion. By way of violent recoil from a form of piety so isolated and individualistic as this has been, the cry of the new democracy is all for the sacrifice of the individual to the community. It will have the individual find salvation, if at all, through the bettering of the community, and through his own efforts to promote the common weal. Its ideal, therefore, is not saved souls, but a wholesome public life. To cure the ills of society by applying the principles of Christian ethics to the relation of man to man, of class to class, of capital to labour; to readjust these social relationships on lines which will distribute more equally the fruits of industry, and remedy those economic and sanitary conditions which cause preventable misery to the masses of the people—this is the aim of moderate and sensible thinkers of the new school, however confused, anarchic, or foolish may be the methods by which some would work out similar ends. It is demanded, accordingly, that we modify or widen our conception of salvation. We must understand by it salvation from physical ills, and not from spiritual only; salvation for the State, and not for the individual only; salvation that ends in a kingdom of God on earth, and not in heaven only.

Here, then, are two theories of what Christianity and the Christian Church are intended to accomplish. I am bold enough to hope that there may yet be found room in Christianity for both. It is probably going to be one of the achievements of the wider and better-balanced theology, which one trusts is to come out of the present confusion in the twentieth or some other century, that it will frame some larger conception of Christ's salvation, big enough to embrace and harmonise these two rival theories of it—the personal religious salvation of the soul from sin, and the ethical and social salvation of the community from wrong and suffering. It is undeniable, I think, that the Evangelical revival in the early part of the century, under the influence of which some of us were reared, conceived of the Christian good news too one-sidedly as a rescue of the soul from sin and the readjustment of a sinner's personal relations towards God as the judge of all. That was the truth given to these fathers of ours to reassert, and they overlooked, in consequence, aspects of the Gospel in its bearing upon communities and nations, some of which at least had been familiar to the men of the Reformation, and even of the Puritan period. They forgot that the salvation of the world means more than the justifying of the individual soul; that it is a prodigiously vast and many-sided enterprise which drew the Word of God into flesh; that as his kingdom slowly grows and widens through the centuries, Christ draws unto his service many a side-rill of influence, which goes to swell the central stream of his redemption, draws into his service a thousand forces of knowledge and culture, and law, and human progress which all contribute to renovate and refine society and penetrate Christendom more profoundly with Christian thoughts. They forgot too much that the end of Christ's saving work is to be a kingdom—not souls or even churches, but a kingdom of God among men.

The problems which are raised by the social democracy are such as never would have been raised probably, but for the unacknowledged subtle spread in Europe of Christian ideas, the ideas of the equal worth of all men before God, and the fraternity of all men as sons of a common Father. They are problems which are not likely to find solution except through the application — confessed or unconfessed — of principles and ideals which the world owes to Jesus of Nazareth, his golden rule, his spirit of neighbour-love, and his ideal of salvation for others through the sacrifice of self. The theology and the pulpit of our churches dare not hold themselves aloof from such modern applications of Christianity to common life, lest that should come to pass which of all calamities would be one of the sorest, namely, that the genius or spirit of Christianity and the organised framework of the Christian Church should part company and go separate roads. I cannot doubt but it is a fuller, truer conception of his religion and of his salvation towards which Christ is leading us in our day.

And yet I am quite sure that the new social theory of salvation is apt to be as one-sided as the old, and a deal more shallow. It is, after all, comparatively poor work to furbish up the exterior merely of human life; to wash a man and educate his children and rebuild his house, and guarantee him a fair wage and find him music and an art gallery—and a pension after sixty, if, after all, you have left unclosed that awful cleft which has severed his will from the will of God that rules the universe, and made him a slave to unbridled desire and hate of good, and to greed and falsehood—a child of the devil. The cleavage which sin effects goes down to the basis of spiritual being. When all is said or done, therefore, it remains true that the profoundest need of all our need is reunion to God: the renewal of a healthy relationship with Him who is the Eternal Source, Author, and Ground of all our being. And the part of Christ's work as Saviour, in which all the rest must have its root, and apart from which the rest is but a whitewashing of sepulchres, is that reconciliation of human hearts to the holy will of God which He accomplished by his sacrifice for sin. The Church will commit a graver error than ever in my judgment, if she let the popular cry for social reform draw her aside from her proper task. The fashion, almost the craze, of the hour runs strongly in the direction of social philanthropy, with or without religion. For, alongside the grim dead earnest socialism of the democracy, there is a dainty modish variety of the article with which well-to-do society amuses itself.

On all sides, therefore, the Church and the pulpit are importuned or challenged to fall into the swim and work with the current. I am far from saying they should stand aloof. I have already said it would be hazardous if they did. The movement for elevating, refining, and gladdening the lives of the poor is an outgrowth of the Christian spirit. But it will end in comparative failure if it be severed from its root in the gospel of Christian redemption. The Church must, therefore, maintain her protest that the problem of personal guilt and sin is the first and the worst and the nearest of all problems for each man of us, that which most concerns us to get solved; and that with this problem no one deals or can deal save the Divine Saviour who was crucified on Calvary for sin. Keep the one foot of the compasses pivotted here, at home, in the conscience, the will, the religious nature of the individual man, and then you may sweep with the other limb as wide a circle as you please, the wider the better; take in all human affairs if you can; annex humanity itself, and make mankind one realm over which the law of Jesus shall at last prevail.—Daily Chronicle.

The Chicago Campaign.

ONE SUNDAY'S WORK.

Sunday in the campaign begins, like every other day at the Bible Institute, with seasons of devotion in both departments, where the workers refresh themselves with fellowship in song, and prayer, and the Word of God, girding themselves for their coming labours.

Let us take a bird's-eye view of a single Sunday's work of the evangelistic forces. Mr. Moody was announced to preach in the Haymarket Theatre in the morning. The announcement was the signal for a great rush, and an hour before the time a crowd was at the door. Some 3000 people were packed into the spacious building, while thousands failed to get in. The outside crowd were invited to enter the Standard Theatre, three blocks away, and soon 2500 souls filled that building, and still other hundreds failed to get in. Mr. Moody preached with telling effect to the great multitude in the Haymarket. An observer estimates that about 7000 people surged into and about the two theatres at the morning service.

At 4 p.m. Mr. Moody and Major Whittle addressed 2500 people in the crowded Standard Theatre, many of whom had waited there since the morning service to get the opportunity to see and hear the evangelist and his associate. The word was with power and manifest effect. In the evening Mr. Moody had another service, preaching to an audience of 2200 in the First Congregational Church.

Rev. John McNeill spoke twice in churches too small to contain the crowds that flocked to hear him. In the morning he addressed a congregation in the First Presbyterian Church, when the doors had to be locked against the outside pressure after the service had begun. In the evening, in the great Immanuel Baptist Church, some 2200 people listened to his sermon, while hundreds were turned away.

Dr. A. B. Simpson, of New York, preached with power, morning and evening, to congregations of 1800, in Chicago Avenue Church.

Dr. C. J. Scofield, of Dallas, Texas, conducted three services. In the morning he addressed a crowd that packed the Standard Theatre from the overflow of the Haymarket. In the afternoon he spoke to an audience of 2000 at another place, and in the evening in the Forty-first Street Presbyterian Church.

Dr. J. Monro Gibson, of London, spoke in the morning in the Forty-first Street Presbyterian Church to 1200 people, and in the evening in the Second Presbyterian Church to about the same number.

Dr. G. W. Briggs, of Austin, Texas, preached three times—in the Immanuel Baptist Church, in the Endeavor Hotel Tabernacle, and in the Trinity Methodist Church.

Mr. R. A. Torrey, superintendent of the Moody Bible Institute, addressed an audience of all kinds in the Standard Theatre in the evening, and many a hard heart was pierced by the truth.

Major D. W. Whittle spoke in the afternoon, after Mr. Moody, in the great Standard Theatre meeting, and in the evening at his tent at North Clark and Roscoe streets, when salvation came to many.

Mr. Ferd. Schiverea had a full day in his wonderful tent work at North and Washtenaw avenues. In the morning he spoke to a crowd of 500; in the afternoon he had 1000 hearers, and in the evening 2000, a great wave of human beings that poured in and over and all around his tent.

Mr. Merton Smith had an audience of 1000 in and around his tent at West 14th and Paulina streets.

Mr. J. M. Scroggie, a Scottish evangelist, addressed an audience of 700 in Immanuel Presbyterian Church.

Mr. F. T. Pierson, aided effectively by his wife, who sings the Gospel, conducted three services—two in the Columbian S.S. Building, with audiences of 700 and 800, and another in Englewood Y.M.C.A. Building, with 500 hearers.

Messrs. W. Dalgetty and Ralph Atkinson had their usual evening tent services, one at Twenty-sixth-street and Wentworth-avenue, and the other at West Chicago-avenue and Lincoln-street, both tents filled to overflowing with congregations of 400 and 900.

Mr. Richard Hill, another Scotch evangelist, spoke with power to a large audience in the Campbell Park Presbyterian Church, and not without effect.

Rev. Niclaus Bolt, a young German preacher from St. Paul, held the closing one of a week's services, in the German language, in Christ Chapel, with a congregation of about 500 deeply impressed hearers.

Rev. A. Skoogsburgh, a Swedish evangelist, preached in his own language, morning and evening, to congregations of 800, in the Bethania Norwegian Church.

An afternoon service in the Bohemian language was conducted, when about 500 Bohemians heard the Gospel in their own language.

In Major Whittle's tent a remarkable meeting for children was conducted by Miss Bessie Tyson. About 600 people were present to share in the blessings of the hour.

At Institute Hall, in the heart of Chicago's dark places, three services were held in afternoon and evening, continuing till nearly midnight. An aggregate of between 700 and 800 people were there brought under the influence of the Gospel.

At Bethesda Congregational Church, one of the institute workers conducted a meeting. Mrs. E. M. Whittimor, of New York, had a memorable service among the 400 prisoners in the jail. In the afternoon she also conducted an impressive consecration meeting in the Moody Church, attended by about 300 persons.

Some of the Institute workers conducted a meeting of about 600 people at Col. Clarke's well-known mission.

Throughout the day over twenty mission services were held by other Institute workers, by which nearly 2000 persons were reached with Gospel influences.

The Gospel wagon, manned by evangelists Davis and Higgins, and part of the time also by Mr. Wm. Robertson, of Edinburgh, with a force of trained Institute workers, was employed morning, afternoon, and evening, reaching an aggregate of 1200 people with the Gospel in song, sermon, and testimony.

About 300 people were addressed in an open-air service held in the evening.

In all these meetings the Gospel singers took a prominent and very important part, especially in the great theatre gatherings. There the strongest forces of singers were massed. Messrs. Towner, Stebbins, Jacobs, Burke, Atkinson, Mrs. Pierson, strong male choirs, four male quartets, and scores of other singers proclaimed the glad tidings in thrilling song. Trained Christian workers, male and female, from the Bible Institute, assisted in every service.

It is impossible to tabulate the results of one Sunday's work for souls. Hundreds professed faith in Christ. Many will carry their new life and testimony far and wide into the various places of their abode, and much fruit shall be found after many days.

[From Another Correspondent.]

Nearly every Sunday since the month of May, the stage of the Haymarket Theatre has been devoted to the presentation of the Gospel of the grace of God in song, and sermon and testimony. The interest in these remarkable meetings has been one of the most surprising phenomena in this busy World's Fair season. No such crowds have been seen in any religious services for many a day, nor has there been any abatement of interest, but rather a constant increase.

The last service (August 27) was in some respects one of the most wonderful of the series. It was almost amusing to see the eager desire and determination to hear Mr. Moody, which held many people from far and near in and about the theatre for almost half a day. For at least an hour before the appointed time for opening a stream of people was seen flowing toward the great building, and when I arrived in front of the Haymarket the crowd was in danger of covering the lines of the electric cars.

In a very short time after the opening of the doors all the standing-room on stage, floor, and galleries was occupied. Three thousand souls were packed into the building, and it is estimated that from three to four thousand more desired to enter. Twenty-five hundred of these were drawn into the Standard Theatre, not many blocks away, and the remaining overflow of hundreds drifted away into the streets again.

So anxious were the people to see and hear Mr. Moody, that many lingered in and about the theatre for hours—thinking to gain their object in the afternoon. It is to the praise of God's grace that He has given his servant such great favour among the people, so that he may have free course to reach their heart with the Word of Life.

The scene in the Haymarket Theatre on Sunday morning was most impressive. Looking out from one of the private boxes at the side of the stage (which had been cleared of all obstructions from the footlights to the wall) the eye fell first upon the thousands of uplifted faces on the floor, then swept upward to the three great clouds of witnesses in the upper boxes and galleries that overhung these, one above another, up to the dizzy height of the dome. In these faces turned toward the stage, where stood the man of God whom all came to hear, one could read of eager expectation, anxious desire, carelessness, curiosity, quiet, confident expectation, painful suspense, spiritual unrest and struggle, unsatisfied soul-hunger, sorrow and misery, defiant hardness, gloomy despondency, sceptical indifference, prayerful repose, triumphant faith. The gamblers and the drinking-men were not present at this service in any large numbers, as it was too early in the day for them to be about.

On the stage, massed around and behind Mr. Moody, were several evangelists and other Christian workers, the Oberlin Male Quartet and the song leaders, Mr. Geo. C. Stebbins and Mr. D. B. Towner, with a large choir filling the stage behind them. About 400 electric lights cast their glow on the scene.

The opening song service lasted a full half hour, and was conducted with the usual promptitude and tact. The Oberlin Quartet sang with exquisite taste and simplicity the words of Eccles xii., "Remember now thy Creator," etc., which could not fail to impress any audience.

After the song service, Mr. Moody broke in with an announcement, "We want to keep up these meetings," he said. "We go from the Empire Theatre because we can no longer get it, and enter the Standard Theatre. We want to reach and save the drunkards, the fallen, the wretched, the lost. We want your sympathy and help. Now," he cried, "all who want the theatre meetings continued, lift up your hands": and all over the building hands flashed up. "That is very encouraging," continued Mr. Moody. "Now put your hands into your pockets. We are going to take up a collection for the support of the work." This sharp turn amused and pleased the people, for the voters were neatly caught by an immediate test of their sincerity.

After the collection and another song or two, Mr. Moody rose and dashed at once into his message, and was listened to throughout with marked attention.

Meanwhile, at the Standard Theatre, Prof. R. A. Torrey, of the Bible Institute, was addressing another large audience. The choir having done splendid service for an hour at the Haymarket were drafted off hither by Mr. Moody in the way many of your London readers will be familiar with, in order to supply seats for another hundred people.

After the service of song, during which the Oberlin Quartet gave a beautiful rendering of "Lead, kindly Light," Mr. Schiverea, whose tent-work amongst the outcast on the west side of the city has been a very marked feature of the campaign, gave an impressive address on "The Wages of Sin," and afterwards Mr. Torrey spoke on the rich young man, "One thing thou lackest."

Rev. John McNeill, having returned from a brief visit of a few days to Macinaw, preached on Sunday afternoon in the Standard Theatre to a full house (subject, "The Queen of Sheba"), and in the evening at the Fourth Presbyterian Church.

Among the eminent preachers who spoke in the various churches was Rev. Dr. C. J. Scofield, of Dallas, Texas, who preached with great acceptance in the First Congregational Church. Dr. G. W. Briggs, of Austin, Texas, ministered to the Immanuel Baptist Church; Dr. Monro Gibson, of London, also preached. Major Whittle spoke in Christ Church, and at his own tent at night. A careful estimate revealed the fact that through the day in the various meetings at theatres, churches, and tents, Mr. Moody and his fellow-workers had reached about 43,000 hearers.

PROTESTANTISM IN GERMANY is on the increase at the expense of Romanism. During the past ten years 24,000 persons have officially declared their conversion from Romanism to Protestantism, and only 4700 people have made the inverse turn. The recruits to Romanism were most numerous in Bavaria.

Summer at Northfield.—VI.

AFTER THE CONFERENCES.

The rapid succession of three conferences, each with its distinctive characteristics, can hardly pass without affording some material for after-thought and reflection. In view, therefore, of the yearly increase of Christian conventions in our own isles, a useful object might be served by indicating some points that have been more marked here at Northfield than in the mother country. The conference-going public has now reached such vast proportions, and the gatherings themselves represent so prominent a feature in the spiritual life of the community, that the Church of God can ill afford to pass unnoticed any features that might add to their utility.

It is noteworthy that while special missions to various classes (e.g., police, railway men, theatricals, etc., etc.) are so prevalent with us, this is not the case to any extent in American work, more than one attempt in this direction having failed. Yet in the matter of conferences the position is reversed, and of this Northfield is a conspicuous example.

First of all came together the lady students of various universities, colleges, and seminaries; then a few days later the "college-boys" met in like fashion; and again, after a fortnight's interval, the little "town" was once more astir with the general Christian convention. On our side of the ocean all classes are found at every conference, saving the establishment this summer of the Students' Volunteer gathering at Keswick, which is a sign of welcome progression.

The same advantages that are found in regular evangelistic work among separate classes exist equally in the independent assembling of students of either sex for intercourse on matters of Christian life and growth. Their intellectual training frequently presents a serious barrier to their acceptance of spiritual truth in its simplicity; indeed, one knows only too well how difficult it is to attract them within a league of a "Christian conference" at all. Like the sons of the prophets in the time of Elisha, they "stand to view afar off"—if, indeed, they come even so near as that.

But here they meet with those of like passions with themselves, men and women of their own age and calibre, in the full force of physical and mental vigour. From them they learn that the priceless talents lent of God are not to be used as weapons against Him; that such euphemisms as "greatness of intellect," "excess of conscientiousness," when they actuate men "in departing from the living God," are, if probed deep enough, traceable to what the Holy Spirit, with more candour, terms, "an evil heart of unbelief"; that the faculties of reason and commonsense are never so fully developed as when sanctified to the use of Him who endowed them; and that in the matter of practical daily living there is no moral force so resistless, no incentive so strong, as that which the power of God supplies—and especially to those who, like Nicodemus or Saul of Tarsus,

SURRENDER THAT THEY MAY OVERCOME, and conquer because they have bowed the knee. In a word, to quote St. Augustine, that "the end of learning is to know God, and out of that knowledge to love Him." This, then, is the first characteristic which I would commend to the study of those whose office it is to organise such assemblies.

Another is the proportion of each day strictly reserved for private study, social intercourse, and recreation. Is it not the case that this is very largely lacking in our British gatherings? "From early morn to dewy eve"—and almost on to early morn again sometimes—do earnest souls tax their receptive faculties beyond their power, and their notebooks to an extent that renders the profitable dissecting of their contents in after days a hopeless task. Ever and anon they listen to an address in which the conference is likened to the "solitary place" to which the Master bade his followers "come apart and rest awhile"; yet does their inner consciousness compare it rather to those antecedent days in which the disciples "had no leisure so much as to eat"!

Let me not exaggerate the disadvantages of this arrangement, but rather point out the benefits of the better way adopted at Northfield. (a) Time is found to digest what has been heard ere more is received. (b) Rough notes, hurriedly taken, can be sufficiently revised by the aid memory to render them intelligible and helpful for subsequent use.

(c) Mental and physical energies are so far recuperated between the sessions as to render each one the more enjoyable. Thus it does not become necessary for the jaded auditor to "stay at home this evening" at the risk of seeming in a measure to be wanting in sympathy or enthusiasm, or, even worse, of finding that the meeting thus missed has been "a particularly good one," or, perhaps "the best of the whole convention," as is not infrequently the case. (d) These leisure hours in the afternoon are attractive to young people, whose attendance is secured in large numbers, when they would fight shy of gatherings which occupy the entire day. And this very feature (e) affords both leisure and opportunity for personal work among them and others regarding the things that pertain unto eternal life.

At Northfield the "taking in" and the "giving out" go on simultaneously, and from this most important results are obtained. As an example, one young lady found opportunity during the conference of college women to speak individually with so many of the students that she has since received over thirty letters from them seeking counsel upon the difficulties that beset their spiritual path. What possibilities would have been missed had all her time been occupied at meetings for her own edification! A score and more of educated women going forth to wield their influence in the world, would have passed beyond her reach for ever. Now she has them all in touch, the value of which none can fully know. Who shall say but that the silent power of her example, as well as her earnest speech, may yield more far-reaching issues than many an eloquent address.

By affording such leisure, the raison d'être of a conference becomes more effective in the life of the individual recipients, as well as with those to whom, with clearer perception, they are enabled to pass it on. The plan, therefore, may well receive the attention it deserves. There are, no doubt, local circumstances which render impossible any hard and fast rule. Gatherings in the heart of a city do not afford the natural facilities for walks and rides of which, for instance, Northfield and Keswick can boast. But if the principle were adopted as far as practicable, nothing would be lost; on the other hand, much would be gained.

Before next summer Northfield will be the proud possessor of yet another addition to the seminary buildings, this time in the shape of a capacious auditorium. Hitherto the conferences have been held in the "recitation hall," which, with adjoining class-rooms, is the seat of learning of the young women who are completing their education there. But for a meeting-place it is not well adapted, and a few gentlemen have accordingly undertaken to provide a suitable and substantial edifice before the conventions meet again. There will then be six buildings to adorn the height which surveys the beautiful valley. The present group consists of two dormitory buildings, recitation hall, library, and sanatorium, each combining the solid and the picturesque, and forming seen for many miles around. Across, and lower down the river, lies Mount Hermon, likewise beautiful for situation, where the "boys" dwell together in unity. This is four miles away, but "quite near enough, you'd better believe"—so Mr. Moody good humouredly observes. Equally substantial, and no less ornamental, is a group of buildings there, admirably provided with all domestic appliances, in the use of which the boys are thoroughly expert. Out of doors there is land to be cultivated, cattle to be tended, and, in short, the management of all is in their hands. In vacation time, those who so desire may spend their time in field labour, the remuneration for which goes toward their education during the other months of the year. They come mostly from humble walks in life, but their training in practical and educational matters makes them the equal of many of their superiors, and their Christian courtesy endears them to all.

Like that of their sisters, their curriculum is one which, in addition to other subjects, gives a leading place to the study of the Bible, so that they may be equipped and thoroughly furnished unto good works. In the surrounding farms and hamlets their labours in the Gospel are greatly needed, and the scattered population affords an interesting sphere of personal work. Thus they are kept busy on Sunday and week day, but with that variety of work which itself constitutes repose to body and to mind.

The Seminary is now in its fourteenth year of operation, Mount Hermon being two years its junior.

"SMALL MEANS, BUT HIGH AIMS,"

may be said to be the qualifications for admission of the students of either sex, and the results that have been attained have more than justified the highest expectations. The teachers are efficient and godly men and women, who see in their pupils such great possibilities of future usefulness as to nerve their highest endeavour to "show themselves workmen approved of God" in the training that they impart. Thus year by year there go forth numbers of these young people whose hearts the Lord has touched, to take the Gospel wherever an opening occurs, in slum or church, in mission or foreign field. Here is solved, in principle, the problem of how to reach the masses—by going to them—and many a hard-worked pastor to-day thanks God and takes courage at having such helpers as these at his right hand.

There are no restrictions as to nationality. The fact that all nations need the Gospel is in itself reason sufficient for admitting any suitable candidate, that he may learn to declare in his own tongue the wonderful works of God. In this manner may those who have been prospered in earthly things minister to others in heavenly things—by sending to these admirable institutions young people of spiritual promise whom they are able to support, or the means (£20 a year) for maintaining some of the many applicants now waiting to be received. The autumn term will just about be commencing as these lines appear in print, and it would be a fitting thankoffering on the part of many who have received blessing at one or other of our summer conferences to avail themselves of such an opportunity as I have indicated, and address themselves to Mr. D. L. Moody, East Northfield, Mass., U.S.A.

INDIAN VILLAGE WORK.

While the cities and towns in India have need of reinforcements, the out-of-the-way and difficult-to-reach villages of India need to have more consideration. Village work has been, and is being, prosecuted in all directions, and perhaps by all societies, but the future must see a more adequate staff of missionaries living in the wild jungle part places of this Empire.

I believe that many who are now in the large cities and towns would gladly take up their abode in isolated country stations if the societies would permit them. They may not do it in preference to cities and towns which are blessed with a few more conveniences than villages, but they would, out of love to Christ and to those who have never heard his name, be content—nay, count it a great privilege—to live and labour in remote places. Let those who do as we are doing speak for themselves. I can say, unhesitatingly, although I have only about four years' experience in India, that I enjoy the work of telling to all around what a dear Saviour may be found in Christ Jesus. Ours is village work.

The work was started in Malvalli by Mr. W. A. Redwood some seven years ago, and carried on by Mr. E. Lynn (whose brother recently died at Bihé, Africa), while the former was recruiting his health in England. A few months after Mr. Lynn came, I was led to give myself to the work of God in this place. Through God's good hand upon the work it has grown, and is still opening out in and around Malvalli. The ladies, the wives of the above, and the Misses Bird, Austin, and Clark, have their work—medical and Gospel—among the women. Mr. and Mrs. Lynn and two of the ladies are in Kollegal, some twenty-two miles from here. Miss Bird is in England.

In this place (Malvalli) there are three schools, market and bazaar preaching, and the systematic visitation of villages around. Lately special efforts have been made to reach the jungle villages and hamlets around us. Within a radius of five miles there are no less than 118 of these. Visiting heathen festivals and free distribution of the Scriptures, as well as the preaching of the Gospel, have been from the beginning, and are still, carried on as the feasts and festivals occur. There are two baptized Christians—fruit of the work; and many who say they believe in and pray to Jesus Christ, and say the idols are false. Would that there were a shaking among the dry bones!

We shall be glad if Christian friends unite with us in asking God to grant a wave of blessing in the shape of many souls being saved!

AGAINST THE HIGHER CRITICISM.

BY REV. GEORGE S. MOTT, D.D.

THE sixth annual meeting of the Interdenominational Seaside Bible Conference began Friday, Aug. 11, in the Educational Hall, Asbury Park, N.J. The design of this association, formed by representatives from eighteen Evangelical religious bodies, is, in the broad sense of its name, to confer about the Bible. This year the particular object was to defend the Evangelical view of those books of the Bible, as to their authorship, authority, and contents, which are assailed by the higher critics. Two views of these books are now under discussion.

1. The traditional view, as it is called, which is briefly this: That the book of Genesis was compiled by Moses, under Divine guidance, probably from documents which were preserved among the Israelites, and which were brought by Jacob into Egypt. Of the four other books of the Pentateuch, they were written by Moses, or under his immediate supervision, and that they contain directions and laws which were spoken to him by Jehovah. That the historical books are compilations of records, having a distinct idea to represent the attitude of Israel towards God, and that those who prepared these compilations were guided by God. That the prophetical writings were by those whose names they bear.

2. The other and conflicting theory is called the "analytical," or more commonly the higher criticism, and sometimes destructive criticism, because, as its opponents believe, the result will be to weaken and even destroy confidence in the Bible as a rule of conduct and faith. This result is disavowed by the advocates of this criticism, and we believe no such purpose is in their hearts. This view is, that the original Pentateuch was very small; that it was expanded from age to age after Moses, who wrote an insignificant portion of it; that Leviticus and the allied parts in Exodus and Numbers were the additions put on in the development of the worship by the priests, so that this worship did not reach its present form until the exile in Babylon. Deuteronomy was a fabrication made to effect the reformation in the reign of Josiah, King of Judah. In the historical books we have a record prepared by prejudiced and careless writers, who made numerous mistakes. The prophets did not see beyond their own times; that they used the events which had already transpired to illustrate their teachings, so that they did not predict anything, and consequently did not write at the early date assigned to them.

Such in brief outline are the two views, like the babes, Jacob and Esau, contending for priority. Against this analytical view the great guns of the Conference poured their theological balls. An array of masters was on the field. Each of them was almost a specialist in his own department. The Nestor of them all was the senior professor of Princeton Theological Seminary, who from a youth has been a Hebrew scholar. His subject was "The Mosaic Authorship, and the Unity of the Pentateuch." To present even an inadequate outline of his massive address would fill up all the space I can have. It was a compact history of the discussion on this question, which has been going on for a century and a quarter. It comprised what can be found only in many works, and the whole was set forth in that remarkably clear and succinct style of which Professor W. H. Green is a master.

Probably the most able paper was by Professor Stroeter, of Denver University. He met the attacks on the four Gospels. He did not pursue the ordinary line of defence, but boldly entered the camp of the enemy, and showed, in a scholarly, keen, logical manner, that no amount of evidence could silence objections, that if cavillers had the proofs now demanded, another set of critics would claim that even such demonstration had its weak points.

Very able papers were read on Messianic Prophecy and on the Book of Job by Professor Moorehead, of Theological Seminary, Xenia, Ohio. Also by Professor Osgood, on the Criticism of the Bible, in which he traced German rationalism and French infidelity to its source in the writings of the English Deists; so that now we are receiving the rebound of their boomerang. Dr. Talbot Chambers, of the Collegiate Church, New York, furnished a paper on "The Nature and Authority of the Psalms." As might be expected, this was set forth in that thoughtful and scholarly manner which is characteristic of Dr. Chambers. Rev. Dr. B. B. Tyler, of New York city, made an exhaustive defence of the Book of Esther, as entitled to a place in the sacred canon.

The addresses at this conference may be divided into the critical and the exegetical. The former I have sketched, but the latter are by no means a lesser part of this important meeting. Professor Dinwiddie charmed the audience by his graceful unfolding of the Epistles to the Thessalonians. In a terse and incisive way Dr. Weston, of Crosier Theological Seminary, opened the Epistle of James. In a clear and most instructive manner, his colleague, Dr. Stifler, spoke on the Acts and the Epistles of John. Dr. Brookes, of St. Louis, held the undivided attention of an evening audience, as he discoursed on "The Bible's Testimony to its own Integrity." The session of Monday morning was devoted to a joint discussion by Dr. A. T. Pierson and Dr. A. J. Gordon, of Boston, on "God's Plan through the Ages." This plan was presented clearly to the audience by a diagram sketched on the blackboard. The divisions were: 1. The eternal past terminating with the fall of Adam. 2. The Jewish age ending with the day of Pentecost. 3. The present evil age, which will close with the second advent of Christ. 4. The millennial age or reign of our Lord on earth. 5. The eternal future.

As we listened to these scholars freely pouring out their best thoughts, the result of long and patient study, and felt the force of their logic and diacritical power, the conviction was forced upon us that the boastful claims of higher critics, that the ablest scholarship of our times is on their side, is an exaggeration born of self-conceit. Whatever difference of judgment may be reached, no fair-minded hearer could deny that these speakers were able thinkers. The claim that weight of intellect preponderates on the side of Higher Criticism cannot be substantiated.

If sufficient encouragement is given, the most important of these addresses will be published in book form, and they well deserve it. A very timely volume will it be. We do not know of any one book which traverses the whole field as do these addresses. Those who wish a copy can send a request to Dr. L. W. Munhall, Germantown, Pa. If printed, the price will be about 2dols.

The afternoons were devoted to Bible study, conducted mostly by Dr. W. J. Erdman, of Ashville, N.C., and Rev. Dr. Stearns, of Philadelphia. Topics were discussed in not so scholastic a manner as in the other sessions of the conference. The subjects were such as these: "The Assurance of Hope," by Professor Stifler; "Types of the Old Testament," by Professor Moorehead; "The Witness of the Spirit," by Professor Dinwiddie; "The Threefold Salvation," by Dr. Erdman; "The Fatherhood of God," by Dr. Low.

A morning prayer-meeting, beginning at 6.30, was well attended. This was under the guidance of Dr. Stearns. Thus it will be seen that the devotional was not overlooked by the conference. The exercises were sedate, and only calculated to interest thoughtful Christians. The papers and addresses were of a high order. They could not fail to show that the foundation of Scripture is not silly fables, that it does not get its support from a sentimental faith, but can hold its own in the toughest wrestling of keenest intellects. These discussions must be beneficial, because the final result will be to remove a measure of haze, which the present agitation on these questions is causing to gather over many thoughtful minds. The conference closed its sessions on Sunday, August 13.—New York Observer.

A correspondent, writing to us in reference to the gathering, says:—

"The Conference was in every way a success. It proved clearly (1) That very much of the ripest and most reliable Biblical scholarship of the country stands for the Old Book and the old faith. (2) That the spiritually-minded, as a class, are for the Old Book and the old faith. (3) That the Old Book has suffered nothing because of the conflict raging over and about it. (4) That if the Church in America follows the higher critics in their teachings she will become rationalistic, as in Switzerland, Germany, and Holland. (5) That the Rationalists can be met and answered satisfactorily to honest and reverent souls. (6) That the Church and the world need more preaching of the Bible authoritatively, and less of other things. (7) That a thorough, far-reaching, Holy Spirit revival in the Churches of the land will put a stop to the rationalising and secularising influences now so active in the Churches, and nothing else will."

WORK IN KANSUH.

DEAR SIR,—It is a long time since I wrote you, but I assure you it has not been for lack of appreciation of your kindness in so regularly sending me THE CHRISTIAN, and I desire to thank you most heartily for it. Although it does not reach our far-off station with any regularity, yet sooner or later it comes to hand, when its pages are scanned with deep interest. I feel sure such a paper, laden as it is with world-wide news, must be of intense interest to all who have fellowship with the Lord in his work.

I pray that you may be spared for many more years to guide the interests of the paper, and that I, too, may be spared to enjoy and profit by such helpful and stimulating reading. I am thankful to say that God's work and Word were never so precious to me as at this time; anything else fails to raise my hopes as do the promises of his glorious Word.

I should like to be able to write of more definite conversions in the work here. One is thankful to report that those already baptised stand fast in the faith, and that last year we baptised the first woman in this district. In addition, we have at the present time a few hopeful inquirers.

Lately we have moved into more suitable premises, and have been reinforced by new workers, Messrs. Ridley and Mason. For the last few evenings we have concentrated our forces by taking a good stand somewhere in the city for the purpose of preaching. Mr. Mason, playing a musical instrument, soon draws a crowd around, who have stayed and listened remarkably well to the message of salvation. After much sowing in this city and neighbourhood, we are hoping for immediate results, and we beg fervent prayers on our behalf.

A day and Sunday-school has recently been started, the outcome of a long-cherished desire, and with God's smile upon this effort, we believe it will be made a great blessing. Mr. Ridley takes the chief responsibility of the Sunday-school, and Mr. Mason of the day-school.

If any friends on reading this feel led to help us in any of the various branches of the work, we shall be very glad. In addition to what is mentioned above, there is tract distribution and itinerating work, and any subscriptions for either of these objects, if sent to Mr. Fishe, 4, Pyrland-road, Mildmay Park, London, N., would be duly forwarded.

We have just heard of a very blessed conference of Kansuh workers held at Lancheo, more than two months ago. We are only twelve days' journey on horseback from that city, but have had to wait thus long for news.

May I ask praying friends to continue in prayer for Mongolia and Thibet, for much will be lost should the harvest wait. Mr. and Mrs. C. T. Polhill Turner, who have so recently experienced what it is to be in perils amongst the heathen, are now at home, and would, I am sure, be only too glad to tender advice, or give information, concerning Thibet. The cry from Mongolia and Thibet has been loud and long, and like the trumpet of Sinai, which waxed louder and louder, so is the cry from these lands; yet how few have "endeavoured" to reach the field. Let definite prayer be made that men chosen of God for that work may speedily be found at the front.

Again, there are the Mohammedans in China, many of them in this province of Kansuh, who seem to call for a special agency to reach them.

Praying bands little realise how greatly they help the work abroad by their prayers, and we in the field know not how much we owe to the prayers of home friends. I am glad to say we are all quite well in this station, which is much to be thankful for.—Yours affectionately in Christ,

CHARLES HORSBURGH.

A TERRIBLE VISITATION.—As a result of the recent cyclone in the islands off the coast of South Carolina, it is stated that 20,000 persons are on the verge of death from famine, thirst, and disease.

The Opium Commission.

On Friday last the Royal Commission on the Indian Opium Trade held its first public sitting at Westminster for the purpose of taking evidence. The Commission was appointed to consider (1) Whether the growth of the poppy and manufacture and sale of opium in British India should be prohibited except for medical purposes, and whether such prohibition could be extended to the native States. (2) The nature of the existing arrangements with the native States in respect of the transit of opium through British territory, and on what terms, if any, these arrangements could be with justice terminated. (3) The effect on the finances of India of the prohibition of the sale and export of opium, taking into consideration (a) the amount of compensation payable, (b) the cost of the necessary preventive measures, (c) the loss of revenue. (4) Whether any change short of total prohibition should be made in the system at present followed for regulating and restricting the opium traffic and for raising a revenue therefrom. (5) The consumption of opium by the different races and in the different districts of India, and the effect of such consumption on the moral and physical condition of the people. (6) The disposition of the people of India in regard to (a) the use of opium for non-medical purposes, (b) their willingness to bear in whole or in part the cost of prohibitive measures. Lord Brassey presided, and the other Commissioners present were:—Sir James Lyall, Mr. Arthur Pease, Mr. Mowbray, M.P., and Sir William Roberts, with Sir Charles Bernard, secretary.

SIR JOSEPH PEASE, M.P.,

was the first witness, and gave evidence on behalf of the Anti-Opium Society. He said his contention was that there had never been such a peculiar case in the history of the world as the connection between the Government of India and the opium trade. The point to which he would draw attention was that it was carried out as a cultivation and a manufacture by the State—that the State tried by every possible means to obtain fresh and larger sales for the drug. There was not in the history of the whole world a similar case of a civilised Government manufacturing any article, much less an article of the nature of opium. There was a great difference between the promoting of the trade in this way by the Government, and the mere licensing of the cultivation and manufacture of the drug for the purpose of checking its extension. He did not say that he was in favour of the Government issuing licences, but he wished to point out that there was a great difference between the Government saying, "Here is a deadly drug that should only be used under medical supervision and care, and its cultivation and manufacure should be controlled and restricted," and the State using every effort to spread the cultivation and sale of that drug. The society that he represented had always considered the opium trade an immoral trade, and that was the ground of their agitation against it. Without going into the question as to what the Christian law required, he would say that the moral law—which after all was based on the Christian law—indicated that no one had a right to carry on a trade that was detrimental to his fellow-men and demoralising to his neighbours. He said that with regard to the opium trade it presented a preponderance of evil over good, and of vice over virtue, and that it did not come up to the moral standard that a legitimate trade should reach. Opium was a drug that was treated by English law as a poison that should only be sold for medicinal purposes. But in India it was not grown and manufactured for medicinal purposes at all, the bulk of the production was sent to China for consumption by people there, and was not used by the Indian people themselves. The argument was used that if we did not supply China with opium China would supply herself; but he contended that we had no right to do what was wrong if it was wrong in itself because someone else was ready to do the wrong if we did not do it. His contention was that if Indian opium was kept out of China the great incentive to its cultivation by the Chinese themselves would be removed. Of late years a large amount of care had been exercised by the Government officials to restrict the use of the drug in India, and on that fact he based his contention that the moral evils resulting from the use of opium were acknowledged.

The Chairman: But you are prepared to recognise, I suppose, that it is no longer the policy of this country to use force or pressure to compel China to admit opium? The witness said he was perfectly content to take Sir James Fergusson's statement in 1891. That statement was to the effect that it was open to China to terminate the treaty on giving twelve months' notice, and she could then protect herself by increasing the duty on the importation of opium or by prohibiting importation altogether, and that it was certain that this country would never use a single pound of gunpowder or risk the life of a single soldier to compel China to admit opium. He did not quite agree with Sir James Fergusson in this interpretation of the Treaty of Tientsin, but if the policy of England was that laid down by Sir James Fergusson, he would be perfectly satisfied. If China was really in a position to impose what duty she chose on the importation of opium, she might be said to be perfectly free in the matter, and he should be content.

The witness, in answer to further questions, said he was convinced that the view he had expressed as to the immorality of the opium traffic was supported by the feeling of the country as indicated by memorials and petitions to Parliament and the Government from Christian ministers of all denominations, by Indian and Chinese missionaries, and by the expressions of opinion by leading public men.

The Chairman said he supposed the witness recognised that the Indian Government must raise a certain revenue, and that in the present financial position there would be great difficulty in finding another source of revenue if the opium revenue were relinquished. The witness said that of course when the Government found that it had not enough money to meet its expenditure it must either increase its revenue or reduce the expenditure. But he would point out that the revenue from opium was now within a far more reasonable compass than it formerly was. At present it amounted, roughly speaking, to £5,000,000 out of a total revenue of £88,000,000. Within ten years the opium revenue had decreased £3,000,000. The Indian Government had got on without this £3,000,000; and when he considered that within the same period the military expenditure had increased by some £8,000,000, he could not help thinking that if reforms in Indian expenditure were properly carried ont, and the resources of India developed, the opium revenue would prove a very small item and an inconsiderable loss if it were relinquished.

REV. DR. JAMES LEGGE,

professor of the Chinese language and literature at Oxford, said he had resided many years in China and Malacca as a missionary, and had had a wide observation of the people to whom we sold opium. He never heard a man who had a word to say in the way of apology or excuse for the opium habit, and he did not believe they would find a man in all China, even amongst opium-smokers, who would say a word in its favour. Not one of the Christian churches which had sprung up in China would admit a person in the least addicted to opium. No class of the Chinese people was free from the habit, but it manifested itself soonest amongst the poorer classes.

Lord Brassey: The Chinese are very industrious, are they not, and physically strong?—Witness: Yes. They are the most industrious race I ever came across, but the opium-smokers cannot work so well as non-smokers.

You think it is extremely difficult to make a limited use of opium?—Yes; most people took too much. The drug did evil, and nothing but evil. He had often heard indignant complaints in China against England on account of the opium trade.

Lord Brassey: It is open to the Chinese Government at any time to put a stop to the trade.—Witness: Yes, but they do not seem to care about doing so.

Do you think there is any probability of the Chinese Government prohibiting the opium trade?—I cannot undertake to foretell the future. We ought to stop the production of opium in India.

By Mr. Arthur Pease: I never knew a man go on for fifteen or twenty years taking opium without becoming a slave to it. If that has been said by anyone, it is contrary to my experience.

By Sir W. Roberts: The quantity of opium grown in China was perhaps five times as much as that which came from India. Ten per cent. of the whole population of China smoked opium.

secretary to the Medical Mission in London, said he had resided for many years in Formosa, where he conducted a dispensary, which was largely attended by persons seeking relief from the opium habit. He calculated that no fewer than 20,000 persons seeking to escape from the bondage passed through the hands of medical missionaries annually. These chiefly belonged to the shopkeeping and labouring classes, and very few to the richer classes. Large numbers of the wealthier classes took opium, but they did not come into the missionaries' hands. The people sought relief because the pleasure afforded at first by opium had entirely passed away, while the habit could not be given up on account of the pain entailed.

Can a man never give up opium without assistance?—No, because the physical ordeal is so severe; the patient's bones ache all over, he can neither sleep nor work, and the agony becomes almost unbearable.

What are the physical evils which result from the opium habit?—I found most of my patients more or less emaciated, and one of my rules was that if after a fortnight the patient did not begin to put on flesh I refused to give any more medicine, knowing I was being deceived. Then the opium-smokers are particularly susceptible to a number of diseases, and owing to low vitality fall an easy prey.

The sittings were resumed on Saturday, and further evidence was taken.

REV. JOSEPH ADAMS,

of the American Baptist Mission, said that he had laboured for thirteen years in the valley of the Yangtse-kiang. For four years previous to going to China—from 1875 to 1879—he was in Upper Burmah, having originally gone out as missionary to the Chinese in Upper Yunnan. From personal observation he could say that the Burmese authorities were strongly opposed to the use of opium by their people, and the prohibition, both against opium and alcoholic liquors, was very strong. The reasons for this prohibition, as given by the leading men in Burmah, were—first, that the people were so weak in the face of the temptations offered by opium and alcohol; secondly, that the Burmese religion forbids their use; and thirdly, that there were ancient laws of Burmah prohibiting the trade in these drugs. His experience was that the habit of opium-smoking once formed, it was almost impossible to break it off, and it was very seldom that only a moderate indulgence was maintained. As to the medical value of opium, he believed it was valuable in relieving the pain of rheumatic fever, but he did not believe it had any effect in preventing malarial fevers. In all fever epidemics his experience was that the opium smokers were the first to be attacked and the soonest to succumb; the healthier non-smoking coolies stood the fever far better. In Burmah the effect upon the Burmese of the prohibition of the use of opium was most satisfactory. At the missionary dispensary they had very few cases of Burmese suffering from the effects of opium, but a large number of cases of Chinese and Shans. There were many suicides also with opium, but they were in almost every instance Chinese and Shans. The priests and the civil authorities worked together in enforcing the prohibition; no doubt, if public opinion had been opposed to prohibition its enforcement would be far more difficult. Opium was used to a large extent by the Chins, a tribe occupying the country between Bhamo and the Chinese border, who were not controlled either by Burmah or China, and a great deal of difficulty was caused by the attempts of the Chins to introduce opium and opium-smoking among the Burmese. The Shans, who were also great opium-smokers, really came from China and did not settle permanently in Burmah. The Burmese authorities did not attempt to interfere with these people in their use of opium. When Upper Burmah passed under the rule of the Indian Government a proclamation was issued that the Indian Government would derive no revenue from the sale of opium, and discouraging its use. In his opinion, the attempt to prohibit the trade in opium in Burmah had not been successful, because the Chins, Shans, and Chinese were allowed to buy opium in certain quantities, and if a Burmese wished to use the drug he could easily get a Shan or a Chinaman to buy it for him. There seemed to be little doubt that the total prohibition of the trade was the only way effectually to put down opium smoking, and he believed public opinion in Burmah would support the Government in such a policy.

The opinion of the missionaries in Burmah and the 80,000 native Christians was unanimous in condemning the introduction of the opium trade into Burmah, and they were equally strong in their opposition to alcohol. All the native Christians were teetotallers, and they placed opium-smoking and dram-drinking in exactly the same category. A good many native Christians, including some of the oldest and most trusted members of the churches, had become victims to the opium habit, and had as a consequence fallen away from the Church. His own opinion was that the habit of opium-smoking was rapidly extending in Burmah, that it was having the most disastrous effect upon the people, and that the only remedy for the evil was the entire prohibition of the sale of opium except for medicinal purposes. The British Government was greatly blamed for having legalised the trade.

Turning to China, the witness said that he had resided for ten years in the interior—250 miles from any port. His experience had been that in the interior the attitude of the Chinese towards the missionaries was extremely courteous. His wife and children had been left alone in a Chinese town for weeks together, had taken their usual walks, had received visitors, and had never met with a single insult. He believed—and it was the unanimous belief of all the missionaries—that the Chinese Government were anxious to deal with the opium trade, but were not free to do that so long as they were handicapped by the foreign imports of the drug. If the Indian import of opium was stopped, he held a very strong opinion that the Chinese Government would take steps to reduce the area of poppy cultivation, with a view to the ultimate extinction of the trade altogether. Whenever an anti-opium official was placed in charge of any district the poppy cultivation in that district disappeared like magic. He believed that the mass of public opinion in China would support the Government in any steps they should take to put down the opium trade. A vast majority of the higher officials in China were strongly opposed to opium; but no doubt among the lower officials, who were very poor, there were many who supplemented their incomes by receiving bribes to allow things to go on that they ought to put a stop to. He thought English political influence in China, as well as English trade, suffered seriously from the fact of the English Government being connected with the opium trade. It was constantly thrown in the faces of the missionaries that they belonged to the people who brought them the opium traffic, and often this was very detrimental to missionary work.

By Sir James Lyall: Previous to Upper Burmah being taken over by the Indian Government no Burmese, to his knowledge, smoked opium. It was quite true that men under the influence of opium were able to do their work as well as anyone else; but it should be remembered that they worked under the stimulus of the drug, and they had to keep themselves constantly primed, while the depression that followed was very great, and the injury to the constitution was constantly going on. In his opinion, opium-smoking was not a matter that ought to be left to religious influences: it seemed to him that it was the duty of the civil Government to protect its people against anything that was injuring them if it were possible.

By Mr. A. Pease: He had never met a Chinaman who defended opium-smoking; it was universally considered a thing to be ashamed of.

REV. J. HUDSON TAYLOR

said he had had a wide opportunity of forming an opinion as to the effect of the opium trade and opium-smoking upon the people of China. The effects of opium on the Chinese were, first, to interfere with the nutritive system. An opium-smoker rapidly lost appetite. No doubt where a man was well-to-do, and could stimulate his appetite by nutritious food, he might smoke moderately for some time without becoming emaciated, but in the case of the poorer victims to the habit they rapidly lost flesh and physical strength. Then it had a deleterious effect upon the nervous system, causing nervous irritability and sleeplessness, which could only be palliated by further recourse to the drug. Further, it had a serious effect upon the generative system, and in cases where both husband and wife were opium-smokers the children were weakly, of low vitality, and fell easy victims to infantile diseases. Mentally, opium-smokers suffered terrible depression when the effect of the stimulant had passed off. But the most disastrous result of opium-smoking was on the moral side of its victim. A confirmed opium-smoker seemed to have lost all his moral perceptions and all sense of the difference between right and wrong. There was nothing he would not resort to in order to gratify his craving for the drug, and all his natural affections seemed to be destroyed. He agreed that the connection of England with the opium traffic made Englishmen very unpopular, and it was constantly being brought up as a proof of the uselessness of Christianity. The missionaries were constantly asked why, if Christianity was so good and had such an influence for good, they did not go home and preach to their own Government as to the wickedness of the opium trade. The best classes in China unanimously attributed to us the ruin of their population, and he could not conceive a patriotic Chinaman who did not hate England for having inflicted upon them such a curse. It was certainly not generally known that there had been a change in the English policy, and that no force would be used to compel the Chinese to receive imports of Indian opium. He should be very much afraid of saying such a thing to a Chinaman, and he was not at all convinced himself that it was correct. He was aware that there had been an official statement in the House of Commons, but he thought it was very desirable that some official communication to the same effect should be made in China; at present, it was certainly not believed in China that no force would be used.

The Commission adjourned until Wednesday.

IT IS expected that after a few sittings in Calcutta the Commissioners will visit the Behar and Benares opium-growing districts, afterwards proceeding to Allahabad, Lucknow, and Lahore. On leaving the Punjab, the Commissioners may be expected to make for Rajpootana and the Malwa States, their idea being to reach Bombay before Christmas. In order to study the effect of opium upon the various races which inhabit the Indian Peninsula, it will also be necessary for the Commission to visit Madras; and finally a journey to Burmah is contemplated. As soon as the evidence is completed, Lord Brassey and his colleagues will go to one of the Hill stations, probably Darjeeling, to consider their report. The preliminary meeting of the Commission is to be held at Calcutta on November 15—not November 8, as previously stated—and the inquiry is expected to last until the end of February.

EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

THE forthcoming Conference of the Evangelical Alliance at Dublin (September 25—28) promises to be of great interest. The Archbishop of Dublin (Lord Plunket), in addition to presiding at the opening meeting, will hold a reception of the members of the Conference at his country seat at Bray. We understand that the Irish railways are giving special facilities to those desiring to attend the Conference.

A striking feature of the gathering will be the presence of distinguished foreigners. One of these is Professor Thoumaïan, the Armenian exile, who was condemned to death after a so-called "trial" at Angora. During his many months of imprisonment the Evangelical Alliance was pleading his cause, not only at Constantinople, but with the British Government, and eventually, owing to the urgent representations of H.M. Foreign Secretary, the Sultan "pardoned," but exiled, Messrs. Thomaïan and Kayaïan, who are now in this country. Another foreign visitor who will excite much curiosity and interest is the Zulu Princess Jejes (cousin of the late King Cetewayo), who with her husband, Mr. J. J. Meek, will describe mission work among the Zulus, in which they have had a very active part.

The programme includes some forty speakers on many important subjects. All information may be obtained of the secretary of the Alliance, 7, Adam-street, Strand, London; or of Rev. D. Mullan, Christian Union Buildings, Dublin.

The Coal Strike.

THE free meals to poor children who are suffering from the effects of the strike, are continued at the Mission Halls at Pontymoile and Cwmffrwdoer, where hundreds are entertained daily. Up to Sunday the total number was over 6,000. The spectacle presented by the children as they wait to be served is a very painful one, and one which must appeal to the finer feelings of the beholder. Mr. T. M. Wintle, the hon. superintendent of the Undenominational Christian Mission, with whom the movement originated, is to be congratulated upon his courage in undertaking such an arduous task. As the distress still continues, and the provision should be made for some time to come, Mr. Wintle would be glad to receive further contributions towards carrying on the good work. Address, Pontymoile, near Pontypool, South Wales.

A HOME IN BUCHAREST.

DEAR SIR,—Since Princess Marie of Edinburgh left her home for Bucharest, there has been a great demand in Roumania for English teachers, and, as usual, the supply exceeded the demand. The life of a governess far from her family is always a hard one, and often even dangerous for a young girl. In almost all large towns in Europe there are "Homes" ready to receive any young person in distress, or needing shelter. Here in the East there were none, except one or two so-called "homes," where cruel and avaricious women fleeced poor girls of all they possessed before turning them out, or placing them in houses where they were ill-fed, ill-treated, or overworked, sometimes worse. There was no refuge, no escape.

Seeing this, and sorrowing over tales of misery such as I cannot repeat here, a noble-hearted woman, herself for many years a governess in Roumania, Fräulein Schultze, took courage, and with her small savings, fruit of lifelong labours, and the aid of one or two charitable ladies, opened a "Home International," in spite of the outcry made by the keepers of the registry offices, so-called "homes." It was at this house that I, when I fled from a family in the country, was received with so much kindness and motherly love by the dear directress, that I took courage, and felt I was not alone in the wide world.

It is a very modest little "Home," beautifully clean and comfortable, but no luxury, only rest for the weary, care for the sick, counsel for the weak, and kindness for all. Only! But is that not life itself? Since last January the "Home" has worked steadily; over a hundred teachers, of all nationalities, have been placed and cared for. Two or three were brought from the hospital to be nursed and sent home, often helped by a small sum given for the journey.

Surely this is a work worthy of our help and sympathy. But to continue there must be help. A few days ago the directress told me, with a sigh of distress, that she feared she could not go on. Will mothers, with girls happy at home, fathers, whose daughters need not leave their protection to earn their bread, send a gift? The rent is £65 a year, and this is the great trouble. The girls pay two shillings a day, and Mdlle. Schultze contrives to pay for the food, etc., out of that, but the rent she cannot cover.

Yours truly,
F. SPEDDING, English Governess.

London's Children.

SPEAKING of the children who suffer from cruelty in London alone, never have we been so busy, for the last three months have brought us twice as many cases to inquire into as the average of any previous three months of the Society's existence. Every inspector for the metropolis has two or three cases given to him each day. The consequence is that the cases are not thoroughly done; they cannot be, though the inquiries are continued to late hours. Besides the old cases, neither warned cases nor prosecuted cases can be supervised as they ought to be. To all this consequence of inadequacy of staff must be added increasing arrear of cases waiting inquiry, and the continuance of the children's sufferings meanwhile, and the further fact that we have not yet informed by our handbills one-half of the metropolis as to what is illegal to be done to children, where to give information of such doings, and under what conditions the information will be given. Before this is done in the whole metropolis, the number of children's men for the metropolis must be increased from its present fifteen to thirty.—The Child's Guardian.

A PROTESTANT DEFENCE BRIGADE has been formed to attend Protestant meetings for the protection of liberty of speech, and to strive by every fair and honest method to convert Romanists from the errors of Romanism to become followers of the Lord Jesus Christ. All information can be obtained from the hon. secretary, ERNEST T. JONES, 18, Paternoster Row, E.C.

CHICAGO PEACE CONGRESS.—The American Advocate of Peace reports that the charts prepared in London, under the superintendence of Dr. Darby, illustrating the cost of wars in men and money, the present armed state of Europe, the progress of arbitration, etc., have been hung in the Peace Exhibit section at the Chicago World's Fair, and are attracting much attention. They are finely executed, and very effective in the quick appeal which they make to the eye.

The Lucerne Conference.

The correspondent of The Daily Chronicle at Lucerne sends a report of the closing sessions of the summer gatherings there. The subject of the last week of conference was "Church Reunion":—

This week is really the peroration of the conferences convened by Dr. Lunn, and held in this town since the end of June last. The entire week is devoted to the topic of how to work round to some organised reunion of the Churches, and there are fresh speakers on the ground as well as new aspects of the subject on the agenda. For example, Bishop Vincent, of the American Methodist Episcopalian Church, is here; Dr. Bruce, Professor of Apologetic Theology at Glasgow; also Père Hyacinthe, who preached here to the Reunionists on Sunday. Rev. Charles A. Berry, of Wolverhampton, Rev. Dr. Mackennal, Rev. T. Law, Rev. J. W. Bourne, and others stand for English Nonconformity; while Rev. Professor Lias represents for the nonce the Church of England. Most of these preachers will preside at one or other of the conferences during this week. Incidentally, it may be remarked here that the visitors from Great Britain to these Reunion Conferences in Lucerne this year have been about double the number who went last year to Grindelwald.

Rev. H. W. Webb-Peploe took the chair at the first meeting. He devoted himself largely to the hindrances to Church reunion, and the development of the true Christian unity, namely, spiritual unity. Firstly, he strongly denounced the disunion of Church fellowships which was promoted by the so-called religious Press. What divides the Church of to-day is, he thought, not so much differences of opinion on Church organisation or Church government, but because some sections of the Press set up a censorious attitude against other sections. And of course the readers of these papers followed on the same lines. Secondly, he held that politics should not be allowed to divide any body of Christians. He strongly disapproved of political sermons, and did not approve of any expression of political opinions, because the ballot ensured perfect safety and secresy. Thirdly, there were the social divisions between the special ministers of different denominations. On some subjects he approved of a holy silence, and this was one of them. He could not possibly expect the Nonconformist bodies to accept such doctrines as that of the historic episcopate; so that he saw no likelihood of arriving at an external union. But, on the other hand, he held that all real Christians were one in spiritual purpose and spiritual life, and therefore in internal union there was every possibility of sinking differences and becoming one body in Christ. Yet there could never be an identity of ideas as to the Church or eternal things, because these were too great for the mind of man to fully grasp, and no one man or one statement of faith could ever cover the full truth.

In the discussion Rev. Charles Williams, of Accrington, deeply regretted the poor hopes of reunion which the Chairman had expressed. All Christians were nowadays unlearning many things held by our fathers, and he firmly held to the hope of unity in the near future. He cared little for the attacks of newspapers—each man should do his duty, and try to overcome this Press evil by individual good. Nor did he disapprove of political Christians, though he scorned pulpit party politics. The thing to do was to preach righteousness—in politics as in all things. His own most devoted and esteemed co-workers were some with whom he most strongly differed on political grounds. What he believed hindered Church reunion was the dogmatism which demanded the yielding of personal convictions. He would not personally give up any cherished religious belief to please any man or any church. Whatever came, Christians must be true to themselves and loyal to Christ. If he were asked what would make reunion possible he would say, first, the abandonment of the attempt to bring about uniformity in the Church. Congregations, synods, pastors, deacons, had all tried for uniformity, and it had all failed. Faith should be taken personally from Christ alone, and if anyone interfered, his answer would be that he must follow the Redeemer according to his conscience. Christians' business was to obey the Master, and not to argue for uniformity. Further, the very simplicity of the Gospel was an aid to reunion—if it was only accepted.

There was much reference to the Lambeth Conference, and it was unanimously held by the Nonconformist ministers present that that conference of bishops did not invite the co-operation of Nonconformists until a cut-and-dried formula, including the adhesion to the dogma of the historic episcopate, had been prepared for acceptance. The idea and the possibility of co-operation were shut out.

Rev. Dr. Mackennal presided at the Reunion Conference on Sept. 6, and carried on the argument. Reunion of the various churches certainly could not lie along the way of uniformity; neither uniformity of doctrine nor of worship, nor even identity of modes of church action. He did not think Christ ordained that there should be uniformity of church government, any more than there should be uniformity of doctrine and ritual. Secondly, the way to reunite the broken fellowship of Christians could not be by an endeavour to right the wrongs of the sixteenth, the seventeenth, or the eighteenth centuries; to avenge the cause of those who suffered, to pronounce condemnation upon those who caused unrighteous sufferings, or to correct things that they had done wrong. This matter of reunion is forced upon Christians by the necessities of the nineteenth century, and it is along the practical necessities of the nineteenth century which compel Christians to work together that all are looking for the solution of the questions which now occupy thought. Thirdly, the way to reunion did not lie along the way of endeavouring to establish a perfect system of reunion, either theoretically sound or practically unobjectionable. One of the wisest lessons of life which we are continually learning was to make the best use possible of imperfect things. The way to perfection lay along the way of using as fully as we could the things that are imperfect. The Doctor passed to consider what had been accomplished. In this connection there were two facts of the utmost importance and significance, as indicating how far reunionists had come toward a reunion of Christian sentiment—a common sentiment in relation to the Church which must be the basis of all reunion. Firstly, there was a large acceptance of the idea that for a better state of church government in all the churches there must be a more generous freedom than had ever been allowed in the historic Church community to the action of the Christian congregations themselves. The Presbyterians of Scotland, as in America, had been forced by the position of things to such an introduction of Congregational methods, to such an appeal to the enlightened conscience and good feeling of the whole Christian community, as that many of them were hardly to be distinguished from Congregationalists in their church rule. And in any system of church rule the first condition is to give to the people the opportunity of making their voice heard, and declaring their will on church matters. As a fact, the removal of one after another of what used to be thought impossibilities from the minds of believing Christians, itself suggested the advent of reunion.

Rev. J. W. Bourne laid down as a basis for unity a confession of Christ as the Son of God and the Redeemer of the world; or, to put it into a formula, the acceptance of Christ in the divinity of his person, in the perfection of his character, in the sufficiency of his atonement, in the love of his heart, in the power of his arm. As an accomplished fact, the Methodist bodies were rapidly gravitating towards union, and in a general view he as a Methodist felt that three denominations in England would be better than five, two better than three, and one better than more. These views he personally advocated thirty years ago.

Dr. Bruce, of Glasgow, Mr. George Lidgett, L.C.C., Mr. Percy W. Bunting, and Rev. Hugh Price Hughes followed, the latter speaker pointing out very plainly that the Unitarians could never be admitted into any organic union with the Nonconformist Churches. Indeed, so strongly and widely was this sentiment scattered among Nonconformists that any suggestion to organically amalgamate with the Unitarians would at once be fatal to any scheme for reunion. He deliberately made this pronouncement because it was sometimes alleged that Nonconformists were less strict on this point than Episcopalians. The acceptance of the doctrine of the divinity of Christ must be the basis of union all round.

Dr. A. Balmain Bruce, of Glasgow, had the ear of the Reunion Conference on Friday. He has delivered himself of more pronounced sentiments than many of his best admirers expected, inasmuch as he has declared for "reunion by destruction" for the Church generally, and reunion by disestablishment for the Scotch Church in particular. But his studied words are best to be reproduced as nearly literally as possible:—

A CHRISTIAN FIRST, A CHURCHMAN NEXT.

I almost feel in a false position in occupying the chair. I am conscious of no enthusiasm for the Church; I attach no unique importance to the sacraments; I am by no means hopeful of reunion on a great scale or even on a small, and I have no scheme for promoting it to propose. I was twelve years of age when the disruption of the Church of Scotland took place, and as I went to college with a memory of that event still green, I cherished from then and up to manhood a keen sense of that great calamity. I have always felt it the great misfortune of my life to be born when the Church of Scotland was not one but broken into fragments. But my grief was not without compensation, for I owe it to the catastrophe to the Scottish Church that I know Christ as I do. Had that Church remained one I might have been tempted to make it an idol, and to be a Churchman first and a Christian afterwards. The idol was broken, and I was disenchanted. So I fled from the sorrowful reality to the ideal—from the Church to the Kingdom of God, from clergymen to Christ; and from the time I arrived at independent religious convictions I have been first a Christian, and only at a long interval a Churchman. And my Christianity has been that of the Gospels rather than that which takes its lines from ecclesiastical creeds, services, and orders. With regard to the Christianity of the Gospels, I am an enthusiast and an optimist. With regard to the Church, its past history, present state, and future prospects, I am, I fear, very much the reverse. The teaching of Christ is to me the very truth, and I cannot imagine a time when it will cease to charm the human spirit. Christianity is not a spent force, not a religion that has passed through evolution towards devolution and dissolution. On the simple principle of the survival of the fittest, it must abide and prosper. Therefore, unless men are to be without religion altogether, they must continue to go to Christ's school and learn of Him.

UNION VIA DESTRUCTION.

But it is not easy to cherish the same hopefulness with regard to the future of the Church. Its past has, on the whole, been very disappointing. Instead of being an aid to faith, it is perhaps the sorest trial to faith. It is the crux rather than the crown of Christian apologetics. Such a past, "by schisms rent asunder, by heresies distressed," as full of the spirit of the evil one as of the Spirit of God, raises the doubt whether on the whole it would not be a gain to the Christian religion if the Church, as we know it, were to disappear and leave the spirit of Christianity free scope for creating a new organisation more worthily embodying its great principles. That amounts to a suggestion that the way to reconstruction is destruction. That which is before us is not "reunion" of existing fragments, but refusion of molten elements. There is no promise in the New Testament to guarantee a less revolutionary future. Those who think it impossible that the Christian Church should be "cast out and trodden under foot of man," like salt which has lost its savour, should recall the fate of the Jewish Church—"Fair as the moon, enduring as the sun," in prophecy, it nevertheless ended in Rabbinism and dispersion. There is no guarantee that the Christian Church will not become Rabbinical in spirit, lose the salt of Christian grace, and incur the neglect and contempt of men. But I hope better things, and things that accompany salvation, though I thus speak.

BARRIERS TO REUNION: DOGMATISM.

Another other hindrances to union there are two which, in my judgment, have a bad pre-eminence—namely, the dogmatic spirit, and sacramentarianism. Dogmatic formulation of faith is, if not indispensable, at least inevitable. As long as men are in earnest about religion they will dogmatise. And what earnest men dogmatise about they are apt to regard as of vital importance, and consequently to make the condition of church fellowship. Hence the endless divisions of the Protestant Church make her present state such a sorry contrast to the imposing unity of the Church of Rome. Reflecting on these divisions one cannot help feeling that too much importance has been attached to opinion, that the dogmatic temper has been in excess, that men have forgotten the distinction between religion and theology, and exalted sound creeds above godly living. This overweening love of opinion is one form of the legal spirit which has had such a baneful ascendency throughout the history of the Church. Its only effectual antidote is the spirit of sonship which realises its responsibility to all who have Christ's name, and desire that the fellowship of Christians may be as wide and full as possible. That spirit is not a free-thinking spirit which affects superiority to all definite convictions. It has its creeds, which it earnestly holds, but it recognises the right and the duty of others to have their creed; and it enables a believing man to realise the possibility of fellow-believers not seeing in all things with his eyes in matters of doctrine. Hence arises the urgent problem of discovering a modus vivendi in Christian fellowship with those whose Christian creed is in certain respects divergent from a standard or supposedly orthodox creed. A higher measure of charity will learn to say, "Let us in some real, effective manner be one, for after all we are all Christians, though we differ seriously in opinion; and let us not pretend to agree more than we do, but find rather in the gravity of our declared differences a means of giving enhanced impressiveness to our ecclesiastical fellowship."

SACRAMENTARIANISM.

Sacramentarianism is the other great divider. I use this term as implying that sacraments are not only symbols, but necessary conditions of salvation, and that to be valid they must be dispensed by only ordained priests—i.e., episcopally ordained priests. It follows from this conception, as I understand it, that religious sects that have not properly ordained celebrants are not in possession of the sacraments, and are not properly churches, or fragments of the true Church. Union of separated churches on such a theory, so far as religious sects not conforming to the episcopal type are concerned, is not possible. The only practical policy for them is conversion from the error of their ways and absorption into the one true Church possessing holy orders and dispensing sacramental grace. The prospect before us, I fear, is not union, but a long controversy as to whether this sacramentarian theory be or be not a true conception of Christianity. This is the previous question. How sad that at the close of the nineteenth century it should still need to be discussed! But the movement of thought in the Church on matters of faith and practice is very slow. Perhaps some centuries hence there may be some approach to agreement in regard to the true place and value of sacraments and clergy. The final understanding may be preceded by a deeper misunderstanding and more radical divergence, some sections of the Church making a fetish of sacraments, others in passionate reaction throwing them aside altogether as no longer means of grace but baneful ministers to superstition. It may be taken for granted, however, that the vast majority of those outside of the so-called "true Church" will ever regard the sacramentarian theory as based on an impossible and incredible conception of Christianity. Not a few will be ready to say, "We poor outsiders do not, it appears, possess a true ministry and valid sacraments. It does not greatly matter. We can do without both as long as we have the historic Christ, and through Him access to our heavenly Father. We may not have clergy or sacraments, and our religious community may not deserve the name of a church, but we may still have fellowship of heart in faith, hope, and love; and we may still also have our spiritual guides, men of open eye and pure heart who can see God, and tell us what they had seen." The prophet, not the priest, is the important person. To the Churchman's ear all this may sound very radical and revolutionary, but the question may modestly be whispered—Is it so very unscriptural, or very much out of keeping with the spirit of prophets, apostles, and the Lord Jesus Christ?

SCOTTISH PRESBYTERIAN UNION.

Dr. Bruce held that the desire for Scottish Presbyterian Union was rising everywhere like a tide. But there are two conflicting theories as to the method of the reconstruction, one party saying, "Reconstruct on the basis of preliminary disestablishment of the privileged fragment," and the other saying, "Reconstruct on the basis of an established Church, with its conditions of establishment readjusted as far as possible to meet existing circumstances." The former is the programme of the Free Churches, the latter of the established Church of Scotland. He would only say that the strength of the Free Church position lay in the assertion that in present circumstances a real comprehensive reunion of Scottish Presbyterianism is not possible, except on condition of disestablishment. If Churchmen could be brought to see this, they would be forced to accept disestablishment, even out of regard to the establishment principle, for that principle is that it is the duty of the State to do all in its power to put the Church in the highest possible degree of efficiency. The Doctor concluded with an eloquent appeal for Christian fellowship.

Mr. PERCY W. BUNTING led off the discussion, taking the line of argument that schisms were the natural outcome of a low state of spiritual existence in the Church, and were intended by Providence to stir the Church up to a new life.

Mr. W. T. STEAD, Rev. HUGH PRICE HUGHES, and other speakers joined in a lively and lengthy debate.

CONCLUDING PROCEEDINGS.

The three months of conference here on "Reunion of the Churches" and all matters suggesting themselves as cognate thereto, was brought to a close on Friday evening by an address from the Rev. HUGH PRICE HUGHES, of the West London Mission, in which he summarised the main points of the entire Conference, and especially the utterances of the last few days. The prominent and final impressions made on his own mind was the necessity of a full definition of terms, and a full appreciation of the reasons which weighed with the promoters and organisers of the Conference. The specific and definite object in the minds of the organisers was the organic reunion of the disjuncta membra of the visible body of Christ; that is to say the corporate reunion of the various organised groups into which the Christian Church has in the course of ages been divided. On this ground Mr. Hughes proceeded to argue that some of the speakers had wandered into two main irrelevancies—the one of being too individualistic, the other of being too collectivist. The distinctive object of the conference, he maintained, was not to promote fellowship among individual Christians; it was not even to promote the return of individual Christians to particular communities of Christians; but on the other hand the object was the organic reunion of Christians as such. The vital point for consideration was—Can the great organised sections of the Church as such come together?

In illustrating this point, Mr. Hughes quoted Mr. Gladstone:—"I am one of those who look more to improved temper and conception in individuals than to the adoption of formulated plans for the promotion of religious unity." It was to this improved temper and spirit amongst individual Christians that the best friends of reunion looked for final success. Mr. Hughes fully and frankly admitted that the most urgent need existed for greater reunion among the various sects of Nonconformists, quite apart from the question of union with the Episcopalians. As a painstaking collator of denominational statistics, he had classified the sects of the Christians of the world into six main groups: Anglicans, Congregationalists, Baptists, Presbyterians, Methodists, and Romanists. Leaving out of the case for reunion the Romanists, as being an impossible creed, he found that Congregationalists, Baptists, and Presbyterians are about equally numerous, each sect numbering about 15,000,000. The Anglicans might be put down at 20,000,000, or at most 25,000,000. Now if ever reunion was to take place it must be by the organic reunion of these groups—probably by the reunion of the Nonconformist groups first, the Anglicans coming round later.

Père Hyacinthe, and Dr. Wiebel, of Lucerne, followed.

THE WHITE CROSS UNION, the object of which is to cope with social vice, was started in Berlin in 1890, and rapidly spread over Germany. Last year a branch was formed in London among German-speaking young men. The membership now stands at 77, for the most part waiters. The members assemble the first Sunday evening in every month in the rooms of the Christian Home for Waiters, 44, Clipstone-street, W. On Sunday, Sept. 3, the first anniversary was celebrated, and Rev. M. Meister, of the German Church, Sydenham, and Mr. W. Müller, of the German Y.M.C.A., gave some instructive addresses, exhorting the members to be firm and true to the promise they solemnly made on joining the union.

THE Y.M.C.A.

THE York Association has just bidden public farewell to Mr. J. H. Bradshaw, late hon. sec., and Mr. J. E. Savage, member of committee, upon their leaving the city to enter on mission work in Ireland.

Mr. Geo. Holmes, missionary secretary for Egypt and Palestine, began on the 14th inst. a lecturing tour through the provinces, on behalf of the Jubilee Fund for Y.M.C.A. extension in the home and foreign fields.

Memorial stones of a handsome building for the St. Austell Association were laid on Thursday afternoon, in the presence of a large gathering of friends. The total cost will be about £2925, towards which £890 has been either received or promised.

The Hertford Association closed a successful fourteen days' tent mission on August 25. The meetings were held nightly. The attendance was good throughout, and not a few, including some young men, have professed conversion. Mr. J. E. Chusuman, of Hatfield, conducted the mission.

The "English Year Book of Y.M.C.A.'s" for 1893-4 is a model handbook of its kind. The statistics and accounts of work enable the reader to survey the world of young men so far as they as they are touched by the Association. The printing matches the compilation in excellence. Copies (1s. each) may be had from the office of the National Council at Exeter Hall.

During the season, open-air services have been held by members of the Sheffield Association, near the lodging-houses, with great blessing. Many poor people have been convicted of sin through the faithful preaching of God's word. Tracts, booklets, and magazines have been also freely distributed. Several temperance pledges were also taken, and it appears that they are being faithfully kept.

A friend, writing from Simla, laments that two important discussions recently held in the Association rooms there resulted in the victory of the wrong party. The questions were—Temperance v. Total Abstinence, and Smoking v. Non-smoking. Temperance is said to have triumped over Total Abstinence on account of the absence of the strongest advocates of the latter; while the victory of tobacco is attributed to the influence and example of two well-known missionaries in the station.

On Friday last Mr. R. C. Morgan addressed a crowded meeting in the Association Parlour, 186, Aldersgate-street, on "The Kingdom of God." He traced God's government of the universe from the creation—through all the varying phases of anarchy before the flood, through different forms of successive rule; the patriarchs, the Jewish theocracy, the four Gentile kingdoms, down to Christ, who, by-and-by, will deliver up the perfectly-restored Kingdom to God. Questions were permitted at the close. These meetings will be continued on the three following Fridays, at eight o'clock.

At the North-Eastern District Conference held at Sunderland last week, an increase of 463 members and associates was reported by the twenty-eight associations sending returns. Among the speakers were Mr. John McInnes, M.A., Mr. W. Hind Smith, and Mr. J. C. Moor (National Council), and Rev. F. Brown, missionary from China, who made most interesting reference to the work of the Y.M.C.A. in Chefoo and Pekin. Lord Kinnaird presided at the annual public meeting and conversazione of the Sunderland Association on Wednesday week, when the Assembly Hall was crowded by fully 1,200 persons.

The handsome new building of the Chicago Young Men's Christian Association is nearing completion, and will soon be ready for occupation. It is on Fifth-avenue, near Madison, and is centrally located. The structure and land cost 2,000,000dols. This will be one of the best-appointed buildings of the kind in the world. The Association will occupy the two stories in front, and two-thirds of the rear of the building. There will be a swimming tank on the first floor, 21ft. by 72ft. There will be storage room for 300 bicycles; a reading-room, on the second floor, with 300 periodicals on file; a lecture-room, with 250 chairs; and an auditorium, with 1300 seating capacity, and a stage to accommodate 150 persons. The gymnasium is complete in all its appointments, and altogether it will be a most delightful resort for young men.

ARMENIAN CHRISTIANS' DEFENCE COMMITTEE.—A final meeting of the above committee was held at 47, New Broad-street, E.C., on Monday, Rev. P. Husband Davies in the chair. An audited statement of accounts was presented and adopted. The committee thereupon was formally and finally dissolved.

LADY MEATH'S beautiful idea has been wrought into many lives. There are now no fewer than 100 branches of the Ministering Children's League, with a membership of 44,000. Each member is pledged to endeavour to perform some kind deed every day.

Letters to the Editor.

LIFE AMONG THE ENGLISH POOR.

Sir,—The letter signed "M. K. B." in your paper has surprised me greatly. I am Hampshire born and bred, and have lived in some six or seven villages in the county, but never lighted on such a favoured spot as your correspondent has stayed in. I never heard of even a four-roomed house to be rented for 9d. or 1s. the week, but I have known a good many cottages in bad condition, the landlords refusing to make even necessary repairs. Many gardens are quite destitute of fruit trees.

A villager must be more than human—or wanting in honesty—to be able to glean enough wheat to supply his family through the winter with bread, let alone feeding the fowls, which are seldom kept. In these days of machine-cut corn there is no great quantity of ears left on the ground. Men working in copses may generally take home of an evening as much wood as they can carry, but nearly all other labourers have to buy for themselves.

If "M. K. B." would kindly name his favoured village he would confer a boon on many who would be glad to move to such a desirable place.—Yours truly, A. F. A. B.

LIGHT FOR A DARK LAND.

Dear Sir,—The last Indian mail brings me an appeal which I beg leave to pass on to your readers. It is from a Bengali Christian brother, a convert who, although but young as years go in the new life, has been greatly used of God as an evangelist to his countrymen, and is being so used still. He is an educated young man, and knows English almost as well as his own vernacular. His appeal is for a supply of books, the study of which would nourish his spiritual life and furnish him with material for his public addresses; and he mentions Mr. Spurgeon, Mr. F. B. Meyer, Mr. Evan Hopkins, Dr. Pierson, and "C.H.M." as the writers whose works he especially desires to become well acquainted with. Some friends may be glad of an opportunity of sending light into a dark land by providing this Indian evangelist with books of the class described, and it will be a great pleasure to me to forward to him any that may be addressed to me.

Yours in the Gospel,

R. Wright Hay, Missionary.

CHEAP AND EFFICIENT MISSIONS.

Dear Sir,—Mr. Horsburgh's letter has prompted me to take up some of the points which he has emphasized from his experience in Inland China, and which I can most heartily endorse from the little experience I have had in the interior of Africa.

Matters of dress and social etiquette, and the general mode of living of the missionary, seem small matters to those who have not had actual experience of the work and even to many of those at work in the mission field in places where European customs predominate.

But in a pioneer work these things have an importance which it is almost impossible to overrate, but very difficult to explain to those who have no experience of such fields.

It is obvious, however, that when a missionary enters for the first time a new part of a country, he will be an object of general interest and attraction, whether for good or ill, on the part of the natives. For some time he may not have the opportunity of speaking much to them, even if he knows their language; but long before he can speak to them they will have formed opinions about him, which will probably have far more weight than the sermons he may preach. This is so in our own country, but far more so among people who are shut off from general intercourse with the nations of the world. Their national prejudices are even greater than our own, and he is a foolish man who seeks to run counter to them, at least so far as they are not anti-Christian. For instance, they will judge of a man's wealth by their own standards, and it is, perhaps, impossible to avoid a reputation of being rich, but it is worth while making an effort to live as simply as possible.

Self-denial probably forms a great part of their idea of religion, and they will not be likely to listen very much to one whom they think is "making a good thing out of it."

It may be true that missionaries are not living luxuriously according to English ideas, and may put to shame many who are living in ease at home, and expecting others to do what they are not prepared to do themselves, but still, according to Chinese ideas or African ideas, they may be living at an unnecessarily higher level than the natives around them.

The complaint was lately made by the correspondent of The Times in Uganda that our missionaries were too condescending, and had erred in treating the natives as brothers, instead of domineering over them. This is just the sort of complaint which was made most vehemently against us by traders and others when we adopted native dress on the Upper Niger. They said that we should not lower ourselves by condescending to the ways of the people, and putting ourselves on an equality with them. But our Master has given us an example which we must follow, not to be lords and masters over those to whom we go, but to be, as He was, a servant.

To conform to their manner of life in all reasonable ways is, in my opinion, the surest way to win the confidence and respect of those amongst whom we may go. It may mean some self-denial; it will certainly need a great deal of attention, but it is well worth the trouble.

In some cases, even in pioneer missions, it may not be possible to conform, except in a most limited extent, to the ways of the people; in some it could not be done without serious risk to health. We would not wish to lay down universal rules, but I would contend most earnestly for the principle of identification of the missionary, as far as possible, with the people amongst whom he goes to work.

SCOTTISH NOTES.

The Queen, who is at present residing at Balmoral, laid the foundation stone of the new Established Church at Crathie on Monday.

Rev. George Robson, senior minister of the United Presbyterian Church at Lauder, died on Friday night in his eighty-eighth year and the sixtieth year of his ministry. He had not preached for the last seven years, but attended the church up to a few weeks ago. His jubilee was celebrated in October, 1883.

It was a wise act on the part of the Wesleyans to send Mr. Hugh Price Hughes' colleague, Rev. T. M. Taylor, to Glasgow; his ministry is already beginning to tell for good. The little chapel in Raglan-street is now crowded with earnest worshippers, who are eager to follow the new minister in an earnest crusade against the religious indifference in the North-west of Glasgow.

The death is announced of Mr. David Crole, associated for many years in the work of the Inland Revenue Department in Edinburgh. Mr. Crole is survived by a grown-up family. He has been an elder in the Free Church since 1843, first in Greyfriars', and latterly in St. Bernard's. He did a vast amount of unobtrusive work among the poor of both congregations, but he took no part in Church politics.

Dr. Stalker, of Free St. Matthew's, Glasgow, is one of the few ministers in Scotland who manages to gather together a large congregation at the weekly prayer-meeting, which is usually held on Wednesday evening. He gets a large choir to assist him, and lectures on the Book of Psalms. He also intends this winter to give occasionally conversational lectures on the leading English hymn-writers, with copious illustrations by the choir. Many who don't belong to his congregation find in his prayer meeting "a well of life" in the midst of the busy week.

A very successful series of meetings was held at Campbeltown, Argyllshire, last week, in connection with the twenty-sixth Scottish National Sabbath-school Convention. Delegates were present from all parts of Scotland, who profited greatly by the admirable papers read to them by Dr. Russell, of Campbeltown, Rev. A. G. Fleming, and W. A. Wetton, Paisley, Arch. Bell, Edinburgh, and Drs. Morrison and Ross, principals of the Free and Established Church Normal Schools, Glasgow. Model lessons were also given by two gentlemen who are famous as Sunday-school teachers in the West of Scotland, Messrs. Alex. Mackeith, Glasgow, and John Wilson, Greenock. These meetings are sure to tell for good on Sabbath-school work throughout the coming winter.

The congregations of St. Bryccdale Free Church and Kirkcaldy Parish Church worshipped together last Sunday in the latter church, the Free Church being placed in the hands of tradesmen for the next few months. Rev. W. J. Macdonald, minister of the Free Church, preached, his sermon being based on Isaiah's prophecy of the reunion of Israel and Judah. He said: "I say nothing of the causes that have kept us separate for the last fifty years. Each congregation could no doubt give good reasons for its separate existence. I only wish that both could meet for a friendly discussion of our differences. Such a meeting, if conducted in large and liberal spirit, might lead to mutual concession and greater agreement. Meantime, let each accord to the other credit for having acted honestly; let us try to understand and appreciate each other's motives. Your presence here to-day declares to the world our substantial underlying unity. Do we not all worship one God, Maker and Father of all? Do we not acknowledge one Lord, who lived and died for us all? Do we not pray for one Spirit, who works in all the same peaceable fruits of righteousness? We have the same creed, the same systems of worship and Church government, and we inherit common traditions."

IRISH NOTES.

Rev. Thomas Waugh, the Wesleyan Evangelist, began a mission at Carlisle Memorial Church, Belfast, on Sunday last.

On Tuesday week, a convention for the deepening of the spiritual life was held in the Methodist Church, Larne, and was largely attended. The day was divided into three sessions, of two hours each.

Miss Herdman, of the North Africa Mission, and Miss Lynd, of the Presbyterian Mission in Damascus, are both at present in the North of Ireland, and have been giving publicly an interesting account of their missionary labours.

The Dublin Woman's Work Association has now ten confederated branches, in most of which largely attended mothers' meetings are held weekly. Seven Bible-women visit among the poor, and five trained nurses; and more than 100 ladies who act as district visitors.

A Gospel mission extending over five weeks has been held in one of the Irish Evangelisation Society's tents at Loughery, co. Down, by Mr. Miller, of Belfast. A noble band of Christian workers assisted at the meetings, which were largely attended, and many are believed to have decided for Christ.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOUR NOTES.

As a result of a suggestion that juniors in America should write to Australian juniors, one society in Adelaide received sixteen letters in a single day.

The Congregational Juniors of Clinton, Mich., enjoy their work so much that they petitioned for a larger service, and now hold their meetings an hour and a-quarter every week.

The Golden Link of Australia urges regular early Sunday morning Christian Endeavour prayer-meetings. "Only a few, the more earnest ones, will attend, but for spiritual refreshing and power you will find no meeting equal to this. The self-denial involved will not only give a zest to that particular meeting, but will carry its sweet reward into all the subsequent services of God's holy day."

A branch has been formed in connection with Bellshill Evangelical Union Church, of which Rev. R. W. R. Trenwith is pastor. The present membership is about fifty. The Society has a weekly meeting, and has the promise of doing much for Christ and the Church. During the past year there has been a net gain of thirty-four in the membership of the church, also a large increase in the Band of Hope.

A very commendable effort has been made by the C.E. societies of St. Louis to extend a true Christian hospitality to strangers. The correspondence committee is to be a centre of information between Endeavour Societies in all towns and the strangers within their gates. Societies everywhere are requested to communicate with the committee when a member or a friend of any member moves to a strange place; the committee will then put the "Endeavourers" of that place into communication with the stranger, that he or she may at once receive a Christian welcome, and be brought under Christian influences.

THERE IS ONE PALM whose bud-sheath opens suddenly, with a loud report; but most buds open very gently, and silently unfold their petals to the sun. Even so it is with children. The conversion of one is violent and sudden; that of others takes place gently and slowly as the opening of the rose to the sun. Cæsar Malan likens his own conversion to a child being awakened by its mother's kiss. So it is with many. They wake up to a new life under the gentle kiss of Divine love.

Notes and Comments.

NEXT week we purpose giving portrait and sketch of Rev. J. B. Wadding-, Vicar of Low Moor, Clitheroe.

In our issues of last week and this week we e given a pretty full summary of the dence given before the Opium Commission ts Westminster sittings. It will be noted the evidence given by Government offi-, and reported this week, is of a very imistic character. In fairness we could withhold this evidence, but we are sure no passionate reader will attach to it the ght that belongs to the statements made the other side by Christian medical men missionaries who have lived for many rs among the Chinese people, and have e into close contact with the awful results he opium habit, both physical and moral.

Just as we go to press, we learn that there been deadly conflict between the Arabs the forces of the Congo Free State at ley Falls. For some time past there have n indications of trouble with the warlike s of Islam, whose power has now, it seems, n utterly broken in a very important on, and the supremacy of Belgium em-tically asserted. That this has been eved at the expense of blood, is cause for rtfelt sorrow and pain. Let us pray that, the curse of Arab domination removed, Gospel may have free course in the in-or of the Continent.

The following letter accompanies the an-ncement of the meetings in the Star Hall, chester, advertised last week. We but heartily sympathise with all that is said:—

ar Christian Friends,—If God lead you to attend our fourth Holiness Convention, we invite you to with unlimited consecration and unlimited ex-tion. If your experience resembles our own, ng has hindered you more, or oftener wasted ewable opportunities, than a limited confidence hat God can and does do for the wholly con-ted and faithful soul. We therefore beseech you nse to measure your immediate spiritual future at may have been an unsatisfactory and un-fying past. Though we have toiled all the night taken nothing, at his word we will let down the net for an unbounded draught. Expect from Him no paltry hand-to-mouth supply, according rather with Satan's estimate than with Christ's. Some seem satisfied if only their faces are momentarily brightened, caring apparently but little whether this radiance is a reflection or proceeds from the kindled light within. Be ours the glow of the indwelling and all-purifying promise of the Father.—Yours heartily,

F. W. Crossley.
Star Hall, Ancoats. Emily Crossley.

"They have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid Him." Such must be the desolate experience of many who love the Lord Jesus, as they retire on the Sabbath from places where of old times the worshippers used to be fed with the finest of the wheat, and satisfied with honey out of the rock. We went to a "Service for the People" last Lord's Day, expecting that an endeavour would certainly be made to declare very plainly the way of salvation through Jesus Christ and Him crucified: that Jesus and the Resurrection would be the definite subject of discourse. Far from it. The only allusion to the way of salvation was the mention in prayer of "the Son of man who came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many." And even this, in a way that left it just as easily to be inferred that the life given was the life He lived on earth, as the life He gave when He offered up Himself upon the Cross.

Mark that long dark line of shadows
Stretching far into the past,
Day by day it seems to lengthen;
Whither doth it tend at last?

The shadows of that long, dark line are those of "fleeted opportunities." Surely no lost opportunities will, in the coming day, be more bitterly lamented than those of winning souls; opportunities of feeding hungry people with the Bread of Life, when stones were given them instead of the Bread of God.

There are not a few indications of a desire to revive and re-decorate the harlot Church, not the least mischievous of which is a paper in the current Pall Mall Magazine on "Rome in America," by Mr. Raymond Blathwayt, of interviewing celebrity. Mr. Stead, in the Review of Reviews, calls it "a curious example of a continued dream." He says: "I began the dream, and dreamed in my 'Vatican and the New Era, a gorgeous vision of a regenerate Papacy undertaking the Director-Generalship of the world in all good works. Mr. Raymond Blathwayt has continued my dream, and in this article we have a not less imposing vision of Rome, not merely regenerate, but Puritan!" The dreaming latter-day fellow-countrymen of Latimer and Ridley are trying hard to blow out the candle which they lighted, not in a dream, but at the stake, at Oxford.

The Evening Continuation Schools for both sexes, constructed by the School Board for London, admitted 34,000 students last session, and a still larger attendance is looked for this winter. Persons over twenty-one years of age are now admitted. The student has free choice of subjects, among which is "the life and duties of citizens." For women and girls there are special classes in practical cookery, domestic economy, &c. In most of the schools vocal music and physical exercises are taught. All this for 3d. a week. The Board will be glad, upon application, "to send to employers of labour, ministers of religion, officers of Sunday-schools, &c., copies of the directory for distribution amongst those whom they can influence to join the schools; and they will be especially grateful for any help which ministers of religion and others connected with Sunday-schools can give, by directing the attention of those amongst whom they work to the facilities thus offered for self-improvement during the approaching winter season." Here is one way in which teachers may help their scholars during the week.

The terrible strike among the colliers has features which the British public will do well to look at carefully, and to impress on its memory. The destruction of property has been serious, but the roughs who had gone to the St. Leger are credited with a good deal of that. The injury to trade can hardly be estimated. The death of three persons, shot down by the soldiers, is, for these times, a new and deplorable incident of the contest between capital and labour. Though new, it is not more tragic than the picture given by the Daily News of child-misery in Wakefield.

Inside the enclosure, there must have been nearly fifteen hundred children, all of them of tender years, and most of them, judging from a general observation, hungry. There was enough for the seven hundred only. The rest had to go without. Outside the palings there was an equally large multitude of children of from three or four to ten years old, standing there patiently with their mugs in their hands, expecting that every moment they would be asked to go in. How weak and frail those little children were! No deception in their appearance, no make-believe of any kind but all reality—enough to move a heart of iron. Near this spot is, as I have said, the market-place. At all hours of the day you may see barefooted, half-clad, weak-looking children searching among the rubbish cast aside by dealers. They do not laugh or play. Their business is too serious for that. The moment one of them spies anything that looks eatable—a fragment of an apple or orange, or crust of miry bread—he or they pounce upon it with the avidity of famished animals. I have seen three young children—the eldest might have been eight—struggling with each other for possession of something more fit to be thrown to the pigs.

The mothers, as a matter of course, suffer along with the children, and so do the husbands.

All of them, men and women, were "clemming" out here in the open-air. "Clemming" is the Yorkshire word for pining from want. You see the word written in their faces. And yet if you pass these men twenty times not one of them will ask you for anything. They will answer your questions simply and frankly, but to ask you for the smallest help—No.

Mr. Hart, once a collier, who has given help according to his ability, declares that the poverty in this part of the mining world far exceeds anything within his fifty years' experience. The men must have a keen sense of unfair treatment (be they right or be they wrong in their view) to endure such misery. And their wives agree with them.

The strike leads us to ask whereabouts we are in the development of things. Mr. John Burns, M.P., who may be supposed to know something, says that as strikes diminish in number they increase in area, in intensity, and in the number of men who are affected. The concentration and federation of capital has caused the organisation of labour. This, he believes, means long, large, and bitter disputes. In his opinion the means of escape is "the awakening of the general public to the folly, waste, and anarchy of the present industrial system, which, based on private ownership, ends in private monopoly, a small class of rich men determining the social conditions of a nation." Mr. Burns wants to transfer the battle to every local and imperial body—that is to say, he would have the condition of the worker made a question at every local and imperial election. It may come to that, but in the meantime the power of conscience, the good sense of men and masters, and the influence of the public ought to have a modifying effect on the fierce antagonism which has sprung up.

The underpaid condition of the manual labourers is often bad enough, but it is equalled, all things considered, by the pay given in some of the professions. The struggles of well-bred, well-educated, and highly sensitive men and women are as pathetic as anything in the annals of the poor docker or collier. According to The Westminster Gazette there are 2000 qualified medical assistants in London working on starvation wages. They have to dress well, "preserve an aspect of easy circumstances," keep wife and children if they have them, as many have, and all on an average salary much less than £100 a year. Advertisements like the following are common:—"Wanted, a qualified assistant for a large City practice. Board in exchange for services." Now the "practice" itself was probably a very lucrative one, for practices are constantly announced for sale worth not less than £1000 a year. Under-paid clergymen and ministers, as well as barristers and other professional men, may be counted by thousands; indeed, the broadcloth is sometimes a good deal worse off than the fustian.

In his address on Wednesday last week, as President of the British Association at Nottingham, Professor Burdon Sanderson advocated vivisection under the polite designation of "physiological research." He thought it highly discreditable that we should have to cross the Channel to the Pasteur Institute, when we might have a copy of that establishment near at hand. The Manchester Guardian pertinently remarks:—

> The question arises whether the knowledge gained, or the possible practical application that may some day turn up, justifies the infliction of what Claude Bernard called the "tortures of the damned" upon a countless multitude of sentient creatures. We do not dogmatise upon the question but we do assert that the question is there, and that something very important is left out when a man delivers a long address on the methods of physiology, ending with a plea for State money in order that those methods may be practised on a yet larger scale, without giving the slightest hint of the fact that the physiologist has to deal not with dead matter but with living and sentient creatures.

Moreover, the question is moral as well as scientific. And who shall say that a future generation, on coming to appreciate more fully the great gulf subsisting between mankind and the lower creatures—who, in turn, are infinitely superior to merely inanimate matter—may not declare vivisection to be both immoral and unscientific?

There are yet on the face of the earth regions that have secrets to deliver up to exploring eyes. About three months ago, at Lake Mulligan, in South Australia, the remains were found of over seventy extinct animals hitherto unknown. These include gigantic birds, several species of colossal kangaroos, and the Diprotodon Australis, a huge marsupial considerably exceeding the rhinoceros in size. Such discoveries enable us to realise as never before the profusion of life on the earth in ages gone by; and they should impress us with the great change that has evidently taken place in the conditions of existence on our planet since "the beginning," when "God created the heavens and the earth."

When the fight for the repeal of the State regulation of vice was going on in England, there was one lesson at least which was indelibly impressed upon the minds of repealers, viz.: "Never make a statement which you could not prove before a judge and jury; you may have sufficient evidence to convince any fair-minded person, but you know how easy it is to put a different colour on things. Be sure also, when you venture a statement on anyone's word, that, if need be, your witness will come forward and substantiate it." Thanks to this training, the British Committee were determined to be quite sure of their ground before they exposed the illegal and immoral proceedings in certain cantonments in India; they had good enough evidence before sending Mrs. Andrew and Dr. Kate Bushnell, but these ladies have proved everything up to the hilt, and have procured fresh information.

Had Lord Roberts known that the opponents of the State regulation of vice were trained and experienced public workers as well as philanthropists, and that the "lady missionaries" had enjoyed special training in tracking down evil men, he would have hesitated before flatly denying their statements, and would thus have saved himself a great deal of humiliation. He has made a very handsome apology, as apologies generally go, for what he so confidently said. At the same time, he would not have qualified his words in such a way as to leave the impression on ignorant minds that, after all, a good deal may be taken from what the ladies say, and the abuse of power in India is very local. The report of the Committee, which has had all the evidence before it, that of Lord Roberts included, tells a different tale. It shows that high-placed officials in India know very little of what is going on (Lord Roberts knew nothing of this particular thing), and that we have in our public service men who will defy the authority of Parliament when it suits their purpose.

One other point in Lord Roberts' apology deserves notice. Nearly half the apology is taken up with a suggestion that it would have been better "if the missionary ladies had been commended to the care of the authorities in India." For one thing, "they would have found their task considerably lightened." So they would; they would have been sent away with an assurance that there was nothing for them to do. When policemen search for stolen goods, they don't usually ask the suspected person kindly to take them round the house.

Dr. Mackennal emphasized at least one incontrovertible truth at Lucerne on the subject of reunion, which should never be lost sight of: "It is along the practical necessities of the nineteenth century which compel Christians to work together that all are looking for the solution of the questions which now occupy thought." In the light of this thought a good deal of encouragement might be gained from the study of the social and moral reforms of the present century. On the committee of every great society such as the Anti-Slavery Society, will be found the names both of Churchmen and Nonconformists of every denomination. To meet and take counsel together in this friendly way, discovered to them severally graces of which they else would have known nothing; a bond of union was woven by frequent intercourse; and the bitterness of denominational variance was sweetened by mutual regard. Lord Shaftesbury, who was a Churchman and a Tory, found himself so constantly supported by Nonconformists and Radicals, that he was obliged to look kindly on men from whom, in many things, he differed. The advantage was mutual. The way to reunion is to unite in promoting the good of the people.

The Wesleyan Methodists acted wisely in appointing Dr. Wm. Nicholas to deliver the Fernley Lecture this year, on the subject of "Christianity and Socialism"; they have done wisely also to publish the lecture at a cheap price.* We fancy the first eight chapters will be the most appreciated. They give the history of the Socialistic movement, and of the evolution and changes of its opinions, under a series of biographical sketches of the great Socialistic leaders. The state of opinion in the different countries is carefully and lucidly set forth. To many students it will be new that Lassalle was born of Jewish parents, and lies buried in the Jewish burying-ground of his native place, Breslau. Karl Marx also was a Jew, the family name being Mordecai. In connection with popular leaders, it is remarkable that John Bright, who was no Socialist also had Jewish blood in him. Israel has done a good deal of the thinking, both bad and good, for the nations.

The second and longer part of Dr. Nicholas' book is by no means to compare with the first. No doubt it will be satisfactory to a large number of the older members of his connexion, but the young school will not find in it the ideas of which they approve. On two points only would we make a criticism. First, Dr. Nicholas makes no attempt to prove that the rich are not growing richer, though he confidently follows Dr. Giffen in showing that the poor are not becoming poorer. Second, he would, we think, find his view greatly modified, if he would be at the trouble to read carefully the whole of the New Testament on the subject of money. Had he done so, he never would have fallen into the sophistical argument which he gives with regard to Dives and Lazarus (p. 115). All the same we are thankful for the book.

THE FIGUERAS MISSION.

We have just heard from Spain that our brother Don Alexander has been condemned by the Court in Gerona to suffer imprisonment for three years six months and twenty-one days, also to pay costs of lawsuits, and all for stating in our Spanish paper El Heraldo, in fidelity to the truth, that the wafer is not the body of Christ, and should not be worshipped as such. We ask the earnest prayers of the readers of The Christian, that the Lord may bless the efforts we shall make on our brother's behalf.

The time for our return to Figueras, to labour, we trust, with renewed physical and spiritual power, draws near, and we once more send forth the cry "Who will come with us to the help of the Lord, to the help of the Lord against the mighty?"

English ladies with private means are greatly needed for visiting in the homes of the poor and sick, helping with mothers' meetings, Sunday Schools, Y.M.C.A., Medical Mission, etc. The language is easily acquired, and the climate all that could be desired; situation on the Mediterranean, and under the shadow of the Pyrenees. The cost of journey from London to Figueras is £7 13s. Ladies not young enough to learn the language quickly would be of great use in writing English, helping with needlework, and in a thousand details which somebody must do. Who will share our happy labours in winning perishing Spaniards for the coming King?

The address of our hon. treasurer, Dr. Macwhirter Dunbar, Hedingham House, Clapham Common, London, S.W., always finds us. We shall be in or near London till starting, the Lord willing, for Figueras on October 2.

Education and Missions.

AN EXPOSITION AND DEFENCE.—3.

BY REV. E. STORROW.

[It will be perceived that these papers are in reply to those by Mr. Phillips in our issues of June 1, 8, 15. The subject is of great interest and importance, and it is well that both sides of the question should be stated.]

(5) But are the results of education encouraging? Looked at as all Christian work in relation to India and Hinduism should be, they are so; and, though somewhat different, will compare favourably with other forms of labour. To have largely, if not mainly, contributed to spread throughout India a far greater amount of accurate knowledge of Christianity than has ever existed among a people not Christian, is a great thing surely. And the knowledge is so accurate, that the libels on Christians, which induced such hate and dread throughout the Roman Empire, and in our own time in China, are impossible. On the other hand, in India, Christianity is respected, though dreaded; for the educated know well how pure, benevolent, and rational it is, and how much in argument can be said in its behalf. Missionaries are honoured, native Christians are neither banned nor contemned as formerly they were, and "the persuasion is growing that Hinduism is passing away."

(6) And it is passing away, as best it should, peacefully, gradually. Polytheism is giving place to monotheism, and it approaches nearer to that of the New Testament, than to that of Islam, or Buddhism, or the Vedas, or philosophical schools. Transmigration ideas are giving place to Christian conceptions of a future life; caste is losing its power. And these are but the more manifest and perhaps of a long series of errors and superstitions which are passing away, after a practical and most disastrous domination of centuries.

(7) Distinct notice should be taken in this connection of the remarkable, yet "peaceful, revolution" affecting the status of Hindu women. There is no more important and beneficent change anywhere passing over any empire, and affecting all its people, and distinctly ameliorating the condition of tens of millions of women. And the most potent factor in these stupendous changes, not only of sentiment, but of practical utility, is the education given to boys and young men in our mission schools.

(8) But there are direct results. Yet before naming them, I should like to call attention to one or two features of the philosophy of missions, especially in their application to India, which are sadly overlooked; since they closely relate to the subject before us. It is important to aim directly at the conversion of persons, and he is most likely to do this who seeks to do it. It must be admitted that the teacher is more liable to overlook this than the evangelist. Nevertheless, he and those he represents, should keep in mind these aspects of our enterprise. In every form of Christian service we accomplish less than we desire. We often aim to do good in a certain direction, and though we fail in our intention, we find that good is done in another way. And our best and noblest aims are multiform not simple. How many Sunday-school teachers, ministers, evangelists at home, or preaching ministers abroad, are as successful in making converts as they desire? But what an immense amount of blessing, in many ways, remote and indirect, do we find resulting from faithful Christian effort! And any well-considered conception of our aims in India must take into account not only the conversion of individuals, but the ultimate issue we cannot but set before our minds—the overthrow of heathenism throughout a vast empire and the final triumph of the Kingdom of Christ. It would marvellously strengthen and dignify the missionary enterprise if we realised this. All our true work tends towards these sublime issues, and it is quite capable of proof that Christian education is one of the mightiest agencies in overthrowing one and advancing the other.

(9) Converts are not here so numerous as faithful labourers desire, but those out of mission schools are more numerous than is often supposed. For beside those who, when students, avow their faith in Christ, should be reckoned that not inconsiderable class who are secret disciples, and on occasion avow they are "Christians at heart." Those most competent to form a judgment believe that there are thousands of these. There are few missionaries who have not met with such, or heard of solemn avowals of faith in Christ even in Hindu homes, when death was imminent, or welcomed converts after years of waiting, who have declared that the foundations of their faith were laid in the mission school.

(10) Then, as to the converts, these things may be averred of them as a class: They give by a Christian profession remarkable evidence of courage, grace and disinterestedness. Their conversion often excites deep and even profound interest in religion, in the institutions, families, and castes to which they belong, which often extends to other families, and to the students of Government colleges. A large proportion of the best-educated and high-caste converts in many churches are from mission schools, and in intelligence, stability, high character, and influence they usually lead.

(11) An unusual proportion of such converts become pastors of churches and preachers to the heathen. The former stand high for good judgment, aptness to teach, ability to rule, and consistency of character. The latter, for power to preach, alike to the ignorant and educated, the gainsayer and inquirer; and usually they command a respect and attention not given to men of lower birth and smaller attainments. Any number of facts can be given in support of these statements.

I have dealt with the principal objections to education as a mission agency, and, if not with others, it certainly is not because they cannot be met. But there is still one requiring some notice. It is urged that education makes Deists, not Christians; and that it deprives young men of their ancestral religion, but gives them no other in its place. I reply, a broad distinction must be drawn between secular education given in Government schools and colleges, and the avowedly Christian education given in mission schools. As for the former, more is to be said than is usually supposed. Education is surely good in itself, and Evangelical Protestants should be the last to depreciate and dread it. And the Government of India should have due honour for attempting to give, not only a superior education to the few, but to teach the three R's to the many. It is easy to condemn the Government policy, but by no means easy to define a wiser and better that the Government of such an empire could adopt.

Then it is almost inevitable, as the history of Christianity shows, that whenever it comes into conflict with the superstitions of races not barbarous, such as the Egyptians, Syrians, Greeks, and Romans of the past, and Hindus of the present, the few only will pass directly over from the old faith to the new, whilst the majority slowly, step by step, and not without controversy and struggle, will follow deviously. But the Aryan race is too profoundly imbued with the religious spirit to become infidel, and, depraved though human nature be, the final issue of the great spiritual conflict can only end in the triumph of Christianity.

And the term Deist is used in this connection in a misleading sense, and, I fear, with the intention of exciting a prejudice against educational missions. There is a very general and wide distinction between English Deists and Hindoo Theists, for that is the word they use. The former have departed from the truth; theirs is a descent from the higher to a lower. With the latter it is otherwise. Theirs is a departure from the filthiest and grossest of all forms of polytheism, towards pure monotheism—an ascent from abysmal error toward the sublimest and most vital of all truths.

Mission schools exist to teach and promulgate monotheism of the pure Christian type. And they are doing this in a manner most marked. To say they make infidels is a most misleading and uncharitable statement. A very large proportion of those who pass through them cease to be idolaters—surely in itself an immense gain—and become monotheists of a devout, refined, and elevated type. It is often associated with profound reverence, habitual worship, and much intellectual respect for Christianity, for all such students learn to know how much can be said in behalf of its claims, and how far in rationality, elevation of principle and aim, and moral and spiritual power, it excels all other religions. They have ceased to be Hindus of the common type. Their countrymen declare they are apostates from the religion of their fathers; and of great numbers it may be truly said "they are not far from the Kingdom of Heaven." Few mission students take up an attitude hostile to Christianity. They go out of their way to exhibit respect for missionaries, and often in argument take their side. All this, no doubt, leaves much to be desired, but it proves how far on the way from Hinduism to Christianity a large and influential mass of Indian society has advanced.

Mr. Phillips cites an instance which seems to indicate another state of things—some 400 students of a Christian college in Madras meeting to oppose the baptism of a fellow-student. That was an exceptional, not a typical, case. His paper is marred by drawing very wide conclusions from isolated instances, and advocating a scheme which would work far more evil than good.

HARVEST HYMN.

See the hills and plains are bare,
Smiling late with waving grain;
Garnered now with watchful care,
Harvest-home is come again.

Ploughers, sowers, reapers, rest,
Now the long year's work is done,
By the Lord of harvests blest;
Hail! the golden trophies won!

Man and beast alike are fed
By the bounteous hand of Heaven,
As when once the tribes were led,
And the manna once was given.

Thee we hail, immortal Good!
Sovereign ruler of the skies,
Blest dispenser of our food,
Holy, Infinite, and Wise!

Hearts are bowed before THY face,
With our thanks to THEE we come,
Every good to THEE we trace,
And the joy of harvest-home.

Retributive Justice.

"Eye for eye, tooth for tooth."—Ex. xxi. 24.

Few passages in Scripture have been more completely misunderstood than that in which our Lord contrasts the old Mosaic law of retribution with His own Divine injunction to requite evil with good. In the first place, people fail to see that the law of Ex. xxi. 24 is probably couched in somewhat figurative language, and that Moses no more contemplated a man's actually plucking out an eye from his neighbour, unless in very exceptional cases, than our Lord contemplated a man plucking out his own eye when He said, "If thine eye offend thee, pluck it out and cast it from thee." But, be that as it may, one thing is certain—that the principle of exact retribution is one that in one form or other underlies the laws of all civilized lands.

In England the law demands that the man who takes life shall forfeit life, while in numbers of civil cases the damage a man has done to his neighbour's business or reputation, by libel, for example, is apprised at a money value, and the offender is required to make exact amends in money for the injury done. In other lands, especially Oriental lands, thieves are obliged to make exact restitution of property stolen. Such laws, which are based on a universally-recognised principle of right, would be specially necessary in a state of life such as that which prevailed when the Israelites were in the desert, or even after they came into the promised land, and so long as prisons and all the modern machinery of justice were non-existent.

But the most important part of this law of retribution is its restraining tendency. People living under a Christian civilisation seem to be unable to imagine a state of life where the loss of an eye or of a tooth would provoke retaliation, in which the offender would be made to lose both his eyes, or all his teeth, and perhaps his life into the bargain. The writer of this paper, living in China, heard not long since of an incident that he knows to be true which illustrates this point. On a Yang-tsze steamer, the property of Chinese owners, a poor Chinaman tried to travel without paying for a ticket. On the way down to Shanghai the deception was discovered by the Chinese employés whose business it was to collect the tickets and fares of passengers. After fruitless altercation with the poor passenger, who having nothing to pay could pay nothing, he was stripped of his clothes on a cold winter night, and hung up by his hands and feet in an exposed place, by way of punishment for his attempt to defraud the company of two or three shillings. In the morning those who had hung him up came to release him when they found him frozen to death!

Now, Moses knew well, and God knew better, the tendency of human nature to take a madman's revenge on those who offend it, and the law, "Eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot," was a merciful law, based, indeed, on the principle of retributive justice, but so hedged in that while offenders were punished as they deserved, they were not handed over to the blind fury of angry enemies. I have given an illustration of heathen ideas of justice, or rather of retribution, from China. Let anyone read the history of Haman, desiring to destroy all the Jews he could lay his hand on, in return for a personal affront received from one member of the nation; or let them read of his making a gallows fifty cubits high to hang his enemy on; or, again, let them read the account of Nebuchadnezzar, "in his rage and fury," trying to make fire seven times hotter than itself, in order to be revenged on Shadrach and his companions; and they will see how men, with no restraining principle within, and no restraining law, such as the Mosaic law, without, will try to multiply the horrors of their revenge to the utmost; and because they cannot hang a man fifty times will at least bring in fifty somewhere, and make up by the height of a gallows for the narrowness of their opportunity of passionate vengeance.

What does our Lord say in regard to all this? Not one word against the law as given by Moses for the administration of public justice, but He gives a higher and nobler law to regulate the lives, and thoughts, and feelings of his disciples. The magistrate may do, and must do, many things as he fulfils the ministry entrusted to him by God (Rom. xiii.), which the private individual is not bound to do, and has no right to do. Our Lord's words were not directed against the public administration of justice, but against the private indulgence of revenge.

I may conclude with an illustration, showing, as it seems to me, the true harmonising of justice and forgiveness. A dear friend of mine was robbed in one of the streets of London of a gold watch, but he succeeded in seizing the thief just as he had snatched the watch. He at once handed him over to a policeman. The next day he had to appear at the Mansion House to prosecute, which he did, and the thief was sentenced to a term of imprisonment; my friend immediately sought out the prisoner's wife and family, and helped to support them till their natural supporter was released. Surely in such a way as this the loyal Christian heart finds the true meaning of giving the cloke to the man who stole his coat, while at the same time magnifying the law and making it honourable. F. MISSIONARIES IN CHINA.

Dear Sir,—The missionaries in Amoy received copies of a call to prayer by the friends in Shanghai, and were fully responsive. We had wished to show sympathy in the trying circumstances of the Sungpu massacre, but found no opportunity. In our helplessness as regards human aid for the prevention of such disasters, it seemed a relief to be brought to the source of heavenly power. The day fixed was the Emperor's birthday; there seemed an appropriateness in this. The appeal came from one closely connected with the National Prayer Union, and Monday is also the day on which members of that Union seek the fuller gift of the Spirit and the raising up of Chinese apostles.

A considerable company met here last evening, and the hearts of God's people and servants were open to pray—for greater courage lest even dwelling on such painful troubles should intimidate any; for power, especially to native converts to endure trial; for the salvation of our opponents all over the country; for those who are immediate sufferers through the murders; for the salvation of the murderers; for the fulness of the Spirit in this time of need and preparation; for God to carry on the wonders of his grace already begun in China; for spiritual union with our brethren everywhere, thanks being offered for the present instance; for due preparation and guidance as to coming crises; for a realising sense of the presence and power of Christ, so as to perceive that all difficulties are nothing to Him, and that He will work his blessed will; for consuls and all officials, native and foreign.

A spirit of gratitude was shown that we enjoy so great an extent of liberty, in some respects more than in Turkey, for spreading the truth; and because we are allowed to use so many means for doing the work of God.

It is possible that the occurrence of such troubles may unite the hearts of God's children all over China more and more, and lead to the creation of a more healthy public opinion. Believing prayer on the part of God's people may prevail either to prevent the native converts from being put to physical torture, or to prepare them for such an ordeal, to them peculiarly trying.—Yours, J. Sadler.

Apocalyptic Scenes.

By Sir S. Arthur Blackwood, K.C.B.

XXVII.

THE FIRST SIGN.

We now approach the second main division of the prophecy, that, namely, which is contained in the series of visions consisting of the seven signs, the seventh of which expands into the seven vials. This arrangement corresponds exactly with the form in which the first part of the revelation was conveyed to the Apostle, namely, seven seals, the seventh of which opened out into the seven trumpets.

The first series occupied from ch. vi. 1, to the end of ch. xi.; the second commences with ch. xii., and concludes with ch. xvi. As has already been said, the seven signs are not specially numbered, like the seven seals, the seven trumpets, and the seven vials. They have to be discovered. But this is no argument against the theory that they are seven in number. A vast number of instances occur in the Scriptures, where God has recorded a seven-fold series of events or utterances, without specially calling attention to their numerical character. The seven Divine words in Eden after the Fall, the seven weepings of Joseph, the seven commands to Pharaoh to let Israel go, the seven excuses of Moses, the seven petitions in the Lord's prayer,* the seven parables of Balaam, and of our Lord in Matt. xiii., the seven sayings to the woman of Samaria, the seven words on the Cross, the seven "walks" in the Ephesians, the seven Beatitudes in the Revelation, are well known, and they are but examples out of a number which it would astonish those who have not examined the subject to learn.

Whatever purpose was intended by the use of the number, and into that we do not now enter, it is clear that the fact of its repeated use, without being specially noticed, was meant, for one thing at least, to stimulate search into the Scriptures; and the employment of a series of seven signs, not consecutively numbered, in a book so mysterious as the Apocalypse, is almost for that very reason a circumstance which we should rather expect than be surprised at. The first two, and the last being expressly designated as "signs," it would almost seem as if that fact alone were intended to lead to the attempt to discover the other four, which would complete the number seven, a number in itself so characteristic of the book.

Moreover, says Canon Garratt, "In ch. xv. 1, we have a clear proof of the correctness of the sevenfold arrangement of the signs. Comparing that verse with ch. viii. 1, 2, it is impossible not to see that between the seventh seal and the seventh sign there is a complete analogy. The last seal contains nothing but the seven trumpets, and the last sign contains nothing but the seven vials, from which it appears certain that the system consists of one series of seven seals and seven trumpets; and another series of seven signs and seven vials. Symmetry of design is so evident in the framework of the book that the most symmetrical arrangement has in itself a strong à priori probability."

In now considering the series of the seven signs, it is necessary to dwell for a short time on one or two points which are of great importance in their interpretation.

1. It is assumed that the two series of visions relate to one and the same chronological period, commencing with the time at which they were shown to the seer, and concluding with the close of this dispensation and the second coming of our Lord. They both end with the lightnings and voices and thunderings, with an earthquake and the great hail (ch. xi. 19, xvi. 18-21). The grounds for this assumption will, it is believed, appear as an examination of the prophecy proceeds.

2. Though covering the same period and concerned with the same subject, namely, the history of the Church and the world (i.e. the Roman world, or fourth great empire) during this dispensation, that history is presented in a different aspect in each series of visions. "The first line of prophecy (I again quote from Canon Garratt) relates more to outward churches, and less to the spiritual church; it has more to do with acts, and less with the hidden principles from which they spring."

3. The form of record is, moreover, different. The first set of visions relates a series of events; the second treats of a series of subjects. Both these methods are frequently employed by historians, and the use of both on the occasion under notice gives the history a completeness which it could have possessed on no other plan.

4. But both series are alike in this, that while the commencement of the visions are in due chronological sequence, their endings are not. The termination of one frequently overlaps the beginning of the next. This is inevitable, and applies to all history. As one colour of the rainbow merges into the next, so do the successive events recorded by history overlap. This appears very clearly in the first series, but it is of greater importance that it should be borne in mind in examining the second, since it will there be seen that though the commencements of the events prefigured by each sign are in chronological succession, the course of one event extends far beyond the beginning of the next, perhaps even down to the very end.

5. The symbolism employed in the series of the signs and vials is more recondite, more mysterious, and therefore more difficult of interpretation than that of the seals and trumpets. Much of it, indeed, is the same, but a considerable portion is new; and dealing, as has been said, more with hidden principles than with outward acts, it is harder to be understood. While believing that the method of interpretation is in the main correct, dogmatism is consequently out of place; and differences of opinion between those who have sought to unravel this most marvellous book are to be expected, rather than to be wondered at. I believe, however, that further light will be vouchsafed, as the end draws nearer, and that no honest and humble attempt to search into the meaning of the Divine word will be wholly in vain.

What, then, is the first sign or wonder? It is that of the sun-clothed, moon-trampling, star-crowned woman, the object, like the man-child whom she brings forth, of the great red dragon's enmity and persecution. Her appearance and disappearance are contained in the 12th chapter, for she is not seen again, and we find in her history an immediate exemplification of what has just been stated, viz., that the signs overlap each other in their course, though they are consecutive in their commencement. In this case the second sign begins in the 3rd verse of ch. xii., but the career of the sun-clothed woman is continued throughout the chapter, and subsequently to the commencement of the second sign in verse 3.

What is the meaning of the sign? In the light of Is. liv. 1 and Ga. iv. 26, 27, there can surely be no doubt that we have here a symbolic representation of "Jerusalem, which is above—which is the mother of us all," and who is again seen as "the bride, the Lamb's wife"—having the glory of God," in ch. xxi.

It is the church of St. John's day, in her pristine loveliness, "looking forth as the morning, clear as the sun, fair as the moon, and terrible as an army with banners." She is radiant with the glory of her Lord, the Sun of righteousness; her brow is encircled with apostolic truth, the twelve stars, and she stands victorious, treading down all the power of the enemy (Luke x. 19), for the moon, as the ruler of the night, is symbolic of "the world-rulers of the darkness of this age" (Eph. vi. 12).

She is "the mother of us all." The Man-child, who is to rule all nations with a rod of iron, is the symbol of those who, in succeeding generations, overcome, and who, keeping Christ's work unto the end, inherit the promises of ch. ii. 26, 27, and are manifested as "the sons of God" (Rom. viii. 12-27). In Is. lxvi. 8, 9, the birth of a man-child is explained as prefiguring the bringing forth of "a nation," the birth of Zion's children. There is a wealth and variety of symbol here which at first perplexes, but is soon seen to be marvellously appropriate to the different circumstances of the people of God. That they should be represented in one verse as a woman, and in the next as a Man-child, need not surprise the careful student of Scripture. The former figure is familiar to us; but we find that the body of Christ, is also spoken of as "one new man," and as "a perfect man," destined to attain to "the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ" (Eph. ii. 15 and iv. 13) and this too, in the Epistle, which above all others, describes the Church as the Bride (see Eph. v. 32). Against this offspring of the early Church, the enmity of the dragon (i.e.—the devil, ver. 9.) for we must here anticipate the second sign—is at once aroused. But neither can he succeed, nor can all the expectations of immediate triumph over the nations which prevailed in early days be realised. The time has not arrived for association with Christ in the dominion promised to him in Ps. ii. 8, 9—"I will give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession; thou shalt break them with a rod of iron." The Church in this dispensation is indeed seated "in heavenly places in Christ Jesus" (Eph ii. 6), or in the symbolic language of the text, "caught up to God and to his throne," where the vision of ch. iv. 4 had previously exhibited her. But she is at the same time militant here on earth, engaged in fierce and continual conflict with all the powers of evil.

As the possessor of a charmed life, the object of Divine protection, the great dragon, the old serpent, the devil, cannot destroy that Church. He may be permitted to "make war with the woman's seed" to rob them individually of their earthly lives, and apparently "to overcome the saints" (ch. xiii. 7). But their real "life is hid with Christ in God," beyond the reach of harm. They are eternally secure.

The continuation of the first sign then represents "the woman" as fleeing into the wilderness, and miraculously preserved for 1260 days (or years), spoken of again in ver. 14, as "a time, and times and half a time"—i.e., three and a-half years, or 1260 days. First she is assisted by "the two wings of a great eagle"; and then by "the earth," which swallows up the flood which the serpent casts out of his mouth in order to destroy her. From that time the symbol of the woman as representing the Church is dropped.

The explanation of the imagery here employed is surely not difficult when the light of history is thrown upon it.

It was but for a very brief period that the sun-clothed, star-crowned, moon-trampling woman, the Church of Christ, shone forth in her purity, and beauty, and power, the power of her risen Lord. Then had she "favour with all the people" and "the people magnified" her (Acts ii. 47, and v. 13). But the light was quickly dimmed; the unity of the body was marred, and by degrees the very idea of the Church, as an unique creation, invested with the glory and endued with the power of her Saviour, vanished. Milner, the ecclesiastical historian, records how rapidly after the establishment of Christianity by Constantine "faith, love, heavenly mindedness appeared very rare, the doctrine of real conversion was very much lost, and external baptism placed in its stead, justification by faith in a crucified Saviour was scarcely to be seen, and the real Gospel of Christ was hidden." Ere three centuries had elapsed her flight was completed. Then succeeded the 1260 years of gross papal darkness, during which she was lost to the view of men. She was in the wilderness indeed.

Yet the wings of "the eagle, the great one" (see Greek) were of no small use to her. As in other days, "a great eagle with great wings" denoted the greatest of existing empires, the unbroken Babylonian power (Ez. xvii. 3), and another great eagle with great wings represented that of Egypt (v. 7), so here the symbol well set forth the imperial power of Rome, which was devoted, and notably in the days of Theodosius the Great, to protect and assist the Church of Christ. Indeed, as Gibbon says, "Every victory of his contributed to the triumph of the orthodox and catholic faith," and, previously to those days, for a considerable part of the three centuries, the empire, in both its divisions, east and west—its "two wings"—instead of persecuting the Church, had helped her.

Thus, as truly observed in the "Notes and Comments" of The Christian of February 23, 1893, "has the common sense of governors and magistrates, on some occasions, been of eminent service to the truth."

Failing to destroy the Church by open persecution, in consequence of the Pagan empire having become—at least in name—Christian, the great enemy, that old serpent, then adopted other measures. As at the beginning from his lips came the lie which beguiled Eve, so now "out of his mouth was cast water, as a flood, after the woman, that he might cause her to be carried away by the flood." "The mouth of the wicked (and especially of 'that wicked one') poureth out evil things." It was the age of heresies. Arianism, Macedonianism (unjustly called Nestorianism), Eutychianism, and other false doctrines respecting our Lord's person and nature arose one after the other. But "the earth opened her mouth and swallowed up the flood." As the sea is the symbol of nations in a state of unrest, so the earth represents a settled condition of things. It was the power of Imperial Rome that summoned the Œcumenical councils, which refuted and condemned the heresies, and framed our creeds.

Thus, and in other ways, as Canon Garratt says, was the Empire a help to the people of God during the three hundred years which the flight into the wilderness occupied: maintaining the truth, preserving a greater degree of freedom of conscience than would otherwise have existed, and restraining the overbearing tyranny of ecclesiastical rulers, or Nicolaitanes. "The earth helped the woman." But the time of her disappearance was at hand, and soon there remained but "the remnant of her seed, which kept the commandments of God, and had the testimony of Jesus Christ," and against whom the dragon, filled with wrath, "went to make war."

PERSONAL STEWARDSHIP.

By Jacob H. Schiff.

Many, if not most, men of means acknowledge the duty imposed upon them to permit their fellow-beings to benefit, to some extent, through the larger wealth which a kind Providence has allotted to them. As a rule, those who have acquired wealth through their own exertion will be more ready to carry this duty into practical effect than those whose fortune has come to them through inheritance; nor will the men included in the latter class be found as ready to bestow a part of their wealth for public purposes during their lifetime.

It is no sacrifice, and consequently hardly a meritorious action, to dispose of part of one's fortune by testament; for with our death we cease to own and to enjoy the wealth accumulated during life. Charity and philanthropy, to become effective, should have personal supervision; for it is unlikely that others can carry into practical effect our ideas and intentions as well as we can do it ourselves.

The heart being more readily touched than the head, charity abounds, while philanthropy is wanting; and while, as a rule, hospitals and societies for the care of the afflicted are generously supported, many of the most meritorious educational institutions are compelled to vegetate for want of public spirit on the part of those upon whose support these institutions have to rely for their very existence.

The surplus wealth we have gained, to some extent at least, belongs to our fellow-beings; we are only the temporary custodians of our fortunes. Let us be careful that no just complaint can be made against our stewardship, nor against the refusal to permit others entitled to it to enjoy a tithe of our wealth until the inexorable laws of nature compel us to leave it behind us.—*N. MISSIONS IN JAPAN.

Missionary enterprise out here is somewhat in abeyance just now. Everyone, with a few exceptions, who can get away, has gone to one or other of the attractive places in the hills of which there are so many in Japan. Still, Christian effort is not altogether wanting. The Seamen's Mission, in the capable hands of J. Austen during her husband's absence, seems to be very effective in reaching the sailors. Dr. Meacham is evidently doing a useful work at the Union Church and at the Bluff. Mrs. Pearson, who is connected with one of the American societies, has a large number of Bible women (about eighty, I believe) whom she supports and superintends. She has been twenty years in Japan, and has yet to take her first holiday! She is a great example to others.

In Tokio, Dr. Whitney, of the American Legation, is full of good works. His hospital, which he superintends in his spare time; his Scripture Union of Japan, now numbering some 12,000 members, many of them heathen; his Post and Telegraph Mission; his Railway Mission, are all more or less flourishing, praise the Lord.

The first anniversary of the Railway Mission was held at Sheba, Tokio, on Saturday last, and though not to be compared with the anniversaries of the Railway Mission of England, held in Exeter Hall, yet it was full of promise for Japan. The Lord has faithful witnesses in Japan. May He increase both their faithfulness and their number!

Perth Christian Conference.

[By our Special Correspondent.]

Many memories crowd the mind as, entering once more the old City Hall of Perth, one recalls honoured saints and teachers, now with God, who have witnessed for Him within its walls. Only last year we sat close behind Dr. Andrew Bonar and reported what proved almost his last public utterance. These have gone to their reward, but others have been raised by God to open out the treasures of his Word, and thus this annual gathering has been marked this year, as in the past, by fire and fervour, an earnest spirituality and an intensely practical purpose. The general subject of the Conference, held on Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday in last week, was "The Christian Life as a Walking with God: Here and hereafter."

TUESDAY.

On the first morning Lord Kinnaird, who presided, read several passages of Scripture, and very briefly introduced the theme, showing its great importance as bearing on everyday life and service.

Rev. G. H. C. Macgregor said: "Enoch walked with God"—so shortly and succinctly does the inspired writer tell the story of this remarkable man who stood head and shoulders above his generation, and yet of whom we know nothing save that he walked with God, and was not, for God took him. Of only two of the Old Testament saints is it specifically stated that they "walked with God"—these two are Enoch and Noah. Others, such as Abraham, Moses, David, Nehemiah, and Daniel, truly walked with God, but it is not specially predicated of them. If such men walked with God, why should not we, to whom is revealed in Jesus Christ the full glory of the Father?

Now, what is it to walk with God? It is not one act, or even a series of acts; it is a habit of life.

With Enoch it was no exceptional, spasmodic thing; neither must it be with us. It must be a consistent and continual walk; going on in the daily round of life, in the dull and monotonous routine of duty and care. Now what is the characteristic of the man who thus walks with God? It is the continual consciousness of God. God is in all his thinking and will and way. And what is the character of the life itself? It is not necessarily one of complacency, for the more fully a man is convinced of God's holiness, the more he realises his own worthlessness and need of the cleansing blood. But it is a life of joy, for there is no joy like that which comes to the soul which is walking with God. Further, it is a life of peace, a peaceful life. It is a life free of fear, for while there are difficulties there is a deep sense of confidence and calm in the realised presence of God.

Such is the life we are called on to lead. It is only possible to those who are children of God. But there are those who are in Christ, and who yet feel they are not walking with God. What is to be done? The first thing is full and frank confession; the second is to lay hold afresh of God's promises, and the third is the laying aside of everything that is calculated to offend God. There must be separation from sin if we are to enter on this life so different from that which we have been leading. There are many things that have to be given up and put away. May God give us to know the glory of this fellowship with Him in daily life!

Rev. Dr. Elder Cumming read Micah vi. 8: "What doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?" These words, addressed by Balaam to Balak, indicate that at one moment in the king's history there was a tremendous crisis, and there seemed a possibility he might give up his idols and follow God. He was prepared to give thousands of rams, rivers of oil, and even the heir to his throne, but was told that God would have none of these. The King is reminded of what God would have—righteousness of life, a merciful heart, a walk before God. All this, however, implies an antecedent step, as shown by the little word "thy." God must be our God, ere we can can walk with Him. The great hindrance is pride; until that barrier be removed we cannot walk with God. This walk is not an occasional heroic endeavour, but the daily round and common task, the usual habit and demeanour of our life. Further, it is a walk open to every Christian, a step at a time and always in a forward direction. It is a walk by faith, simple trust in the Father, even when He sends hard blows, for we know He sends them in love and in wisdom. So we walk through life till the door opens to us and we pass through into the light of God's presence, the light of the glory of Heaven.

the afternoon meeting on the first day began with an address on spiritual life, and went on to work among the Jews, among special classes, and among the young.

Rev. E. W. Moore said, in the course of his address, that we are called to walk in wisdom towards them that are without, in order that we may not prove hindrances to them. How is this wisdom to be gained? In Isa. xi. 2 we have the perfect pattern held up before us. There we see that the spirit of wisdom and understanding rested upon Christ. We are deeply conscious of our need of filling and guidance; but do we understand that God offers—not so much direction as a Director, even the Holy Spirit? After showing how the Spirit of God, in his various attributes, rested on Jesus, the speaker concluded by urging our need of the fulness of the Spirit for wisdom and counsel, and the glorious possibility of our receiving Him in large measure if we but place ourselves unreservedly at his disposal.

Mr. Leopold Cohen, who is going to New York to work with Mr. Warszawiak, gave some account of his religious experiences in Hungary, showing how he had been brought up to regard the Christians as idolaters, and the cross as an idolatrous symbol. At length, after becoming a Rabbi, he became convinced, from his study of the ancient Scriptures, that the Messiah must have come already. By-and-by, in the providence of God, he was led to hear Mr. Warszawiak, and in due season was brought to the Lord Jesus, and is now seeking to make his name known to his brethren after the flesh.

Mr. E. J. Kennedy spoke on work among young men as one of the most important efforts of the day, seeing that these young men will in a few years be leaders in Church and nation. After touching on the dangers of young men—specially on gambling—the speaker told something of what London workers are trying to do for these young men coming up from the country, and claimed sympathy and prayer for those who seek to care for endangered lads far from home and friends.

Some twenty minutes were then devoted to open conference, in which various speakers took part. Amongst these, Mr. J. R. Mackenzie gave an account of the work of the Monthly Tract Society. The secretary of the Scottish Navvy Mission described the work and needs of the society, which has at present six missionaries engaged amongst the navvies of the north. Another spoke of three years' service among ploughmen, a hard work in many ways, but one that had been much blessed of God. The next half-hour was set apart for special prayer for the salvation of our children, while in the Tay-street Hall a ministers' meeting was addressed by Dr. Elder Cumming.

WEDNESDAY.

After a season spent in praise, prayer, and the presentation of numerous requests, the first address of the day was given by

Dr. Elder Cumming, who said: There are four texts, which fall into two pairs, to which I want to call your attention. These are, Col. ii. 6 and 2 Cor. vi. 16; Gal. v. 16 and 25. The first, "As ye have received Christ Jesus the Lord, so walk ye in Him" may be read in two senses. One is a causal relation: because ye have received Christ, walk in Him. That is to say, there is an obligation resting on everyone who has accepted Christ to walk in Him. But the second sense brings out the similarity between accepting Christ at the first and going on with Him. Christ was accepted by faith, so the secret of sanctification is Christ accepted by faith. Faith is the key which opens both doors. Passing on to the second member of the first pair, 2 Cor. vi. 16, we find the promise made by God, "I will walk in them." Now see the contrast, yet connection, between these two texts. In the first the human aspect appears, we are to walk in Christ; but in the second it is God who walks in us. There is a manifest difference, and we may not pass over a word and say things are the same though differently expressed. There is an ego in both texts, but in the one it is God and in the other man. But while this is so, I believe that we may view our life in the aspect in which God views it, and regard Him as the Doer, the Worker, the Walker. The difference between the two texts is obvious enough, but careful attention brings out a harmony. The second principle brings a wonderful reality,

a marvellous change, into the whole of our lives.

Now turn to my second pair. You see they have to do with the Holy Spirit, and you know how radically important this is in the Christian life. Take two Christian men. One is a good man, walks as he best knows how with his eye on Christ, but somehow he knows little of the Holy Spirit, who is scarce more to him than a name. But take another one who has come to know the blessedness of the power and presence of the Spirit, one to whom the Holy Spirit is a reality: what a difference between these two! You at once see that the one lacks, with all his excellences, something which the other has. Now our first text (in this second pair) is Gal. v. 16: "Walk in the Spirit, and ye shall not fulfil the strong desires of the flesh." The second is verse 25 of the same chapter: "If we live in the Spirit, let us also walk in the Spirit." Now, in the original these are not the same thing. The words used for "walk" are different. The first is individual walk, the second is walking together, in company, in community. Many who have learned the first know nothing of the second. The first has to do with personal life: if we walk in the Spirit we shall be kept from the lusts of the flesh. The second has to do with Church life and Christian work; if we live in the Spirit we shall keep step together and be in unity. I believe that ten men working together in such unity would have twenty times the power and blessing which the same number of men would have working separately and independently.

Rev. Hubert Brooke: I knew a man in Christ some sixteen years ago who was asking the question of which we have heard, How can I live a holy life and teach others to live it? The answer came, as it has done to hundreds of others, in the words of the first text Dr. Cumming has been speaking of: "As ye have received Christ Jesus the Lord, so walk ye in Him." His eyes were opened, and he saw that as he had received Christ at the first for salvation, so now he was to receive Him for sanctification. So much by way of testimony; but now to my proper subject, which is—of walking with God." Let us look at the three men in the Old Testament who are distinctly stated to have walked with God. These are Enoch, Noah, and Levi. Enoch walked 300 years with God in an ungodly age; Noah walked with God when godlessness was at the full; and Levi, as we are told in Mal. ii. 6, walked with God in the days of Israel's glory. Enoch prophesied, Noah preached, Levi taught. We might call them prophet, priest, and professor; but in this they were alike—they all witnessed for God, as we will if we walk with Him. Very often our witness fails, not because the witness is faulty, but because of the life which lies behind the witness.

These men witnessed for God under very diverse circumstances. Enoch seems to have been a ordinary family man, providing for the needs of his own household. Noah was called to a more public life, in building the Ark, and becoming the butt of the scoffer and sceptic. Levi was a priest, a public teacher. They all walked with God, they all witnessed for Him, though the reception their witness met with was very different. The first was used to bring, at least, one son to God; the second was the means of saving seven persons besides himself, while the third, we are told, "did turn many away from iniquity." Success, as man esteems it, does not always come: but God's Word spoken in the power of his Spirit fulfils his purpose, and that is sufficient. We cannot measure results! Isaiah was told he would witness without visible result, yet no writer of the Old Testament has been so much used to the conversion of souls. Who was the man that was honoured to bring the late Mr. Spurgeon to Christ? An almost unknown Methodist preacher, who may count his spiritual grandchildren by many thousands.

As to the results to themselves. Enoch had the testimony he pleased God—he knew he pleased God. Do you know you please God? You may have the witness, if you will. Noah proved the resources of God in every possible circumstance of need, and so may we. Levi, we are told, had "My covenant with Him"—a wonderful word, which will bear much private study. Thus walking with God is shown to be possible in every circumstance, for the old and the young, for the busiest and the most leisured. Thus we find that walkers with God please Him, see their families blessed, and become witnesses to the world in the only way in which it will listen and with which it cannot find fault, and which it cannot but admire—that is to say, in a holy life.

WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON.

Lord Kinnaird presided in the afternoon, and briefly introduced the theme of missions. The first speaker was

Rev. J. Hudson Taylor, who opened with a few words on the connection between walking with God and interest in missions. Those who walk with God cannot but realise the position He has assigned to missions to the heathen. With regard to China, Mr. Taylor believed that the present difficulties would increase rather than decrease. It is not at all hard, from a Chinese point of view, to account for the jealousy or dread of foreign emissaries (as missionaries must appear) entertained by the Government of China. But whether there be difficulties or not, Jesus has bidden us evangelise the nations, and in doing so we have his presence assured.

Miss Annie R. Taylor greatly interested the audience by an animated account of her experiences in Tibet, of various remarkable tokens of the protecting care of God, and of the possibilities of penetrating the country so long hermetically sealed against the Gospel. She appealed earnestly for fresh labourers, and particularly medical missionaries.

Dr. Fry, now of the Edinburgh Medical Missionary Society, made a strong plea for medical missions, now proving so valuable in winning a way for the Gospel in the face of dense ignorance and passionate prejudice. From his own experience at Travancore the speaker brought many instances of the potency of this double ministry.

Dr. Valentine, of Agra, said that thirty-two years ago, when he went out to India, there were those who doubted the usefulness of medical missionaries; and, to his astonishment, he found on returning home that there are still some sceptical on this point. For the enlightenment of such he read certain statistics showing the appalling need of parts of India for medical men and missionaries.

Mr. E. J. Kennedy felt that in view of such startling figures we had need to look to the source whence missionaries are to be obtained. For his own part he held that the Y.M.C.A. and Y.W.C.A. were designed by God to be a source of the perpetual supply of missionaries, and from this point of view he gave some account of the object and operations of the work of the Y.M.C.A. among young men.

THURSDAY.

Lord Polwarth, who presided at the morning meeting, read 1 John i., and asked: What ought to be our attitude on this closing day of Conference. Surely it is one of expectation and anticipation. We have been dwelling on the possibilities of the Christian life, and considering the godly walk of men who have gone before. We see in the first chapters of the Bible that man was made to walk with God, that sin came and shattered the communion, and then that God deigned to interfere for man's redemption and restoration, in order that he might walk with his God. Our Lord Jesus, in his conversation with the poor degraded woman of Samaria, gave a wonderful glimpse of the heart of God when He said, "The Father seeketh such to worship Him." In the last book of the Bible we see redemption completed, fellowship consummated, and the Lamb of God leading his people beside the living waters. Of the walk with Him hereafter we have a blessed view; meanwhile we learn there is no limit to the life of him who walks by faith in God and in dependence on the Holy Spirit.

Rev. G. H. C. Macgregor, in speaking on "Walking with God: to what it leads," said: There are two lines which must be followed on this point: we may speak of the development of character, of what a man becomes who walks with God; or we may speak of experience, of the path along which God leads those who walk with Him. I desire to take the first of these—and I begin with the text 1 Peter ii. 9, where we read we are to "show forth the virtues (margin) of Him who hath called us out of darkness into his marvellous light." The purpose of God in calling us to Himself is that we should manifest the character of his Son. The Christian is the world's Bible: many will read no other. How important it is, then, that we bear true witness in life as well as with lip. If the eye be kept stedfast on Christ "we, beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image."

We want to be very practical. What then are the graces to be manifested in daily life? Turn to 2 Pet. i. 5, "Giving all diligence, add to your faith virtue; and to virtue knowledge; and to knowledge temperance; and to temperance patience; and to patience godliness; and to godliness brotherly kindness; and to brotherly kindness love." Notice the progression. If you and I walk with God the first result will be the strengthening of our faith, for the more we know of Him the more we trust Him in all things. Then comes virtue, that is courage or rather a strenuousness of character which finds vent in good works. Men who walk with God have nothing effeminate about them; women who walk with God will show the best graces of womanhood. Next comes knowledge. As we know God we trust Him, and as we trust we know more and more of Him. There is action and reaction leading on to fulness of knowledge. Then follows self-control—not only the power of acting but the power of refraining from acting. How the fussiness and petty haste of life stands rebuked by the calm dignity and serenity of the Lord Jesus. The next grace is patience—really endurance, a grand grace which goes to make reliable men. Then there is godliness, which here means specially reverence, a grace in which many in these days are greatly lacking. Next brotherly kindness. How many valuable and true men and women come short in gentleness, kindness, sympathetic helpfulness for those in need. Finally love, the biggest word in the whole Bible. "We shall be like Him"—we rejoice to know—and what is He like? He is "the express image of the Father." And what is the Father like? "God is love." As these graces develop we grow in his likeness, and the ultimate effect is love. The speaker concluded with a few words on the end of the walk—the presence of God when He takes us to Himself.

Rev. Dr. Robertson felt that "walking with God" was a characteristic Old Testament phrase, the New Testament equivalent being "fellowship with the Father." Of this fellowship Jesus was the perfect example, and as He walked so should we seek to walk. From this point of view the speaker traced how marvellously all through the earthly life of Jesus his fellowship with the Father influenced and moulded all He did and said. So should it be with us: "our fellowship is with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ"; and in proportion as this becomes manifest in our lives shall we be enabled to glorify Him.

Rev. James Somerville followed in a warm and eloquent tribute to Dr. Andrew Bonar, who passed away since last Conference, and who was always a welcome speaker at Perth. The chairman added a few words of personal reminiscences, and the proceedings concluded in prayer. In the afternoon a united Communion was held, and largely attended.

EVENING MEETINGS.

The evening gatherings were evangelistic and missionary in character, and were very largely attended. Sir A. Campbell presided on the first evening, when Mr. Leopold Cohen told something of what he had seen of Mr. Warszawiak's work. The Saturday gatherings, when this young preacher addresses large congregations of Jews, have been greatly blessed. The Friday evening meetings, when opportunity is given for discussion, have proved most useful. The Home for Persecuted Jews has also been remarkably used of God. One pressing need is a school for hundreds of children who are ready to be taught Christian truth, but cannot by reason of the lack of a school.

Evangelistic addresses followed by Mr. E. J. Kennedy and Rev. G. H. C. Macgregor, who were enabled to set forth the Gospel clearly and forcefully, illustrating it in a way likely to hold the young men and women who crowded the hall.

A MISSIONARY EVENING.

The second evening was devoted to missions, Mr. Brown Douglas presiding.

Rev. J. C. Peattie, of Madras, spoke specially on educational work as a missionary agency. Admitting that questions were raised as to the spiritual results of education, the speaker maintained that for the better classes at least, Christian education was almost the only means of evangelisation. The flower of India will have education, and if the Christian churches do not supply the need, others do. For his own part, if, with all his past experience of various agencies, he had to choose afresh his line of work, he would have no hesitation in choosing educational work as rich in result.

Dr. Valentine, supplemented his afternoon's address by a number of incidents from his long career as a medical missionary in India. En passant he brought out out the sad fact that, while there are in India no less than 330 millions of gods, there is not a good, righteous, just god among them all, everyone being evil, vindictive, vile, and cruel in one way or another. He had been asked again and again since he came home, "Do you think Christianity is making progress in India?" His reply, which he vindicated by many incidents, is Yes; great progress. The results are cheering, and yet they are but the firstfruits of a glorious coming harvest.

Rev. Pandani Mzimba, a Kaffir from Lovedale pleaded the cause of his own land—sunny Africa; his own people—a people without God, a people groaning under the horrible slave trade, a people destroying their own selves. Hard work was it for the pioneer missionaries in the Kaffirland; but great has been the blessing. After telling the story of his own conversion from being a "heathen man," the speaker closed by saying that though God has saved many, Africa is still a heathen land, and needs sorely and sadly many more missionaries.

An address followed from Rev. Arthur Bonsey of Hankow, giving many details of that great Chinese city, in which he had practically learned what is meant by the millions of China. By way of illustrating the power of the Gospel, the speaker narrated the conversion, devotion, and cheerful sacrifice of all his possessions of the first convert in Central China. The bewildering difficulties of evangelising in great cities were described in an animated style, and the speaker laid full emphasis on the fact that "We are evangelising the Chinese by means of the native Christians, who are the most efficient and valuable evangelists."

Rev. J. Hudson Taylor closed the proceedings of the evening with an earnest appeal for more workers, men and women filled with the Spirit of God. Only such are of any value in the mission field. While thanking God for what has been done, he urged that after all it is but the beginning. We need a more intense realisation of what the lost millions actually are if we would do real service among the perishing heathen. Power is needed in the Church at home as well as abroad. Missionaries have been compared to the steel spear-head, but the home Church is the heavy wooden shaft which drives the head home. In spite of all that has been done of late, there is an appalling lack of witnesses for God among the heathen. It is time every believer was asking, What self-sacrifice am I called on to make for the spread of the Gospel abroad? The Gospel has been proved to be the power of God unto salvation in every land under the sun. What are we doing to secure its world-wide proclamation? A large proportion of those who have been brought to Christ in China and other foreign fields have been brought through native evangelists; but we need many godly young men to go out to train and guide these. Many Spirit-filled women are also needed. May God lay it upon many hearts.

CLOSING MEETING.

The last meeting, held on Thursday evening, was again largely attended. Rev. James Collinson (Hertfordshire) gave a brief address, gathering up the threads of the closing Conference, and seeking to bring the whole to a practical conclusion in winning souls to Christ. Rev. G. H. C. MacGregor followed with an address on the four different ways in which Christ was treated when on earth, and in which his Gospel is treated now. As an evangelistic appeal it was singularly searching and solemn. The proceedings of the Conference were brought to a fitting close by Praise meetings held on Friday morning and afternoon.

DR. PATON, of Nottingham, is greatly interested in a scheme for extending the influence of Sunday-schools by the formation of a home department. A visitor appointed to a certain district calls upon the families of the congregation in it, to enlist all the children as students of Scripture. Cards of membership are given, and a list of subjects for three months ahead. Every home is visited at least once a quarter.

For the Young.

A LITTLE DRUNKARD.

By Miss Krikorian.

Minas is a boy of four years of age. A fortnight ago I went to the house where Minas lives to see a drunkard at the request of his wife. I began to talk about the harm of the drink. During the conversation one of the women there, pointing with her finger towards some who were sitting on the other end of the room, said, "Teacher (the people usually call me so), if you can succeed in making that fellow give up the drink, you will have done a great thing." I turned round to see the person referred to, but seeing there some women and a child of four or five years of age, I did not know whom she meant. because in Turkey women rarely drink raki (Turkish drink), and I did not suspect that such a small child could drink, as I knew nothing until then of Minas, so I asked her whom she meant. "That boy," she said, "who stands there is one of the worst drunkards." I rose up and went to him and took him by the hand, and behold, to my great surprise, he was really drunk! He had just come from the saloon. Of course I could not understand it, so I asked for an explanation, and the mother, who was there, told me the following sad story.

Minas' father sells raki in the saloon. The boy goes there every now and then to see him. The drunkards, seeing that this boy is very interesting and his conversation very pleasant, offer him a glass of raki and propose to give him some pennies if he drinks it. The boy takes the glass and drinks it for the sake of the money. Then they give him one more, and one more, and so he gets drunk and begins to be as frolic as a kitten, to the great satisfaction of the drunkards, and so the child gets used to it, and he himself begins to go after the raki, and in that way he becomes a strong drinker in a few months. He goes to saloon every day, and does not rest unless he has a good drink.

I was astounded at the sad story, and there the child was standing before me all wet with perspiration, his mouth smelling dreadfully, clad in rags, and covered all over with dirt. I looked at the innocent and childish face, saw the devil which had just entered in him, imagined the future miseries and sins of such a beginning, and was troubled in my soul. I wished to rescue him.

The next day, early in the morning, I went to see him; he was there at home ready to go to the saloon. I asked him if he would come with me to our house where I would give him sugar and pictures and other nice things. He refused the offer. "I will go to the saloon," he said; when I wanted to take him to my arms and bring him home, he began to cry "I want raki! I want raki!"

Oh, poor little drunkard, just that is the devil that is in those who taught you to drink. In spite of love, and duty, and religion, and humanity, they cry "I want raki! I want raki!" and go to the saloon as slaves.

Seeing that it was of no use to try to persuade him to go with me, I took home his elder sister, and sent some nice pictures to Minas. These bright-coloured pictures were too attractive for him. He took them and hurried to our house. I entertained him all day with pictures and blocks, and towards evening, as I was sending him to his mother, he came to me and said, "Teacher, I shall not drink raki any more; raki is bad, sugar is nice."

The following day his friends of the saloon found him. "Where are you, Minas?" asked they; "come, have a drink, and we will give you more money than we did before. Come and take this glass of raki." "No!" said the little abstainer, "I shall not drink any more raki. Raki is bad; sugar is nice. I will go to my teacher's, and build there houses and minarets." They could not persuade him to taste it, and so he came to our house again.

Well done, little hero! "I shall not drink any more raki!" May the dear Lord hear that from your sweet little lips. May his angels be round about you to protect you from temptation.

Last Sunday as he was passing before the saloon they took him by force and gave him a glass filled with raki. Little Minas saw that there was no occasion to argue with them. He took the glass. "I shall not drink raki," he said, and poured it out to the ground and gave the glass to them empty.

He is coming every day to my house. He plays with blocks and pictures. I taught him short prayers, and tell him stories about the Good Shepherd who found him, and of whom he had not heard until now, absolutely nothing, and he listens to them with great interest and with many childish questions.

One of the drunkards who taught Minas to drink, told me that they tried to make another such child drink recently, but he drank so much that at the first attempt he fell dead.

As I know more about the drinking people in connection with our temperance society, I am more and more convinced of the awful sufferings of their wives and children. Oh the cursed cup! It is the bloodthirsty enemy of the wicked and of their innocent children. I meet every day many children who are exposed to a great many temptations in the families of those drunkards, though not in the way in which Minas was. How I would love to be able to do something to them in the way of their education, if not for their temporal needs.

Will any friend encourage me to rescue some of those innocent lambs of the Great Shepherd?

Aintab, Turkey.

ONLY A LITTLE BABY GIRL.

By Rev. A. B. Simpson.

Only a little baby girl,
Dead by the riverside.
Only a little Chinese child
Drowned in the floating tide.
Over the boat too far she leaned
Watching the dancing wave,—
Over the brink she fell and sank,
But there was none to save.

Chorus.

O the little lambs that pine and perish
Out upon the mountains wild and cold;
Let us go and seek them,
Let us go and seek them,
Let us go and bring them back to the fold.

If she had only been a boy,
They would have heard her cry;
But she was just a baby girl,
And she was left to die.
It was her fate, perhaps they said,
Why should they interfere?
Had she not always been a curse?
Why should they keep her here?

So they leave her little form,
Floating upon the wave;
She was too young to have a soul,
Why should she have a grave?
Yes, and there's many another lamb
Perishing every day,
Thrown by the road and the riverside,
Flung to the beasts of prey.

Is there a mother's heart to-night,
Clasping her darling child,
Willing to leave these helpless lambs
Out on the desert wild?
Is there a little Christian girl,
Happy in love and home,
Living in selfish ease, while they
Out on the mountains roam?

Think as you lie in your little cot,
Smoothed by a mother's hand,
Think of the little baby girls
Over in China's land.
Ask if there is not something more,
Even a child can do;
And if perhaps in China's land
Jesus has need of you.

Only a little baby girl,
Dead by the riverside.
Only a little Chinese child
Drowned in the floating tide.
But it has brought a vision vast,
Dark as the nation's woe;
Oh! has it left one willing heart,
Answering "I will go"?

IT STINGS.

"How pretty!" cried little Sam, as his little fat hand grasped a bunch of white lilac which grew near the gate of his father's mansion. The next moment the child's face grew red with terror, and he dashed the lilac to the ground, shrieking, "It stings, it stings!"

What made it sting? It was a bright, beautiful, and sweet-smelling flower. How could it hurt the child's hand? I will tell you.

A jolly little bee, in search of a dinner, had just pushed his nose in among the lilac blossoms, and was sucking nectar from it most heartily when Sammy's fat hand disturbed him. So, being vexed with the child, he stung him. That's how Sammy's hand came to be stung.

Sammy's mother washed the wound with hartshorn; and when the pain was gone, she said: "Sammy, my dear, let this teach you many pretty things have very sharp stings."

Let every child take note of this: Many pretty things have very sharp stings. It may save them from being stung if they keep this in mind.

Sin often makes itself appear very pretty. A boy once went to a circus because the horses were pretty and their riders gay; but he learnt to swear there; and thus that pretty thing, the circus, stung him.

Another boy once thought wine a pretty thing. He drank it, and learned to be a drunkard. Thus wine stung him.

A girl once took a luscious pear from a basket, and ate it.

"Have you eaten one?" asked her mother.

Fearing she should not get another if she said "Yes," she said "No," got another pear, and felt so stung that she could not sleep that night.

Thus you see that sin, however pretty it looks, stings. It stings sharply, too. It stings fatally. The Bible says: "The sting of death is sin."

If you let sin sting you, nothing can heal the wound but the blood of Jesus. If you feel the smart of the sting, go to Jesus with it, and He will cure it. After that, never forget that many pretty things have very sharp stings, and be careful not to touch, taste, or handle such things.

A FRAGRANT FLOWER.

Within an Eastern garden
A homeland flower grew;
It cheered me by its fragrance
And by its lovely hue.

I went upon my journey,
But I could ne'er forget
The fragrance of that flower,
It lingers with me yet.

A mother clasped her infant
Within her fond embrace,
Rejoicing such sweet blossom
Her pilgrim path should grace

That flower the Lord had handed
The fragrance to inhale,
A fragrance that should linger
To cheer her through life's vale.

And then again He took it,
As He had lent in love,
That it might bloom for ever
With Him in heaven above.

To that most glorious homeland
The mother's thoughts aye soar,
Where she shall see her Saviour,
And that fair flower once more.

SAILORS IN LONDON.—The Duke of York, R.N., has fixed Monday, October 9, for laying the foundation stone of the Missions to Seamen Institute, for sailors of all creeds and nationalities frequenting the port of London. It is situated opposite the Board of Trade shipping offices in Poplar, and is part of a set of buildings which, when completed, will include, besides the Institute for safe companionship, relaxation, social recreation, lectures, concerts, entertainments, reading-rooms, etc., class-rooms for night-schools and navigation classes, ambulance and cookery instructions, etc. There will ultimately be a seamen's church and gymnasium, etc., added as funds are provided.

NOTES ON DAILY READINGS.

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 24.—PSALM XLV.

With such a theme as this, it was not wonderful that the Psalmist's heart should flow over into his words. It is easy to speak when the heart is full of Christ our King: the more especially when we have made things concerning Him.

The Warrior (2-5).—Though man, He is more. All that is attractive in man blends in Him. Grace pours from his lips into his words, and by his words to men. The Word of God rides forth to war, followed by the armies of heaven. His glory is his cross; his majesty in his meekness; his prosperity in his truth and righteousness. His arrows are tipped with love, and those that fall beneath them die that they may live.

The King (6-8).—There is no doubt of the applicability of these words to our Lord. They are directly referred to Him in Heb. i. His throne, and sceptre, and kingdom are his by the Father's gift. The oil of gladness is the anointing of the Holy Ghost, which we also may share. Sweet scents and glad songs are the product of his grace.

The Bridegroom (9-17).—The bride is the Church. Clad in glistening light, she stands beside her Lord, who claims her worship and love. Her beauty and glory are all his gift, for by nature she was dowerless and unattractive. The bridal group is even now in making. See to it that you are not excluded from it.

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 25.—PSALM XLVI.

The occasion of this psalm is given 2 Kings xix. This world is one of change and flux, as the old is passing and the new coming, and as the kingdom of Satan is working out its natural issues. But, amid all, the saints must seek the quiet heart. This can be only acquired by turning the soul from things and men, and fixing it steadfastly upon God. We must live in God as our refuge. The bird that builds in the cleft of the rock is undismayed by the storm that snaps the forest trees.

In contrast with the surging waters, there is a river whose gentle flow is musical with peace; it issues from the throne, let us live by it. In contrast with the tottering mountains there is a tent; it is God's holy place, let us hide within its precincts. When God is our helper, He succours us at dawn (marg.). When God speaks, the opposition of man melts utterly away. Think of all the hosts that wait his bidding, as they came to Jacob at the ladder-foot.

Be still, O troubled heart. The God of the nations is your Father. Desolations are the snapping-off of dead wood to prepare for the spring. He is overturning that He may set up a kingdom that cannot be removed. And from your resting place in his heart, you may behold what He is doing in the earth.

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 26.—PSALM XLVII.

The occasion of this psalm is given 2 Chron. xx. Perhaps it was sung in the Valley of Berachah. When God has given us some great deliverance, it becomes us to praise Him. And where the heart is full it naturally calls on others to join its joy.

But victory is conditional on our living on God's plan, and therefore we must learn to leave the choice of our inheritance with Him. He can only succour us when He plans our life.

In the second strophe (5-9) Jehovah is depicted as returning from the fight to his resting-place in the height of Zion. This is an anticipation and prelude of the Ascension. Christ is the enthroned King of men. Though they know Him not, He reigns over them; and the days are coming when the princes of heathen people will gather together to accept the sceptre of the God of Abraham. The shields of the earth are its leaders and princes (Hos. iv. 18, marg.). Our Saviour is the Prince of the kings of the earth; to Him at last every knee shall bow.

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 27.—PSALM XLVIII.

This psalm, sung in the Temple (9), celebrates yet again the occasion of 2 Chron. xx. It is full of triumph, and resembles that which shall break out, when the City of God, the new Jerusalem, is triumphant over all her foes (2).

Zion is the residence of God (1-3). And what Zion was under the old dispensation, the Church is in the new. It is the home and temple, the city of Christ. And He is known in its palaces. Do we reside in these palaces with the King? Do we know Him, with the tender intimacy that love and trust can give? Is our security that which we share with Him?

The foe cannot prevail (4-8). It is a sublime picture. The gathered array. The passing beneath the walls of Zion. Their dismay, their hasty flight, their destruction like the galleons of the Armada in the storm. What God has done in other times and places, we may count on Him doing for us. The age of miraculous interposition is here and now.

God's loving-kindness (9-14). Let us think more of God's love. Consider God's name, and you will proportionately praise Him. What He has been, He will be. Note the emphasis on our: our God. Cling close to Him. Let Him guide and keep. Tell out to the next generation what He is and what He has done. Know that death itself cannot break the union between God and you for ever.

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 28.—PSALM XLIX.

In the opening verses the singer calls attention to the importance of his subject (1-4). He is like a minstrel who plays music put into his hands, first bending his ear to the Divine revelations, and then communicating them as well as he might in rhythmic measure. (Kay.)

There is no ground for the righteous to envy the prosperity of the wicked (5-12). Days of evil come to all the saints, when the mistakes of former days compass them about, and at all such times they are liable to fear, the more especially when they contrast their lot with that of the wicked, who prosper in undoubted ease. But a closer examination will reassure us. They must die. Unable to ransom their souls from the power of death, they must yield to its inevitable thrall. Fool and churl and wise, poor and rich alike perish. Their soul is required. Their property dissipated. Their names forgotten.

The righteous have a better lot (13-15). In a striking image the wicked are likened to a flock of sheep. Death being their shepherd, leading them forth to Sheol. But as the morning of eternity breaks the righteous are compensated. He receives them, and the word is the same as that employed of Enoch's translation.

The destiny of the wicked (16-20). We take nothing into the other world, but character. Be miserly over this. It is useless to cheer thy soul, and bid it be merry, if only things are stored up for it. Thou needest more than things, even God, the living God. The only way of meeting thy possessions again, is in using them for good works, and for his glory.

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 29.—PSALM L.

The coming of God (1-6) is described in sublime language. His appearance in Zion recalls the splendours of Sinai. His pathway is in flame. His voice is heard summoning a convocation of the world to witness his judgment of the people. We are daily standing before the judgment-seat of Christ to receive the expression of his mind. Ah, it is a great day for the soul when God comes, and shines unto the soul with his searching light.

Sins against the first table of the Decalogue (7-15).—There was no lack in the sacrifices that were offered in the Temple courts. The people did not neglect the outer ritual. But they omitted the weightier matters of righteousness, truth, and love. We cannot give God anything that is not already his, except our hearts and lives. The cattle, fowls, and minerals are already his. But, child of God, how rich thy Father is. However great thy need, thou surely mayst trust Him to supply it.

Sins against the second table of the Decalogue (16-21).—There are here some searching words for us all. We have no right to speak for God, if our hearts are not wicked. We must not despise the Divine instruction and correction. We must watch against slander as much as stealing or adultery. We must not interpret God's silence as indifference or acquiescence. For He will presently arise, and set all unforgiven sin in order before our eyes.

Closing admonitions (22, 23).—Two conditions of deliverance and blessing. We must order our way aright and we must offer the sacrifice of praise. We are priests, and we must not forget that holy sacrifice of praise, namely, the fruit of our lips, giving thanks to his name (Heb. xiii. 15).

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 30.—PSALM LI.

When we remember our sins in all their deformity and malignity, as David did after his great sin, we can but cast ourselves on God's mercy in Jesus Christ. Blot out as an entry from a record (Ex. xxxii. 32). Wash as a garment. Cleanse as leprosy (Lev. xiii. 6 34). Though the soul has tasted forgiveness it cannot forget. The loyal penitent refers to his sinful origin, not to extenuate his fault, but because he recognises that the dark waters came from a darker source, and that his nature was evil in its very origin and seat. No confession is adequate that does not embrace the evil of the thought, intention, and heart. But even there will God's purifying grace go, producing truth and wisdom in the inner depths (6).

These entreaties (7, etc.) may be read as predictions. Thou wilt purge, thou wilt wash, etc. He who reveals us to ourselves will do more in delivering and saving us from all that he has led us to loathe; and then the forgiven soul becomes his herald. Peter, whom the Lord forgave and restored, became the preacher of Pentecost. No voice is so moving on other sinners as that of the broken heart.

When God forgives He fills the penitent with songs. He sighs, and tears are blotted out before that radiant outburst of jubilation. And when the heart sings thus it is extravagant of burnt-offering or gifts. They are the glad tribute of a joy which it must express.

INTERNATIONAL S. S. LESSONS.

OCTOBER 1.

THE POWER OF THE GOSPEL, Rom. i. 8-17.

GOLDEN TEXT, verse 16.

ON his return from his third missionary journey, Paul spent three months in Greece (Acts xx. 1—3), possibly in the house of Gaius at Corinth (Rom. xvi. 23, 1 Cor. i. 14). While there he wrote this epistle, or dictated it to Tertius (xvi. 22), and sent it by Phœbe (xvi. 1). This was in A.D. 58.

Paul's object in writing to a Church he had never visited was to assure them of his affectionate interest in them, to apprise them of his intention to visit them, and to minister to them instruction and comfort.

Paul's thanksgiving (8).—Note to whom, by whom, and for what he gives thanks. He speaks of God as "my God." The term expresses personal possession of God, and loving and intimate fellowship with Him; while it establishes at once his fellowship with those to whom he writes. "Through Jesus Christ" as the only Mediator. Our thanksgivings as well as our prayers must be offered through Him (Heb. xiii. 15). He praises for the faith of the Roman Christians. It was spoken of so widely because of the prominence of the city of Rome. In the very centre of the empire of the world, amidst abounding idolatry, luxury, and vice, the Gospel had its triumphs; some of them even "in Cæsar's household."

His prayer (9—13).—For many reasons he had a fervent longing to see them. He desired not only that they might receive from him, but that he might be comforted with them. This desire found expression in prayer frequently offered, and yet in subjection to the Divine will (10). Many things hindered and delayed the accomplishment of his desire, but without ceasing he presented it. May we imitate him in this? Only when our desires are as unselfish, and are as truly concerned with the work and glory of God, as were his. Some desires are foolish and vain, and for God to grant them would be to do us injury. When we delight ourselves in the Lord, we need not hesitate to present in prayer the desires of our heart (Psa. xxxvii. 4). God's answer is full of instruction. We have read of it in our last quarter's lessons. Who would have thought when the Jews seized Paul in the Temple—sought to assassinate him—employed the Roman power against him—that God was in this way answering the apostle's prayer? Learn to trust God to answer prayers in his own way.

Paul a debtor (14).—It is good when desire is the companion of duty. No man receives the Gospel merely for himself, but that he may hand it on to others. If we have the light we are in debt to those who remain in darkness. "Greeks" include all civilised peoples in contrast to "barbarians"; the other two terms contrast the cultured and the ignorant. Paul owes the Gospel to all; and the Gospel is suited to all.

The power of the Gospel (15-17). Its aim is salvation—deliverance from the guilt, and power, and defilement of sin, and ultimately from the very presence of sin. For this work only the power of God is sufficient. No inferior power can effect it. Every Christian is as much a monument of the Divine power as was Lazarus when raised from the dead. Who can forgive sins or quicken the dead save God? This power is in the Gospel of Christ. In v. 1 it is called the Gospel of God—for Paul honours the Son equally with the Father, and regards the Gospel as equally from the Father and the Son. It comes from God, but through Christ. Its power lies in its revelation of the righteousness of God in the judgment of sin, and of the love of God to the sinner. Our salvation is of grace, but it rests upon a foundation of justice and judgment. There is no other power to save except this. To reject God's way is to be lost. This Gospel is for everyone that believeth. No distinction is made between Jew and Gentile. The same condition is demanded from all, and the same blessing is given wherever the condition is fulfilled. No simpler condition could be asked. Not to fulfil the condition not only exposes us to the loss of what the Gospel offers, but adds to our guilt the greater sin of rejecting God's provision.

For this reason Paul is not ashamed of the Gospel; not ashamed to preach it in Rome, to meet the ridicule and persecution, and possibly martyrdom that may await him there. He was a living witness to the power of the Gospel, and his work had proved its sufficiency to men of every class.

You may be ashamed of it (1) by fearing to avow your faith in it. You cannot separate believing with the heart from confession with the mouth. The Gospel is in the world to oppose the world's teaching and ways. Every believer in Christ must take sides. Don't be ashamed of that to which you owe everything. (2) By fearing persecution for its sake. The offence of the Cross has not ceased. Its form has altered. The jeers and scoffs of ungodly companions have terrified many.

The Chicago Campaign.

The great evangelistic campaign is still going ahead, last Sunday being the nineteenth upon which the special services have been held (in addition to those occupying every week night). There are now about a dozen churches directly co-operating, in addition to as many halls, two theatres, five tents, and two Gospel wagons. No wonder Mr. Moody deprecates the customary "let up" (cessation) of church work during the summer months in great cities. "There are always enough people in town," he says characteristically, "to get a good meeting even in the hottest weather, and instead of letting up we ought to make the Gospel all the more attractive at that time of year when it is harder to get the people in!" There is soundness of reasoning in such an argument, and, for practical demonstration, to find sixty thousand people in Chicago attending special services on a single Sabbath, in addition to all the regular places of worship, is enough to convince any candid critic.

There are fresh faces seen among the speakers this month in Rev. Dr. Stöcker, of Berlin; Revs. John Riddell and John Robertson, of Glasgow; and Mr. Henry Varley; besides a number of well-known American pastors, whose churches have granted them a respite for this purpose. No less than in which to declare the Gospel 'of goodwill' to men, and although these do not represent all the nationalities to be found in that cosmopolitan city, yet they bear glad tidings to multitudes who have come from across the seas to make the western capital their home. And just so far as the Gospel lays hold upon these foreigners of far-off climes, so far will be solved many of the difficulties arising from this mingling of many nationalities. They each have their own social customs, and their modes of living are as varied as the colours of their skins. But let them be welded together in a common love for God and his Son Jesus Christ, and the country may bless rather than stand in awe of them.

To two of the structures used for these services there attaches a special interest. One is the standing just outside the Fair grounds, which is unique alike in its appearance and its purpose. As regards the former it has at least the advantage of arousing the curiosity of the beholder to ask what it is; a nearer approach enables him to decipher its designation from a flag floating on the breeze; and once within its precincts he learns that its purpose is to indicate the growth and importance of Sunday-schools, to provide a centre of conference and intercourse, and to furnish a Christian headquarters and auditorium for evangelistic work. It was originally to have been placed inside the Fair enclosure, but the difficulty as to the site which prevented this has proved a blessing in disguise, by rendering it of greater utility for Gospel work, especially on the Lord's Day. The other is also an "extra exhibit," as it might be called, situate within a short distance of the Fair, and immediately upon the Lake shore. No pleasanter place could be found for Christian visitors who desire to unite their enjoyment of the Exhibition with participation in Gospel effort, for here, too, is a spacious hall and court in which Mr. Moody and his helpers preach in turn. The successful establishment of such a house is a strong tribute to the influence of the excellent society from which it takes it name, and from the ranks of which are rising up hundreds and thousands of young Christians, who bid fair to assume in the coming years an active part in carrying on just such work as that which Chicago has witnessed during the past few months, which neither heat nor hostility have been able to hinder.

MR. MOODY'S BIBLE INSTITUTE.

While attending the services of one of the five tents occupied for evangelistic work by the forces under command of Mr. Moody, in Chicago, some days ago, I observed in the crowd a young professor of natural science and associate principal in an Eastern institute, who was watching the lively proceedings with ardent appreciation. He had come to the city to see and study the exhibits of the World's Fair. Making his headquarters at the Bible Institute, he became deeply interested in the life and work of that remarkable institution, especially as the present radiating centre of the great evangelistic movement inaugurated by Mr. Moody at the opening of the World's Fair. The cultured young professor really seemed to find more solid satisfaction and profit in the study of that religious phenomenon than in all the glory of the Fair. Another visitor from New England has been here over three weeks, and has been so greatly interested in what we may appropriately term of practical Christianity and Gospel preaching for the masses, that he has not yet taken even his first glimpse of the Fair. He has found, with hundreds of other visitors, that in the Bible Institute, with its song services, Bible lectures, and multiform Christian activities centring there, Mr. Moody has prepared for all comers a perpetual feast of good things for mind and heart; and set forth a great object lesson in aggressive Christian work by which all observers may richly profit.

THE MOODY EXHIBIT

The widest possible publicity should be given to this work of Mr. Moody and his associates. Only eternity can reveal the good that has been done through this unselfish, Christ-like service so freely given to all. Every visitor of this wonderful, wealthy, wicked city of the West ought to know that one of the places not to be overlooked is the Moody Bible Institute, at 80, Institute-place, and the great church with which it stands connected; that in the chapel of the Institute, every day save Sunday and Monday, two lectures are delivered on themes of human thought and divine revelation, by some of the ablest Bible scholars and teachers in Europe and America; and that everybody is welcome to attend.

The uninformed reader may get some idea of the riches daily distributed at the Institute, when it is said that such men as the following have served in word and doctrine since the opening of the World's Fair and the Moody evangelistic campaign: Dr. Moorehead, on Types of the Old Testament; D. L. Moody, on Emblems of the Holy Spirit; Rev. Hubert Brooke, of the Church of England, Rev. Charles Inwood, of the Irish Wesleyan, and Rev. G. H. C. Macgregor, of the Scotch Presbyterian, on Various Aspects of the Higher Christian Life; Dr. E. P. Goodwin, on the Resurrection; Dr. W. E. Lawrence, on the Christian Worker; Mr. W. R. Lane, on the Four Gospels; Dr. Theo. Monod, of Paris, on the Epistle to the Ephesians; Dr. A. J. Gordon, on Scripture Interpretation; Dr. Breed, on the Book of Acts; Dr. J. M. Stifler, on the Epistle to the Romans; Dr. C. I. Scoville, on the Book of Revelation; Rev. R. G. Pearson, on How to Study the Bible; Rev. B. Fay Mills, on Personal Consecration; Rev. John McNeill, on a variety of inspiring themes; and Dr. T. L. Cuyler, Dr. J. Monro Gibson, Rev. Thomas Spurgeon, Major D. W. Whittle, Dr. R. A. Torrey, and a number of others, on kindred subjects. This refers only to the two daily lectures in the Institute, but every visitor also has free access every week to over one hundred other services of the most inspiring character, where some of God's mighty men of valour and their elect sisters are singing and preaching the Gospel in demonstration of the Holy Spirit.

Nearly a year ago arrangements were made by the London Polytechnic Institute, in conjunction with Mr. Moody, who was then in England, to organise a series of excursions to bring some to visit the World's Fair. This British host has been coming in detachments of one hundred each, following each other at intervals of a week, and it is probable that more than the original number proposed will avail themselves of the arrangement. With faith and wisdom Mr. Moody has thrown open the doors of the Institute to these visitors, to give them on the most reasonable terms a home while in the city. Thus, while their primary object is to see the Fair, they will have their headquarters amid the best Christian associations and influences, and will be brought in contact with aggressive, religious, evangelistic life, which cannot fail to leave its salutary impression upon them.

But to no other class of visitors will a sojourn in the Institute be more profitable, perhaps, than to teachers and preachers. Many of this class, from all parts of the country, have heretofore sought opportunity to spend their vacation here, in the study of the Bible and the prevalent methods of Christian work. This summer Mr. Moody invited the principals and teachers of his Northfield and Mt. Hermon schools, who number about sixty, to spend a week at the Institute as his guests, and many of them have already availed themselves of the kind invitation.

A single day's careful absorption of the life and work of the Bible Institute has been to some visiting ministers and teachers a revelation of possibilities in the direction of personal qualification and of aggressive Christian effort, that will revolutionise their whole lives in the service of God. They have there seen, not beautiful theories and impossible ideals, but actual performance and realisation. They have caught the inspiration of triumphant faith and courage, and have been enabled to go forth with the conviction that God is sufficient for all things, and that "what man has done, man can do."

H. B. Hartzler.

Chicago, Sept. 7.

Writing from the Bible Institute, Mr. Henry Varley says:—

"This is a tremendous city. No wonder, in a worldly sense, the dwellers here are ready to boast, but, oh! how small a place the Lord appears to have in this vast centre of human life. The weather is delightfully cool, the thermometer standing at 68 degrees. The Bible Institute is a great centre of Christian effort. There are staying here quite a number of ministers and evangelists. It is real joy to meet these congenial spirits.

"The service of song is an extraordinary feature, the choir and solo songsters are many, they really sing for Jesus. Last night hundreds were drawn from the streets to hear the singing. No wonder they come, it is something to hear indeed. The voice of praise is seldom silent or at rest in the building."

IN MID-ATLANTIC.

An interesting account of the Atlantic voyage of the Sunday-school delegates to the international convention at St. Louis is given in the Sunday-school Chronicle of last week, from the pen of Mr. Belsey, chairman of the Sunday-school Union. He says:—

A very pleasant feature of the voyage has been the evident interest in religious services felt by a great many of our less-favoured friends in the steerage. Rev. John Robertson, of Glasgow (who is on his way to help Mr. Moody at Chicago) has been our fellow passenger. Early Sunday morning some bright sweet voices, trained first in our Sunday-schools, were heard singing some of Mr. Sankey's sweetest melodies, and we found we could depend upon an interested congregation if we could arrange for an evening service in the steerage. So down into its dimly-lighted depths three or four of us accompanied Mr. Robertson and Mr. Mottet, an Episcopalian clergyman, of New York (another fellow passenger of broad sympathies and kindly heart), and a most interesting little service we had. On the three fine evenings of our voyage, directly the saloon dinner was over, we found the deck thronged amidship with our fellow passengers, singing and waiting for a few welcome words from Mr. Robertson. He was always simple and full of illustration, and it was a never-to-be-forgotten sight to look down from the upper deck upon that scene. The earnest preacher, the eager, upturned faces, the glowing sunset, the rolling waves all round, made a most striking picture.

Yesterday afternoon a number of us, including several kind American friends on passage with us, went right through the big party seeking out all the lone ones, and giving cards of introduction to Christian friends in the towns they were going to settle in, and much useful information and counsels to more who were strange to American ways and customs.

HIGHBURY CORNER GOSPEL MISSION.—The eighth open-air season of this Mission is drawing to the close. The meetings have been largely and respectfully attended. Christian workers from abroad, from the "Training Home," Drayton Park, and from the China Inland Mission, and others have assisted at the meetings, and the Word spoken has been with power. Help is needed in the Gospel Temperance work, and a district visitor is much needed. The Mission is undenominational and self-supporting. E. Hooper. Hon. Sec.

MISS GRUNDBERG AND MISS WENNBERG,

CHRISTIAN WORKERS IN ST. PETERSBURG.

As a field of service, Russia presents peculiar difficulties; yet even there, as has often been proved, and as the following narrative shows afresh, there is work to do for those who, weak in themselves, are willing to follow the leading of God, and to embrace the opportunities as He opens the way and points the path. This the two ladies, whose portraits we present, have sought simply to do; and it is evident, as they themselves confess, that He has been to them "a shield and a buckler," guiding them by ways that they knew not.

Miss Laura Grundberg is a Swede, born near Gothenburg, her father being a Lutheran clergyman, as indeed her ancestors had been for several generations back. The father died when she was but four years old, and Laura was brought up by her mother. After being confirmed—though ignorant of the power of the Gospel—she devoted herself to the study of gymnastics, with a view to teaching. From early days she had a desire to go to America, and, on her mother's death, went to New York, where she supported herself for nine years by tuition. While in that city she met her future sister in service—

Miss Wennberg, a Swedish lady, brought up in Russia, where her father had been a captain. He was lost in the Black Sea, and thereafter she spent several years in travelling in Europe and in the States. At that time neither of these young ladies knew the power of personal faith in Christ, although they kept up the habit of going occasionally to church.

One Sunday they met, intending to find out the Swedenborgian meeting, but being unable to discover this particular building, they dropped into a church at the corner of Fourth Avenue and Thirty-fourth-street. There, in a strange church, they heard a sermon on the beautiful text, "For God so loved the world that He gave his only begotten Son," and the unknown preacher finished abruptly by exclaiming, "Oh, how He loved me!" To one at least of the hearers it seemed the voice of God, awakening a new and strange longing to be at peace with Him. Not then did the change come, but certainly this word, heard in a chance way so far as she was concerned, was the Lord's first word to her heart

Two years later Miss Wennberg returned to Russia, accompanied by Miss Grundberg. In St. Petersburg they went to the British and American Congregational Church, where, under the leading of God, Rev. J. D. Kilburn announced the same text (John iii. 16), and by his earnest pleading deepened the impression already made.

Not yet, however, did the natural heart yield. A year and a-half afterwards Miss Grundberg was led to go to the meetings in Colonel Paschkoff's house. She did not wish to go, she had been warned against going, but she went. Being there, she felt shocked at the question asked her—"Are you a Christian?"—how could anyone know such a thing! The Lord's time had come, she was compelled to yield, and seems to have done so with a simplicity and directness which has characterised all her subsequent service. About the same time, and in somewhat similar fashion, Miss Wennberg was led to the Saviour, and from that moment the two, whose lives had become so strangely blended, resolved to give themselves to the Lord's service, where and how He should be pleased to direct.

They began at home and among the families around them. The Russian style affords peculiar opportunities. "One has not," says Miss Grundberg, "to go to seek the slums, they are at your door." In the same house will be found all classes: the nobility and gentry in the best floors, the middle classes higher up, and the poor in the basement, and outyards. Amongst these latter they began distributing tracts, and speaking a word as opportunity arose. Wonderfully eager did the poor people prove, and some accepted the Word in a very childlike and simple way. The police, however, interfered by-and-by, and stopped this work. Then came seven years of fruitful summer work in Esthonia, where again the people were found thirsty for the good tidings. Next came a year's service in the barracks, permission being gained through a lady of high degree. Illustrated tracts and The Russian Workman, a translation and adaptation of The British Workman, were largely circulated, although again the police were soon in action, and finally put an end to the operations.

Miss Wennberg and Miss Grundberg were about this time led to begin in a quiet way, and without official permission, a Home of Prevention for poor friendless endangered girls, and this they carried on for four years, saving many such, and having the joy of seeing some led sweetly to the Saviour. Meanwhile, one at least of these companions in service had it on her mind to go to China, and as door after door closed in Russia, the impression became stronger. Mr. Kilburn agreed that possibly it was the Lord's will for her, but as fresh openings occurred she felt she dared not run away, and at length the pastor said, "No, you must not go, your work is here."

So, by and by, the way opened for a fresh form of service. Four little ones, orphans of a Baptist preacher drowned in the Baltic, were left to their care. We gave this story in a recent issue, and need not repeat it. Suffice it to say, that in 1889 these ladies were led to open a "Baby Home." Some Christian work girls were their first helpers, then the ladies of the British and American Church (whereof Mr. Francis is now pastor, vice Mr. Kilburn) took the matter up very heartily, sewing and making for the little ones until there were more clothes than required at that time. From the first Dr. Sellheim has been a true friend, rendering his valuable professional attendance freely and heartily. The work grew, and soon there were twenty-one in the Home. The police ordered it to be closed, but it was not. Once more a friend was raised up in Court circles. One of the Grand Duchesses took up the matter, put it before the Czar, and gained permission to keep it open. Three years ago an epidemic of measles broke out, and seventeen children out of twenty-three were taken ill. This brought down the police and the sanitary authorities, the Home became an hospital, while at the same time funds fell off, until they had only six copecks (less than one penny) in the house, while they required daily for the sick children four roubles' (400 copecks) worth of milk alone. God provided the funds—largely through Mr. and Mrs. Francis—five children died, and the rest recovered. Next year the epidemic broke out again, but all recovered.

Means were furnished to take the children to the seaside for a season, and when they returned it was to a new and much larger Home, provided in a wondrous way in direct answer to prayer. This Home is now filled with little ones under the care of Miss Wennberg, who is in charge during her co-worker's absence in England, and since her departure, even as before, the whole story of the work is simply "walking by faith," the constant answer to prayer being very encouraging to these lady workers.

Interviewing Miss Grundberg the other day, we asked, "What are you doing here? What have you specially come for?" Her answer was:—

"I hardly know; I am in God's hand. He sent me, and provided the money to come. He has opened doors for me to speak. I can do nothing without Him. I am holding meetings here and there as He leads. I believe I see possibilities of wider effort for the orphaned little ones of the persecuted Stundists: but that must be as He will: and for it we would need a larger Home. He will provide means if He sees fit. We wait only on Him."

FATHER CHINIQUY IN QUEBEC.

A few weeks ago I was on my way to Prince Edward Island in order to throw some saving lights of the Gospel among the 40,000 Roman Catholics settled on that beautiful island, and I had to pass through Quebec. My best friends had requested me not to stop in that city on account of the many attempts made there to murder me. But when we had reached it, and the captain had told me that we had to spend six hours before leaving, I felt that, even at the risk of my life, I had to take that opportunity for trying again to wrench from the hands of the enemy some of the 100,000 souls he keeps there tied to the feet of the idols of Rome.

I went ashore, and, without giving my name, I engaged a carter to drive me through the principal streets and around the most interesting places. Providentially, that carter was a young man whom nobody could see without loving him. The honest face and the polite manners of this dear young countryman filled my heart with a deep Christian sympathy and compassion for him, and I silently prayed our Heavenly Father to open his heart to Gospel truths.

I asked him to drive his horse as slowly as possible, and, without giving him to suspect who I was, I began to speak to him of the love of God, who had so much loved us that He had sent his eternal Son Jesus to save the world. The Samaritan woman did not pay more attention to the Saviour's words at the well of Jacob than this dear young countryman paid to these Gospel truths. There were tears of joy rolling on his cheeks as well as on mine when, realising that eternal life was a gift offered to him, in that very moment he accepted it. This new and glorious truth, when taking possession of his intelligence and his heart, had driven away the errors of Rome as quick as lightning. It was then I gave him my name, and bade him adieu, after getting the assurance that he would never lose the gift.

When back on the steamer, I learned that a Government dispatch was forcing the captain to remain three hours more at Quebec. During that time, the newly-regenerated man had gone back to the public market place, which was still filled with people, and he had cried at the top of his voice: "I have just driven Father Chiniquy for more than one hour through the city, and he has taught me Gospel truths which I would not give up for all the gold in the world."

"Father Chiniquy! Father Chiniquy!!" answered the crowd. "Where is he?"

"In the steamer Miramichi, at the wharf," answered the young man.

A few moments later, when pacing the deck, with my mind filled with admiration for what had just occurred, I was not a little surprised to see a great multitude of people running from the city towards the wharf, where the steamboat was tied.

I must confess that my first impression at that strange spectacle was one of uneasiness and anxiety, for I saw a good number of priests, with their long black gowns, following the crowd. I said to myself: "The people of Quebec have heard of my presence here, and they come to throw me into the river, as they tried it some years ago."

But I was mistaken. That multitude, rushing towards the steamer as an irresistible flood, was composed of the best friends I ever had. When they had covered the whole deck, and they were pressing themselves around me, a most venerable old man, with his grey hair, took and pressed my hand, and with emotion said, "We have just heard, with a great joy, that you were here. As we have been told that now you preach nothing but the Gospel of Jesus Christ, we have come to ask you the favour of giving us something of that Gospel."

I was so much surprised by these words, and I felt such a joy in my heart, that I have no words to express my emotions. I could hardly believe my ears and my eyes. It seemed it was a dream. But, no! it was a reality.

I quickly made a kind of platform with the ropes, and some planks and sticks, and after telling them my joy at finding myself again in the midst of so many friends in Quebec, I took for my texts: "I am not ashamed of the Gospel of Christ—for it is the power of God to every one that believeth," and, "God so loved the world that He gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish but have everlasting life." For more than one hour, that whole multitude of hungry and thirsty souls received the bread and the water of life which I gave them, with a respect and attention such as I never witnessed before in my long experience. I stopped speaking only when the Captain (who is a Roman Catholic) came to tell me politely that the hour of leaving was come.

Before closing this letter, let me ask you and all my Christian friends in Great Britain to bless God for the conversion of the Hon. L. J. A. Papineau, landlord of Montebello, and elder son of the celebrated French Canadian Parliament orator of Canada. He has given up the errors of Popery, and joined the Presbyterian Church. C. Chiniquy.

SAILORS' REST, DUNKERQUE.

In a booklet entitled "Le Phare" (The Lighthouse), Miss A. Jackson tells the story of the Sailors' Rest and Reading Room, Bassin de Freycinet, Dunkerque, which she was, by the generosity of friends in England, enabled to open in January last. She says: "Within twelve months of my first arrival in Dunkerque the Sailors' Rest and Reading Rooms had become an established fact. Since the opening over nine hundred and fifty sailors have visited the rooms. It is pleasant to see young sailors night after night coming to spend their evenings in the quiet shelter of the Rest, writing letters or reading some of the wholesome literature so plentifully provided for them.

"A measure of success has attended our efforts in the cause of total abstinence. Men have steered for the Rest with deliberate purpose; their first question on entering the doors being, 'Can I sign the pledge here?' One brings another, and now my pledge-book bears the names of many sailors, British and foreign, who I trust are still faithful to the bit of blue. The crowning blessing of all has been the joy of leading sinners to the Saviour, and this joy God has given us, more than once or twice, during the last few months.

"The French and Flemish ouvriers (workingmen) are always ready, nay, eager, and will stop work and run after us asking for a petit livre (little book). It is difficult to realise the darkness, ignorance, and superstition prevailing among these people. On one occasion a man asked if it was the Gospel of St. John I was distributing. I replied that it was. 'Ah,' said he, 'that is a bad book; if people read that book they become blind. I have a boy who was always reading that book, and now he is blind.' Strange that the Gospel which speaks of light more than any other, should be accused of causing blindness. I appeal for funds to enable us to dispense the knowledge of salvation to those souls who are perishing around us.

"We want more room; the place is already too strait for us. Just now we have the opportunity of securing rooms underneath those we occupy, which include a hall accommodating a hundred persons. This would be an immense advantage to our work, as it would enable us not only to hold services for the English-speaking sailors and the French people, but also, with the aid of a Scandinavian helper, for the German and Scandinavian sailors, for whose spiritual welfare there is no provision in this port. This will entail an outlay of £400, in addition to our present expenditure."

The booklet may be had for three halfpence post free from J. Snow, 2, Ivy-lane, E.C. Communications regarding the work may be sent to the resident secretary, Rev. D. S. Mackenzie.

FAITH-HEALING AT CHICAGO.—The International Christian and Missionary Alliance has held a two weeks' conference in Chicago-avenue Church. Rev. A. B. Simpson, of New York presiding. Holiness, the Second Coming, Missions, and Divine Healing, were the leading topics discussed at these annual gatherings. The anointing of the sick with oil and praying over them was a feature.

SCOTTISH Y.M.C.A. CONFERENCE.

MEETINGS IN FALKIRK.

The twenty-third annual Conference in connection with the Y.M.C.A.s and Fellowship Unions of Scotland was held during the past week in Falkirk. The appeal for hospitality was liberally and cordially responded to. The enthusiasm and warmth of the welcome extended to the delegates at the public reception on Tuesday night proved that the community are in active sympathy with the aims, objects, and work of the Associations represented. It is believed (says The Falkirk Mail) that in all respects the Conference was behind none of its predecessors in respect of the enthusiasm displayed, the interest awakened, and the impetus given to the prosecution of the good work which these Associations are and have been engaged in doing.

On Sunday morning Professor Laidlaw, Edinburgh, delivered an address to Christian workers on the words "A chosen vessel," in the Christian Institute, which was filled to overflowing by a highly attentive and deeply interested audience. Some Christian workers were troubled about whether they were in the right place, whether they were at the work they were best fitted for. There was no real trouble about that if they looked at it from the right point of view. If we were willing to be real vessels, willing to do the work God had prepared for us, all would come right. It solved a great many puzzles and difficulties just to be entirely willing to let the Lord use us as He thought fit. There must be purity of service. Nothing hinders Christian work so much as self. There must also be perfect correspondence between our conduct and character in daily life, and the work we take up.

On Sunday night Professor Laidlaw preached the inaugural sermon of the Conference in the parish church, which was filled to overflowing.

On Tuesday evening the delegates, numbering about 200, were received by the members of the local institution, and entertained to tea in the Christian Institute. In the evening the delegates were publicly received in the Town Hall, which was largely attended. Provost Griffiths (chairman) said this was his first appearance at a public meeting of Y.M.C. Associations, and he felt so much impressed with the feeling of the meeting that he hoped it would not be the last at which he would be present. He was present in a public capacity to offer the delegates the heartiest and sincerest welcome that he and his brother magistrates and the inhabitants of Falkirk could offer to them.

Rev. Mr. Carruthers, on the part of the local churches, also extended a hearty welcome to the delegates.

Mr. James Wilson represented the Young Men's Christian Association of the town in giving a cordial reception to the members.

Mr. Stevenson, Dunfermline, as chairman of the Executive Committee of the National Association, returned thanks on behalf of the delegates for the kind reception they had received. Rev. Mr. Jackson, Edinburgh, dealt with the question as to what place amusements ought to have in their lives. It was here that discrimination was sorely needed. Athletics were a good thing in their place; but if they were becoming to be the supreme thing they were no longer good, but bad and dangerous. Referring to the question of money-making, Mr. Jackson said that the haste to become rich was a temptation than which this generation knew none that was more seductive or more pitiless. All around there were noble lives being smitten down through the great desire to become rich. The one thing and only thing in this life that could please God was goodness. Everything that was good in this life lay along the line of a life that was devoted to the service of God. Christ did not dash from the lips of youth the cup of pleasure—unless indeed it were a cup of poison; He did not bar their search after wealth; He did not mock their thirst for knowledge of the good things they loved—their literature or their politics—not one of these He ever called common or unclean: but the words that He laid upon all our hearts was, "Seek ye first the Kingdom of God and his righteousness."

VILLAGE ASSOCIATIONS.

On Wednesday at ten o'clock a conference took place in the Institute on the subject, "Our Village Associations; their difficulties; and how to increase their usefulness." About 180 delegates were present. Provost Hunter, Denny, introduced the subject in an able address, in the course of which he said: In every village there ought to be, and in most villages there is, a Y.M.C.A., or a Sabbath Morning Fellowship Association. The initial difficulty in Y.M.C.A. work in our villages is to get young men to come out clear and distinct, firm and true, on Christ's side, and let it be known without doubt on which side they are. It is mere child's play, so to speak, to come out into active Christian work in the cities, compared to what it is in the rural villages of Scotland. Let a young man in the country show a religious tendency, and the "search light" of close public scrutiny is at once brought to bear on him, and his every look, his every movement, his every action, are at once brought to the touchstone of Christian consistency and Christian sincerity. There are difficulties hindering the growth of village associations. There is the constant stream of emigration of young men from the villages to our large centres of population. No sooner are young men got into harness in Christian work in the villages than the exigencies of business, or the development and changes in trade, or the desire to better their worldly position, takes good young men away. In all our villages, too, there is more or less of the feeling on the part of young men who associate themselves with the Y.M.C.A. to stand aloof from, and look askance at, intellectual force, as opposed to spiritual fervour, and incompatible with the special work and mission of the Y.M.C.A. On the other hand, there is the tendency on the part of merely intellectual young men to think about and speak of the Y.M.C.A. as a most feeble and fruitless organisation; and these two classes stand rigidly apart, viewing each other across the region which separates them, with feelings of mutual pity and contempt. The result is a mutual disadvantage: the Y.M.C.A. in many cases, sadly lacking in intellectual force and power, because of this very feeling which exists; and on the other hand, our intellectual young men, who are merely intellectual and not at all spiritual, lack the dynamic force which a spiritual life would give to their intellectual capabilities. Intellectual force will never raise a young man above his spiritual necessities. The deep longings of his soul will never be satisfied with mere intellectual attainments. The spiritually-minded young man ought to know this, and his aim should be to link himself on to the intellectual power of his more gifted fellow, so that the intellect of the one and the spirituality of the other may be woven together into a united texture that will be a comfort and a joy as well as an added strength to both.

So far as the successful growth and progress of village associations are concerned, there must be complete harmony and co-operation on broad lines of mutual freedom between them and the Church. It may be difficult to maintain this, but it is not impossible. Sometimes the Y.M.C.A. is to blame, and sometimes the Church, and sometimes both. If there is to be mutual sympathy and respect between the Y.M.C.A. and the Church, there must also be on the part of the Y.M.C.A. a cordial sympathy with young men, and the greatest possible wisdom and tact used in influencing them. If individual Christians, if associations of Christians, are to get in touch with young men so as to elevate and influence them for good, they must be taken on every side of their nature, and an intelligent interest taken in everything that concerns them. The whole history of God's dealing with this world has manifested his desire to get alongside of men to love and help them: and the greatest manifestation of that love to men has been in the gift of his Son. Can we have any better lesson as to how to deal with young men than this shown to us by God in the gift of Jesus Christ? A man for men, a young man for young men, He hath left us an example that we should follow in his steps.

A discussion followed.

Rev. Mr. Merrylees spoke on the difficulty of sectarianism, which, although lost sight of to a great extent in towns, was very pronounced in villages. Mr. Young, Alloa, urged the need for getting at young men as early as possible, and suggested the starting of classes for lads as feeders for the Associations. Begin with the boys. Dr. Balfour, Portobello, testified to the valuable help received by his Association by the starting of a company of the Boys' Brigade in the village.

Mr. M'Phail, Greenock, urged the importance of using the intellectual and evangelical in their Associations.

BUSINESS MEETING.

The business meeting was held in the afternoon. The annual report shows that the number of Associations in the National Union is 246; last year it was 242. Of the 246 Associations, 27 are Fellowship Unions or United Young Men's Christian Associations, and the number of branches of which these are composed is returned at 436. The number of ordinary members and associates in the National Union is 24,499. Last year it was 23,284. When to the ordinary members and associates are added the honorary members, the total membership amounts to 25,544, which is 1,178 more than it was a year ago.

Mr. Young, treasurer, made an appeal for more contributions from the Associations, and predicted that unless there was an increase of revenue from this source, the union would be bankrupt in three years.

It was agreed that the week of prayer should be held as usual this year from 29th October to 5th November, inclusive.

CONFERENCE IN THE PARISH CHURCH.

In the evening a conference took place in Falkirk Parish Church, which was crowded in every part by a deeply interested audience. The subject was "The influence of our Associations on the Christian life of young men in the home, the church, and the world," which was introduced by Councillor Wm. Williamson, Peebles. The chair was occupied by Mr. A. L. Brown, Galashiels, who said one of their principal aims and objects was to bring Christian men and women together in Christian fellowship; such an object as that with the unquestioned and undisputed benefits which flowed from it was worthy the sympathy and support of ministers, elders, and all who love Christ and his Word.

Mr. Williamson's paper was an able exposition of the subject, which he treated under the heads (1) the influence of the Associations; (2) the Christian life in the home, church, and world; and (3) the influence of the Associations on the Christian life of the young man in each of these spheres.

Several delegates took part in the discussion. In the course of an eloquent address, Mr. Oatts, of Glasgow, said the Conference at Glasgow would bear favourable comparison with any Scottish Conference that had gone before. There had been a spirit of unity and brotherhood pervading all their discussions, and the stimulus received was bound to benefit every part of Scotland.

The delegates were treated to a picnic on Thursday to Linlithgow and Westquarter. In the evening a tea and farewell meeting was held in the Institute, at which prayer, testimonies, and praise were engaged in, and expression given of the deep sense of gratitude the delegates had of the great kindness shown to them during their stay.

MR. AITKEN IN LONDON.

On Monday, in St. Mary's Church, Aldermanbury, Rev. W. Hay Aitken commenced a series of special mission services, to be held daily at 1.15 and 7.30 p.m. until Friday, Sept. 29. At the opening service the church, which seats about 500, was nearly filled by a congregation composed almost entirely of men. Mr. Aitken's address was based on the words, "My Father worketh hitherto, and I work." His leading argument was that, following upon the line of his declaration, "Let us make man in our image," God had been working through the ages, and is still incessantly working, to make saints of men. In accomplishing this, however, he showed that it is absolutely necessary that God should have the willing co-operation of man. In closing, Mr. Aitken made an earnest appeal to all to give up resistance to the strivings of God within, and to freely yield the heart and will to Him.

THE STUNDISTS.—A public meeting was held in Dundee last week, to express sympathy with the persecuted Russian Stundists. A local association was formed to co-operate with other friends in helping these afflicted fellow-Christians.

GERMAN PROTESTANTS IN ROME.—Hitherto Evangelical worship in German has been conducted in the chapel of the Prussian Ambassador at Rome. It is now proposed to build a church for the accommodation of the 160 families of German Protestants resident in the city, and the numerous Germans who pass the winter there.

The Opium Commission.

On Wednesday last week the sittings of the Opium Commission were resumed at Westminster, under the presidency of Lord Brassey; the other Commissioners present being Sir James Lyall, Mr. Arthur Pease, Mr. Mowbray, M.P., and Sir William Roberts.

MR. BENJAMIN BROOMHALL,

General Secretary of the China Inland Mission, was the first witness. In reply to the chairman, he said he had not himself resided in China, but the information he had from time to time received from missionaries in China, in the shape of communications and personal communications, left upon his mind the profound conviction that opium-smoking in its effects was, first, physically, morally, and socially one of the most awful vices that was ever inflicted upon the world; second, that the encouragement given by this country to the opium trade has been in its results, commercially, politically, and morally, one of the greatest mistakes and one of the most serious crimes ever committed by a nation; third, that the rapid extension in China during recent years of the growth of the poppy, and of the habit of opium-smoking, threatened the very existence of the empire; fourth, that there was absolutely no hope of any effective check being given to the rapid increase of the habit so long as the export of Indian opium was continued; and fifth, that the habit of opium-smoking was one of the greatest, if not the greatest, hindrances to progress of Christian missionary work in China.

Witness next put before the Commission the reports that had been received from the various provinces of China bearing upon the question. From Yunan the report was that the ravages of opium-smoking in that remote district were very great. The habit was undermining the whole structure of society; it pervaded all classes, rich and poor alike, and under its evil effects China, in the opinion of the agent, was being whirled to its ruin. Between 80 and 90 per cent. of the adult male population smoked opium, and 20 or 30 per cent. of the women. From the western province of Kwei-Chou it was reported that 50 to 70 per cent. of the whole population smoked opium, and the effects was no less serious than in Yunan. The reports from the largest province of China—Si-Chuen—were of a similar character, but it was said that there it was the poorer classes who were principally affected, the better classes not having given themselves to the habit to such an extent. The opium used in the western provinces of which he had spoken was almost entirely home grown; scarcely any Indian opium found its way into these populous provinces.

At the same time, it was almost universal to find that the people blamed England for the introduction of opium, and for the spread of the smoking habit and its continuance, because by importing the Indian opium, the Chinese Government were unable to check the native cultivation of the drug. There was no doubt that the Indian opium was of far better quality than the home-grown article, and was retailed at a higher price. But a large proportion of the population of the western provinces never saw any foreign opium, and their denunciation of England was entirely because she had introduced the habit into China. Similar reports had been received from the central province of Shen-si and the northern province of Shan-si. In these provinces nearly three-quarters of the cultivated land was occupied by opium. Now and again the cultivation was forbidden by proclamation, but these proclamations were little more than a dead letter, and the cultivation of the drug was recognised as legal by the imposition of a duty of 3dols. per acre.

As a result of the extension of the habit of opium-smoking, the population of these provinces, who were formerly industrious and law-abiding people, were becoming in every sense demoralised, and their prosperity destroyed. In these provinces also there was very little foreign opium. He held that the local and provincial governments of China were distinctly to blame for allowing the cultivation, though from time to time efforts have been made to check the cultivation, but had to be abandoned owing to the determined opposition of the opium-growers. Other reports from the central provinces stated that the smoking habit was spreading in all directions, and was becoming almost universal, to the misery and ruin of the people. Here, too, England was blamed for the evils that were caused, because Englishmen had first introduced the drug. The name of England was hated, and from this cause the greatest hindrances were thrown in the way of the work of the missionaries. One report stated that the habit had become so universal in the large cities that no public protest was now made against it.

Lord Brassey: Does that mean that public opinion in those parts no longer condemned the habit?—Witness: That is so.

The witness proceeded to quote the opinions of the missionaries as to the serious effect the habit was having upon the Christian churches. Their members were falling away daily, as the habit had spread like wildfire during recent years. One missionary expressed the opinion that it would now be impossible for the Chinese Government to check the use of the drug.

Lord Brassey: From what you have said there seems to be no doubt that this rapid spread of the habit had been fed chiefly by the increase in the cultivation of native opium and not by the importation of foreign opium, and that there has been great laxity on the part of the Chinese officials in permitting the cultivation?—Witness: That is so, no doubt, but the reason why the cultivation has been allowed is that the Chinese Government found that millions of rupees were going out of the country for the purchase of Indian opium, and in order to keep this money in the country the cultivation of the drug at home was allowed. In his opinion, if the process went on at the present rate, in another fifty years the population of China would be practically destroyed. This seemed to be the opinion of a large section of the people, who believed that it was the deliberate policy of England to thus weaken and destroy the people by opium so as to allow them to seize the country for themselves. It was this belief that had led to the advocacy by certain leaders of the policy of the extermination of Europeans, especially of all English people, in China, as absolutely necessary for the preservation of the country.

By Sir William Roberts: It was certainly his strong conviction that so long as the importation of Indian opium was permitted, the Chinese Government could not take steps, with any hope of being successful, to check the cultivation of native opium.

Lord Brassey: Do you recognise that there has been a great change in public opinion in England on this subject? and that a war with China to compel her to continue the importation of Indian opium would never be sanctioned by public opinion? Witness: I do not believe war would be sanctioned, but at the same time, China would not like to run the risk. Further, the Chinese officials believed that pressure would be brought to bear upon them in other ways than by war.

By Sir James Lyall: He had heard of Sir James Fergusson's statement in the House of Commons, but he still thought that so long as we were in India manufacturing and exporting opium in such large quantities, China would take little notice of official declarations of any kind; they would be morally compelled to allow the native cultivation.

MR. GRAHAM BROWN,

a missionary who had laboured for six years in the city of Lan Chou, the capital of the province of Kan Suh, an inaccessible district in the North-west of China, bore testimony to the terrible effects which the habit of opium-smoking was inflicting upon the people. It was less than fifty years since the first opium-smoker appeared in the district, and not more than thirty years since the drug was first cultivated in the district. Now eight-tenths of the adult male population and six-tenths of the married women were given up to the habit. Very little Indian opium came into the province, because the distance from the coast was so great—2400 miles—and the cost of Indian opium was ten times that of native opium, while the strength was as eight to one. In 1875 a great effort was made by one of the governors to check the habit. He made a practice of slitting the lips of all confirmed opium-smokers, so that they could not close over the pipe, and for a time this had some effect, but it had long since worn off, and the habit was spreading more rapidly than ever. Another habit that was having very terrible effects was that of eating the crude opium to allay the craving when the smoker had not time to smoke.

In answer to further questions by the president, witness said that no doubt the great source of supply was local, but it should be borne in mind that until Indian opium was imported there was no smoking in the province, and it was because the importation was allowed that the Chinese Government could take no effectual steps to check the cultivation. He knew of one instance of a very upright Mandarin who took strong measures to stop the growth of the drug, and at the next triennial visit of the Viceroy fifty petitions were trumped up against the Mandarin so as to get him removed from office.

By Sir James Lyall: He believed that if the Indian Government stopped the export of opium, the Mandarins of the Chinese provinces would do their best to put down the habit of opium-smoking, and, if they were allowed a free hand, he believed it would very quickly be done. It was a fact that Indian opium in China was a luxury of the rich in the same way that French brandy was a luxury in this country; but, to follow the analogy, it was doubtful whether, if the production of Scotch and Irish whisky was stopped in this country, French brandy would not become a more common drink.

REV. A. ELWIN,

a missionary of the Church Missionary Society for twenty-three years in the city of Hung-Chow, spoke of the disastrous effects of opium-smoking on the labouring population. The agricultural labourers as a rule did not give way to the habit, and were physically strong and robust. So far as the artisans of the towns were concerned, who mostly had acquired the habit, there had not been much physical deterioration, but this was only his own experience at Hung-Chow, and he understood that matters were far worse in the inland districts. But there was no doubt that the habit was rapidly spreading in Hung-Chow; there were now more than 1000 opium shops in that one city. The opium used was nearly entirely Indian.

By Sir James Lyall: He certainly believed that if Indian opium had not been introduced into China, there would have been no native cultivation of the drug.

MR. MARCUS WOOD,

a lay missionary, who had travelled in several Chinese provinces, said the habit of opium-smoking had become very common, not so much perhaps among the agricultural labourers as among the artisans of the large towns. He agreed with the previous witnesses as to the ruinous effects of the habit upon the people, and also as to the fact that the connection of England with the opium traffic made English people hated on all sides and handicapped the missionaries terribly in their work.

By Mr. Mowbray, M.P.: Smokers and non-smokers alike hated England for her connection with the trade. He did not say that the smoker loved the drug and hated the person who had brought it to them, but that the smoker hated the drug itself, and only used it because he was a slave to it. A vast majority of the smokers would be only too glad to be cured of the habit. It was certainly his opinion that if the importation of Indian opium was stopped the native cultivation would be prohibited and the smoking habit checked.

By Sir William Roberts: He thought there was overwhelming evidence of physical degeneracy of the race as the result of the opium habit.

MR. FLETCHER BROWN,

of the Methodist Episcopalian Church, who had been a missionary in China for ten years, stated that the effects of opium-smoking on the Chinese people was distinctly bad both physically and morally. He had found that England's connection with the opium trade made all Englishmen hated throughout the country. He had often been taunted with bringing the Gospel of Christ to the people with the one hand, while with the other he, as an Englishman, was forcing this hated drug upon them. On his return to England he had been entrusted with three petitions to the Queen, signed by over 1000 native Christians of China, in favour of the discontinuance of the importation of Indian opium into China.

By Sir William Roberts: He did not know that these native Christians had ever petitioned their own authorities; it would probably not be safe for them to do so. It was not the fact that the native Christians were taken under the protection of the European Governments that accounted for the hostility to Europeans. As a rule the missionaries carefully abstained from all interference in native politics.

BRIGADE SURGEON PRINGLE,

of the Indian Army, gave evidence as to the effect of opium-smoking from the medical point of view

He considered that the habitual use of opium was harmful physically and morally. As to the allegation that opium was taken regularly as a safeguard against malarious fever in the low-lying districts, he said most positively that, so far from being of any benefit for this purpose, it only rendered those using the drug more liable to the disease. With regard to the attitude of the Indian Government on the opium question, as a public servant he would only say that their policy on that subject was so utterly opposed to all that they had otherwise done for the elevation of the people that he could not reconcile it with the object they had in view. As to the danger of interfering with the opium habit from the point of view of creating disaffection, he would point out that far more inquisitorial proceedings were taken with regard to the suppression of infanticide and in other matters than would ever be required in the suppression of opium-smoking. He did not deny that it would be difficult to withdraw the use of opium altogether from those who were confirmed users of the drug, but it was possible to remove the temptation to indulge if the facilities for obtaining the drug were removed. He did not say that the habit was anything like universal or even general in India, but it was spreading and was doing great harm.

Lord Brassey asked if the witness had any practical suggestion to make as to Government action in the matter? The witness said that he would simply suggest that the drug should be cultivated and used only for medicinal purposes, and that this should be done under Government supervision, as was the case with other poisonous drugs. He had no doubt that such a policy would be welcomed by all classes in India, except, perhaps, in the case of some of the opium-smokers themselves.

By Sir James Lyall: The practice in Indian gaols was to dole out the opium in small doses to confirmed smokers in such cases where the withholding of it would result in danger to life. He believed, however, that opium was introduced into the gaols from outside friends of the prisoners with the connivance of some of the gaolers. Finally, he said that he did not suppose that any legislation would make men give up opium altogether, but what he was anxious to see was the Government refuse any longer to put facilities for obtaining the drug in the way of the people.

By Sir William Roberts: He thought it was perfectly practicable for the Government to place quinine at the disposal of the people in malarious districts, and by that means to remove any pretence that opium was necessary as a medicine.

who had resided for twenty-one years in the south of China in connection with the Presbyterian Mission, said that up to 1880 there was very little opium grown in his district, but since then the cultivation had extended. He confirmed all that previous witnesses had said as to the terrible effects of opium-smoking. He had never met a single Chinese man or woman who did not condemn the habit. The English Government had done nothing but good in China, with the single exception of the introduction of opium, and he was perfectly convinced that if this one blot upon us was removed the Chinese people would be more friendly to England than to any other European nation. There was no other remedy except the complete prohibition of the export of Indian opium to China. He did not like to speak positively as to what the Chinese Government would do, if that was done, to stop the cultivation in China. Twenty years ago he had no doubt that the Government would have at once stopped it, and even now he thought it would try to do so. At all events, the English Government would then be freed from responsibility in the matter, and would reinstate themselves in the good opinion of the Chinese people.

MR. DONALD MATHESON.

I went out to China in 1837, after a preparatory training in business in this country, to enter the office of Messrs. Jardine, Matheson, and Co., with the prospect of promotion in due time if qualified for it. Business was then conducted at Canton. The firm acted as commission agents for goods from all parts of the world; besides which they carried on a large business in the contraband trade of opium. Being contraband, it was carried on outside the port of Canton. A receiving ship was anchored at the mouth of the Canton river, and from this, cargoes of the drug were sent off in clippers to be delivered at stations along the coast. To the receiving ships at these stations, Chinese dealers came and made purchases of the opium, paying for it in silver, as the most convenient medium.

Jardine, Matheson, and Co., and Dent and Co. had nearly the whole of this coast business, and it must be said that they were honourable men, as were also the captains of the clippers and the receiving ships. The clippers were armed, but chiefly for protection from pirates, and the Chinese who purchased the drug smoothed the way by bribes to the Mandarins.

It may be seen from what I have said how easily the charge of smuggling in this business was evaded by transferring it to the shoulders of the Chinese opium-dealers. One is reminded of Æsop's fable of "The boys and the frogs." The boys were pelting the frogs in the pond for their amusement, but after many had been killed, a courageous frog cried out, "Stop your cruel sport, and consider, what is play to you is death to us." So what was enriching the British merchant and the East India Company was death to the Chinese.

The Emperor Taou Kwang became greatly concerned about this opium traffic. It is said that he had lost one or more sons from opium-smoking, and edicts against the trade were issued, but in vain; and at last, in 1839, Commissioner Lin was sent to Canton to strike at the root of the evil by imprisoning the foreign merchants in the factories, and compelling them to give up all the opium then on the coast of China. At the same time orders were issued that opium-smokers should be punished by death. I myself saw an opium-smoker hanging on a cross in the agonies of death not far from the factories.

I was one of those imprisoned and specially marked off as one of sixteen connected with the opium traffic, but, on the whole of the opium on the coast of China being given up and destroyed, we were liberated, on the condition that we would never again return to Canton. It was an heroic attempt on the part of a Government ignorant of international law, but it utterly failed. The opium merchants applied to our Home Government for redress, and a succession of grievous wars began, slaying thousands of innocent Chinese, from 1841 to 1858, when opium was finally legalised by the Treaty of Tientsin, on which occasion the United States Minister remarked to the Bishop of Victoria, "It is the triumph of successful crime."

Let me add that during the first war in 1841 with China, India and the British nation were struck to the heart by the fearful Cabul massacre, and again in the years 1857-8, when opium was legalised, they were agonised by the terrible Indian Mutiny.

Is there any remedy to propose? Yes, by sweeping away the poppy cultivation from the plains of India, and its unrighteous paltry revenue of four millions sterling, that India may enter on a new career of prosperity, and give to China the opportunity of recovering her ability to purchase British manufactures on a much larger scale than in the past. Let us look at Burmah on one side of China, and Japan on the other. Opium in Burmah is a source of endless trouble, whereas Japan, having secured its exclusion by treaty, is pursuing a prosperous career.

In 1841 the business of British and other foreign merchants was transferred to Hong Kong, and it became the depot for opium, and the port from which the clippers were despatched to the coast stations as before.

In due time I was made a partner in the firm of Jardine, Matheson and Co. Till then I had been indifferent to the question of the immorality of the opium traffic, but now responsibility brought questionings, and conscience was awakened by a Divine Power, till at length the thought of continuing in the opium traffic became intolerable.

Several incidents concurred in bringing me to this conclusion: 1. A visit to Foochow in one of our opium clippers. I saw there two forces at work, and in deadly opposition, namely, two opium receiving-stations demoralising and ruining the people, while there was a mission station to carry the Gospel to them. On landing I was struck with the wretched look of the inhabitants from opium-smoking, and now, nearly fifty years afterwards, Archdeacon Wolfe, of Foochow, writes:—"One of the towns in this neighbourhood, held as a mission station for twenty years or more by an American Board of Missions, has at last to be abandoned, and I think very properly, for the degradation of an opium-smoking town is of that peculiar and intensely low and hardened type, that, humanly speaking, it is almost impossible to make any impression of a moral or spiritual nature upon the inhabitants of a place given up to the degrading vice of opium-smoking."

2. Having made a visit to Singapore, Dr. Little showed me some of the opium dens there, which are in great numbers, and which are making terrible havoc among the Chinese population, and a pamphlet of his bears important testimony to the evils of opium-smoking. (The pamphlet has been handed in to the Royal Commission.)

3. I have spoken with many Chinese on the opium subject, all against the vice, and an opium broker told me of a saying: "When a man smokes opium he is making his own coffin." He admitted the truth of it in his own case.

4. A fine young man was selected by myself to go to Bombay to inspect our opium before shipment to China. To my great sorrow he became a confirmed smoker; the habit became incurable, and he too was hastening to his grave.

5. Lastly, in 1847, one of our clipper vessels on the coast was boarded by pirates and plundered, the officers murdered and nearly all the crew. In the newspaper giving an account of the disaster, the vessel was said to be my property (being managing partner at the time), instead of the firm's, which stung me to the quick, and convinced me that as a Christian man I could no longer continue in the firm. I sent in my resignation to the senior partner then at home, and, after some unavoidable delay, I left China finally in 1849.

Lord Shaftesbury, who took up the subject with his whole heart, used to say, "The opium traffic is a sin and a shame." The opposition will bring forward many telling arguments about its injuring vested rights and perilling the safety of our Indian Empire, but stick to the facts that it is a sin and a shame, and you will eventually gain your point.

now on the Bethnal Green Medical Mission, and for many years a medical missionary in charge of a hospital in Swatow, gave evidence very similar to some previous witnesses. He was especially emphatic on the point that the disastrous effects of the opium habit and those of alcoholic indulgence are by no means on a par. He had had experience of both, and the drink habit, bad as it is, is far more easily cured than the subtle and terrible opium habit.

The first witness on Thursday was a member of the Indian Council. Asked as to his view on the general question of the effect of the use of opium upon the people of India and China, the witness said the conclusion he had come to as the result of a life's experience was that the use of opium in moderation did not only cause none of the miseries that had been described, but, so far from being harmful, was actually beneficial. Certain classes of the people of India had consumed opium from time immemorial, but these classes comprised so small a proportion of the total population that so far as India was concerned there was really no opium question at all. It had been said that the use of the drug was spreading in India and was encouraged bo the policy of the British Government. That was not true. The population of India had largely increased during the British occupation, while the consumption of opium had actually diminished, and was certainly smaller now than it was ten years ago. This had been the effect of the policy of the Indian Government, which, by constantly increasing the excise duties, had reduced the consumption in India to a minimum. The danger was that they might go too far in that direction. By making opium too dear they would encourage smuggling, which was a small matter, but they might also drive the people of India to the use of cheaper and far more noxious drugs which were growing at their very doors. As to the effect of the use of opium upon the physical development of the people, he might point out that the drug was used most extensively by Rajputanas and the Sikhs, and these were, without exception, the finest, strongest, and most handsome race of India—the very flower of our army, and among the very finest races of the whole earth. With regard to China, there was no greater delusion than the supposition that China was dependent upon India for its opium supply. If no opium were exported from India, it would not make the slightest difference in the consumption in China. In China

Indian opium was the luxury of the rich. A single province of China produced more opium than was produced by the whole of India. The Chinese Government could, if they chose, entirely prohibit the import, or could impose any restrictions they chose. Meanwhile, he did not see that we had anything to reproach ourselves with. If India was deprived of the opium revenue it would be an act of folly and injustice such as had never been inflicted upon a dependent people.

By Mr. A. Pease: He believed that in a majority of cases the use of the drug was absolutely harmless, just as he believed that in this country the use of beer and wine was in a vast majority of cases perfectly harmless and even beneficial; but in neither case did he think it at all wrong to put high duties upon the article with a view, within certain limits, of restricting the sale. If it was the fact that the population of China was being demoralised by the use of the drug, he thought the policy of the Indian Government ought to be modified, provided, further, that by stopping the exports of Indian opium to China the use of the drug in China would be restricted. As a question of morals, he did not think that it was justifiable for a Government to derive a profit from the demoralisation of the people. At the same time, he thought it should be shown that by prohibiting the import into China the use of the native drug would not be stimulated.

SIR WILLIAM MOORE,

who had been principal medical officer for many years in Rajputana, and who had had altogether thirty-three years' experience in medical work in India, said he had investigated the question of the use of opium and its effects, and the result of his investigations was that opium-smoking was practically harmless, and in many cases productive of very great benefit. A moderate use of the drug brightened the intellect and strengthened the system physically and mentally. In times of scarcity it enabled the people to do with less food, and it served as a prophylactic in the case of certain fevers. Of course if opium was taken to excess it did injury, but not so much injury as alcohol. He considered that if the use of opium was prohibited except for medicinal purposes it would be an unwarrantable interference with the social arrangements of the people, and would prevent those suffering from fevers and other diseases from obtaining relief.

DR. MOUAT,

who had been for twenty years inspector-general of prisons and asylums in India, spoke of his experience of the physical conditions of the opium-eaters who had come under his observation. He never saw healthier or stronger men than these opium-smokers were. This applied not only to natives of all parts of India, but to Chinamen who came into the prisons. Some of the men came from the North-west provinces of India, where the great majority of the people were opium-users, and had been such for generation after generation. He did no believe that the moderate use of opium was any more harmful than a similar use of alcohol was in this country. Indeed there was far less of what he might call drunkenness in the use of opium than was the case with alcohol. No doubt the use of the drug in excess might be deleterious, but as to that he could not speak from personal experience, because he had never seen a single instance of a man who could be said to be drunk with opium.

SIR GEORGE BIRDWOOD,

formerly medical officer of the Bombay establishment of the Indian army, and now of the India Office, gave evidence as to the difficulty he had experienced in dealing with the European soldiers on account of their indulgence in spirits. On the other hand, the native troops gave no trouble whatever in that respect. Most of them were opium-eaters, and they were always ready to march, and were perfectly steady. He had never known of the case of a death resulting from the use of opium, and his experience had shown that smoking opium was as innocuous as smoking hay, straw, or stubble. Both in India and China it was found that nowhere were the people so robust, industrious, and thriving as in the principal opium-producing provinces. He maintained that the drug was essential to the health, wealth, and happiness of a vegetarian, tropical people. If the use of it was prohibited in India a door would be opened to a large trade in alcoholic drinks, which would be a frightful evil in a tropical country. He considered that the Indian Government had exhibited great weakness in yielding to the pressure put upon them by the anti-opium party.

SIR THOMAS WADE

was the first witness on Friday. He said he had resided in China for forty years, during the latter part of the time as British Minister at Pekin. Asked as to his opinion as to the effects of the use of opium upon the people of China, he said that he thought there was no doubt whatever that opium when used in moderation was no more harmful than was beer in this country when used in moderation. With every desire to do all that was possible to diminish the evils arising from the excessive use of the drug—for he was willing to admit that there were evils from the excessive use—yet the mode in which the question had been treated by the Anti-Opium Society had driven him to the opposite camp. As to the effects of the use of opium on the people, he had seen cases where it was used to excess, just in the same way as he had seen instances of the excessive use of alcohol. He had been in opium dens, and they appeared to him to very much resemble the gin palaces of England. But because opium was abused by being taken in excess, there was no more reason for denouncing the ordinary use of it as a sin than there was for denouncing in the same way the use of alcohol.

With regard to the action of the English Government in the matter, he believed that had been the subject of a great amount of exaggeration on the part of the anti-opium party. They spoke of the first, second, and third opium wars, as if the whole cause of our disputes with China was our determination to compel them to accept Indian opium. There was no doubt that the seizure of opium at Canton by Commissioner Lin was the immediate cause of the hostilities, but the real cause was the persistent insolence and hostility of the Chinese officials for years, and the war would have come if there had been no opium in question at all. There was never any such thing as a deliberate policy on the part of England to force the opium trade upon China vi et armis, whether the Chinese wanted it or not.

Lord Brassey: In the various negotiations that took place since the end of the last war, would you say that it was not the object of the British Government at any time to force the Chinese to receive Indian opium?—Witness: Quite the reverse. So far from there being any reason for saying that in the treatment of the opium question we sought to make China favour the Indian article, it was the fact that on every occasion when the opium question was considered the British Government were anxious to agree to the Chinese proposals to increase the duty. Witness expressed his utter astonishment that intelligent men could be found to assert that opium had been forced upon China by British bayonets, and that at length China, overborne by British military force, had been obliged to sanction the cultivation of the drug in China in her own defence. As a matter of fact, at the present time there was nothing in our arrangements or treaties with China which would prevent the Chinese Government from imposing higher duties on Indian opium, or from dealing with the import of that article by entire prohibition, or in any other way in which they thought fit. But he did not for a moment imagine that China would ever desire to stop the import, because the duties they charged upon Indian opium formed so valuable a source of revenue that they would be extremely unlikely to interfere with it.

Lord Brassey: Are you of opinion that the Chinese Government are sincerely anxious to put an end to the opium trade and opium cultivation?—Witness said that sincerity of purpose was always more or less a delicate question, but he should say a very large number of the Chinese officials were sincerely opposed to the opium trade. At the same time, it was recognised that the abolition of opium-smoking, and of the cultivation of the drug, was an absolute impossibility, and therefore that it would be useless to put a stop to the Indian imports, because the opium users would simply fall back upon the native article. It was true that in all parts of the country might be seen posted up edicts prohibiting the cultivation of the poppy, but the cultivation went on just the same, and the Government collected the revenue from the drug in every case. He therefore thought it was clear that there was no very active opposition on the part of the Government to the cultivation and use of the drug.

SIR LEPEL GRIFFIN,

who had been many years in the service of the Indian Government in the Punjaub and Central India, and had given a good deal of attention to the subject of opium, having been head of the Opium Revenue Department of the native States, said that the cultivation of opium used to be a Government monopoly, but that was given up long ago, and now the Government had no direct concern whatever in the cultivation or the manufacture of the drug. The system was now entirely one of passing the opium from the States where it was produced and levying the tax upon it. With regard to the proposal to prohibit the cultivation of opium, he supposed anything was possible for an autocratic Government, but such an act would be the most tyrannous and unjust proceeding ever adopted by a civilised Government, and would be a direct violation of the whole policy of the Indian Government for the last fifty years. The people of India were not to any great extent consumers of opium, except in the case of the Sikhs and the Rajpoots. It was too expensive a habit for the working classes. He did not believe that crime was produced by the use of opium. At all events, he had never known such a case in all his experience as magistrate or judge. In the case of the Sikhs he saw no ill effects, but they were a hardy race, and could take more opium and more alcohol than other Indian races. He would point out, however, that the Sikhs were prohibited by their creed from using tobacco, and that was the reason why they had taken to opium and alcohol. They were indeed very hard drinkers, and this fact, he thought, ought to be considered in view of the suggestion of prohibition. If opium were prohibited, might not the people take to alcohol, which was a thousand times worse than opium? With regard to China, he would only say that he had no doubt the Chinese would continue to use opium even if the whole of the Indian imports were discontinued.

MR. A. LANGMAN,

a missionary who had resided eight years in the province of Cheh Kiang, China, stated that all he had heard from the previous missionary witnesses as to the evil effects of opium on the people of China was perfectly true, and was not at all exaggerated. Within the last three weeks he had received a petition from Chinese Christians in the province where he had worked in which they said it was hardly possible to conceive the extent of the evil caused by opium-smoking. Homes were scattered, wives and families deserted, and all crimes, adultery, robbery, etc., were committed as the result of that habit. Half the difficulty in the way of the spread of Christianity arose from the use of opium. The witness further said he was quite satisfied that the whole of the hostility shown by the Chinese to the English was because of their connection with the opium traffic. The Chinese people universally believed that England was responsible for the introduction of opium-smoking into China. When it was put to the Chinese that opium was in China long before England introduced the Indian article, the reply was that then it was only used medicinally, and the use was prohibited in any other way, but that through the action of England the use of opium had been legalised, and had spread universally.

MR. S. LOCKHART,

Registrar-General of Hong Kong, expressed his belief that the moderate use of opium was not harmful, either physically or mentally. In the case of excess, the smoker was, to some extent, injured physically but not mentally. He certainly did not think that opium-smoking among the Chinese people was as injurious or as great a nuisance as alcohol drinking in this country. He denied emphatically that Englishmen in China were hated on account of the opium trade.

By Sir William Roberts: He thought it was quite impossible to entirely suppress opium-smoking in China—as impossible, in fact, as it was to suppress beer-drinking in this country.

By Mr. A. Pease: He did not believe that it was of necessity the case that the habit grew upon one that indulged in it; on the contrary, he had known many cases where the amount consumed was less as time went on. No doubt when a man once began to use opium to excess it became exceedingly difficult for him to break off the habit, or to reduce the quantity he used. Alcohol-drinking in China was exceedingly rare, and he had never known a single case of actual drunkenness among Chinamen.

On Saturday the secretary of the Commission (Sir Joseph Bernard) read communications from Sir Joseph Fayrer and Sir Hugh Low, who were unable to attend personally.

SIR JOSEPH FAYRER

said that he was a surgeon and physician, and had had thirty years' practice and experience in various parts of India. It was unfortunate that human nature was so constituted that it would not forego the use of stimulants and narcotics, all of which were liable to be abused, and when they were so abused they produced the most degrading and pernicious effects upon the human race. There could not be a doubt that in the great cities of India, China, and other Eastern countries the abuse was carried by a certain but limited number to a great excess, but to nothing like the extent to which the abuse of alcohol was carried in this country. It was well known that over large areas of country in India by tens of thousands of people opium in moderation was habitually used, and they had a thorough belief in its efficacy to protect them against malarial fevers, that under its influence all the functions of life were better performed, that life was not shortened by it, and that physical and mental conditions were improved rather than deteriorated. This view, he knew, received the support of eminent men who had studied the question, and he was not aware of anything to controvert it. It seemed to him that this crusade against opium, though well meant, was most unreasonable. Both alcohol and opium in extreme cases were evils, but the moderate use of either must be left to the discretion of those who felt it necessary to take it. He could see no medical ground that would justify violent interference with the custom of taking opium. They might with advantage check and limit the excessive use of it, but to suppress it altogether, it seemed to him, would be very unjustifiable.

SIR HUGH LOW,

who was for many years employed as Administrator of Perak and other states of the Malay Peninsula under the British Government, wrote that he was of the decided opinion that there was no such abuse of opium in Perak and in the colony of Labuan, in Borneo, or any of the islands near the Straits, as had been described by the Chinese missionaries. His experience was that as a rule the drug was used in moderation, and so used was beneficial rather than otherwise.

MR. WILLIAM LOCKHART,

a medical missionary in China from 1838 to 1864, during the latter part of which period he had half a dozen hospitals under his charge, said he had had a large experience of the effects of opium in China. When taken in small quantities the drug was not particularly harmful, but he found that the invariable tendency with confirmed opium users was to gradually increase the dose. When a man became in this way a victim to the opium habit it was undoubtedly pernicious and injurious to him in every respect; his mental faculties were not particularly impaired, but his general system became deteriorated in every way. This was so completely recognised in China that persons who were given up to the habit of opium smoking were not allowed to give evidence in any legal proceedings in the Chinese courts, as they were not considered as able to keep themselves free from corruption. He did not believe that anything like a third, or even a sixth, of the population were victims of the habit, because there was not sufficient opium in the country to be taken to such an extent. Opium smoking in China was entirely confined to adults. The women smoked, but not to the same extent as the men. In the district in which he had resided he should say that about one in ten of the adult males were opium smokers. He had no means of controverting the evidence already given that the native opium was far greater in amount than the imported opium, but from his own experience he very much doubted whether that was the case. He did not believe that the evils resulting from opium were nearly so great as those resulting from alcohol drinking. He certainly believed that alcohol-drinking in this country was a far greater curse than was opium-smoking in China. It was not true that we compelled China to take Indian opium; she took the opium just in the same way as she took Manchester goods and other articles of commerce. He did not think it possible to prevent the cultivation of opium in India, but he agreed that it was very undesirable that the English Government or the Indian Government should engage in such a trade as the opium trade, and he had a very strong opinion that the Indian Government ought to free itself from all share and complicity in the trade.

DR. GEORGE DODS, who had resided for many years in Canton and had practised as a medical man there, said that his experience was that most of the opium smokers used the drug in moderation and without any serious harm. Many persons who had been pointed out to him as suffering from the effects of excessive indulgence in the drug he found on examination to be dying from consumption or some other disease, who had taken to opium to relieve their sufferings. The number of instances he had met with where the constitution was ruined simply by the use of opium was very small.

MR. D. M'LAREN,

formerly president of the Edinburgh Chamber of Commerce, had been actively engaged in the wholesale tea trade. Fifty-three years ago his attention had been attracted to this question of the opium trade, owing to the disorganisation of the tea trade by the first Chinese war. If the demoralising effects of the use of opium could be satisfactorily proved, he believed that in the long run the trade in opium would not be a profitable one, because what was morally wrong could not be commercially right. The trade between India and China had always been of an anomalous kind, being dominated by this question of opium. It was almost impossible to resist the conclusion from the figures that the opium trade from India to China had the effect of checking the demand for British manufactures in China.

REV. T. G. SELBY,

a Wesleyan missionary who had spent many years in China, said that he had carefully gone over the evidence that had already been given by the missionaries as to the evils inflicted upon the Chinese people by the use of opium, and without going over the ground again he would simply say that he agreed with the statements that had been made, and he believed that those statements were absolutely true. He would point out that the missionaries were in actual contact with the people, living among them constantly in the interior provinces, and spoke from actual observation and experience; while the consular officials, merchants, and others who had spoken as to the harmlessness of opium-smoking could only speak from hearsay and second-hand evidence.

DEPUTY SURGEON-GENERAL PARTRIDGE, of the Bombay Army, who had served in India from 1855 to 1885, said that the conclusions at which he had arrived as to the effect of the use of opium upon the people of India was that opium-smoking was a vice that inflicted great injury upon health and tended to degrade the people physically, mentally, and morally. Further, he considered that the cultivation and manufacture of the drug for any other purpose than a medicinal one was a sin. Witness, in answer to questions, said that he entirely disagreed with the statements by Sir Lepel Griffin and other witnesses, to the effect that crime was never induced by opium-smoking. He believed it would be found that many murderers were opium users. He had never known opium used as a preventive of malarial fever.

MR. MICHIE,

a merchant who had resided in various parts of China for forty years, and had mixed in social intercourse with middle-class Chinamen, said that he saw very few cases indeed of the excessive use of opium. The smoking of the drug was an almost universal custom, just the same as tobacco-smoking was in this country, but it was as a rule used in moderation, and then it was not in any way harmful or injurious to health. He denied emphatically that he had ever found Chinamen professing hatred to Englishmen on account of the opium traffic. On the contrary, he believed Englishmen stood better with the Chinese than any other Western people.

This concluded the evidence to be taken in this country. The Commission then rose, Lord Brassey remarking that it would reassemble in Calcutta on November 15.

DORKING CONFERENCE.—The usual convention on the deepening of the spiritual life will be held in this beautiful Surrey town from October 2 to 6. It is stated in the letter of invitation issued by Rev. H. C. Sturdy, that from the four past conventions five missionaries have gone forth to the foreign field. The subject of the Second Advent will receive consideration this year.

THE L.C.M. AT BARNET FAIR.

Again this year, as in the past, the Christian friends at Barnet called to their assistance for this special work the Evangelistic Band of the London City Mission, and right glad were we to join in the battle for the Lord. Ten of us, after preliminary prayer in the Gospel tent, held our first meeting on Saturday evening in the Triangle, close to the church in the High-street. For over two hours crowds of people were attracted, and held both by bright songs of Zion and the earnest, loving appeals of the brethren who, one after another, gave utterance to the "Word of the Lord." Truly was the presence of the Lord manifested, and He made both Word and song equally effective.

But Sunday was the "great day."

Meeting with a few Christian friends in the tent at 10.30 for prayer, at 11 a.m. we went down among the caravans, and, finding a splendid open space backed by the show vans, with the rise into the road before us forming a natural gallery in front of us, and the iron railings of the road at the top, we took advantage of this exceptional position, and so began with harmonium, cornet, and song to give utterance to one of our inspiriting songs. Some twenty or thirty were seated there on our arrival, and shortly immense numbers were added, many of the gipsies seizing the rare opportunity of listening to the Word of God. For a long time there were over 100 at the top standing, leaning on the rails and listening. So with no uncertain sound the Gospel of the grace of God proclaimed to a congregation.

At three we had twenty minutes' singing outside the tent, and so a good tent full were attracted for an hour's service inside, where two brethren gave brief earnest addresses.

At 6.30 the people were drawn in larger numbers, and at seven the tent was crammed; while some 100 or more stood outside to listen. It was a service of power. Closing this service at eight, we left four of our brethren to carry on a second service in the tent; while the rest of us, as arranged, went to the spot near the church occupied the previous night. On reaching this we found the meeting already commenced by Christian friends, who were awaiting our arrival, and then followed a wondrous gathering. It would be no exaggeration to say that 1000 people assembled, and never was a fuller or clearer proclamation of the Gospel made. Earnest appeals, loving invites, God's Word given, warnings uttered, reasonings close and true, followed from lips made eloquent by the Holy Ghost. It was after 9.30 ere this memorable meeting closed, and we went to our rest thoroughly wearied in body, but glad at heart—"a day to be remembered" by every one of us engaged.

Now for the fair proper, which commenced on Monday. For many years the L.C.M. have sent some five or six men for tract distribution and personal intercourse with the men and visitors to the fair. This year this was continued, so that during the Sabbath and three days of the fair about 15,000 booklets, gospels, and tracts were distributed, and in most cases gladly received. Many were the private conversations carried on with drovers, salesmen, show people, and visitors. God alone knows the value of such almost unseen labours as distinguished from the more public work of the Evangelistic Band.

The workers of Sunday were reinforced on Monday, and so for the three days a band of over twenty men were at work. The programme of the three days was the same, so the record of one will serve for all:—2.45. In the tent, for waiting upon God. 3.15. Stand taken at lower entrance to station, and meeting continued till after 5, when we adjourned to our friend (tried and true), Mr. Terry's, for tea. 6.45. Again at work at the same place, adjourning at 8 to the tent; holding here rather more than an hour's service, with brief, pointed, earnest, loving appeal.

Such is the record of each day's work, and we find at the close that during our meetings sixty-two addresses had been given by forty-two different speakers. Who can tell the result of such a wide-cast sowing of the seed of the kingdom? We leave the result in his hand who hath said, "My word shall not return unto Me void." A. Williams.

I OWE MUCH to my parents. Every noble aspiration, every gentle thought I have in my heart, everything that is good in me, I owe to my mother.—Annie S. Swan.

LIVINGSTONE COLLEGE.

It is with very great thankfulness that we are able now to report progress of the new scheme of giving simple medical training to missionaries, which was made public for the first time in the advertisement columns of The Christian in the month of June last.

We ventured to speak of the very great need which in our opinion existed for some such system of training, and our contention has been fully borne out by all whom we have been able to interview on the subject. As far as we have been able to ascertain, the new plan has met with unanimous approval. A large number of medical men have expressed great sympathy with our proposals, and the staff of one of our largest London hospitals appointed a special sub-committee to consider the scheme, with a view to giving us any help in their power, and although they may not be able to give us active help, yet they have shown great interest in the work.

The surgical staff of another hospital have kindly offered to allow our students to attend the practice of that hospital and to give us any help in their power, and, in addition to this, Dr. Milne at Dr. Barnardo's Children's Hospital, and Dr. Manson at the Seamen's Hospital have kindly offered help. With this, and the work of the medical mission, which I shall myself be conducting at Shadwell, we hope that our students will have ample opportunities for practical work.

This practical sympathy shown by members of the medical profession is particularly encouraging, and should give confidence to any who may have doubted the wisdom of such a course of training as that proposed. At the same time the missionary societies are confirming, from their point of view, the need of the college.

The Church Missionary Society during the summer passed a resolution of sympathy with the aims and objects of Livingstone College. The London Missionary Society have only just passed a resolution warmly approving of the scheme, and saying that "they believe the college as described in the preliminary statement will supply a long-felt need, and provide a course of training of which the London Missionary Society will often be glad to avail itself." The secretaries of the Wesleyan Missionary Society, the Baptist Missionary Society, Moravian Missions, the South American Missionary Society, the Friends' Foreign Missionary Society, and others have expressed themselves as in cordial sympathy with the proposed work, and believed that it would be useful to their men. We have not, however, heard from these last as to the opinion of their committees, though we are expecting to hear from them.

Dr. Maxwell, Mr. Hudson Taylor, and other medical missionaries have expressed their approval of our proposals, and believe that we may supply a long-felt want.

But perhaps our greatest encouragement has come from the young men who may take advantage of the course themselves. Both at Oxford and Cambridge, and at the students' camp at Keswick, I had the opportunity of speaking with the men about Livingstone College, and it is evident that in the new course of training a need will be supplied which has been realised for some time past. We hope to begin work on October 5, with a little band of eight men, who have entered for the first year's course.

On very many hands we have been asked to admit ladies to our college, and it is possible that before very long arrangements may be made for giving the same course to ladies, but at present we cannot make any definite statement on this point beyond saying that it is the desire of the council to offer the same advantages to ladies when it can be arranged.

Mrs. Bishop, the great traveller, wrote to me a few weeks ago, saying how glad she would have been to enter for such a course had it been available when she was many years younger.

With so much encouragement we go forward with great hopes for the future, and we feel sure that our friends will not allow us to be hindered by the lack of the necessary funds which are required for the start. We have determined not to incur debt, and we can, therefore, only advance as far as our resources may permit us. Will all join in prayer that the work may be richly blessed of God, and prove a real source of usefulness in the great work of the evangelisation of the world? We may still be able to admit a few more students, but they should at once make application to me. All others who wish for information with regard to admission to the college, or other particulars, should write to me at the address given below.

WORK IN KENTISH HOP GARDENS.

Again God has enabled me to go amongst the hop-pickers in Kent. I found many of the same people in the gardens this season as last year, and my heart was touched at their manifestation of pleasure at work carried on for them again in the Edenbridge district. The ground had been well prepared by Rev. D. Smith and other friends, and the harvest was ripe for gathering in.

A meeting was held each evening in the "Gospel Tent," which had been erected in the midst of the encampment; it was a cheering sight to see the people eagerly hurrying into the tent. Last year there was one man who would not attend any of the meetings and baffled all attempts to get him in; to our great joy he was down again this year and was brought by the Spirit of God into the meetings and decided for Christ. It had been a great struggle, a life spent in sin, careless and indifferent to God's love and warning, one can imagine the terrible struggle there was, but when the all-conquering Christ had captured this rough heart there was indeed a glorious change.

One dear old lady, a gipsy, came night after night to the meetings, and her face was a picture: her beautiful dark eyes sparkled at the name of Christ, and her features were a true index of the power within; she had been a follower of Christ for some years.

Our meetings at Hever Lodge, Edenbridge, were brought to a close sooner than we expected, as some of the hops were not ready to be picked, and many of the pickers had to go away. Our tent too, was blown down during a severe thunderstorm. Our last meetings were held in the open-air, and will be long remembered as times of great blessing.

It would be a great help to the work if a tent could be purchased for the missions, instead of hiring one every year. Fifty pounds would be needed; any friends willing to help can get information from Rev. D. Smith, Edenbridge.

TO CHRISTIAN FARMERS.

Dear Sir,—I wish to thank some unknown kind friend for sending me this last year or two a copy of The Christian. It is hailed with delight, not only by myself and family, but by the settlers among whom I circulate them. In these rural districts we get but little of such teaching and information as The Christian affords us.

I take this opportunity of making known to any Christian farmers who may be readers of your columns the spiritual wants of many of the agricultural districts of our colony. There are many places where the people get no religious services; others have such privileges fortnightly, monthly, or quarterly, there being not sufficient population to support a minister, nor any among them with a gift for ministry.

This want could be supplied by a few godly farmers, who may have a gift for Gospel work, and a desire to use it for the Lord, coming to the colony and taking up their abode among these settlers. I am sure, from nearly ten years' experience in carrying the message of the Saviour's love amongst them in different districts, they would be heartily received, and treated with that hospitality for which the rural population are proverbial.

As to the bread that perisheth, plenty of farming land is to be had from the Government on terms to suit everybody. The climate for farming is all that can be desired. Any industrious farmer with a little capital could soon make a comfortable home; at the same time service for the Lord would bring peace and joy to the soul, and blessing to the people among whom he may labour.

I do not persuade anyone, neither do I undertake any responsibility. I simply state facts, and suggest a remedy. I am willing to give any further information to anyone wanting it.—Yours truly,

J. Burgoyne.

WORK IN BASUTOLAND.

Dear Sir,—Perhaps you would be interested by a few details concerning the work in which I am engaged in Basutoland. I am working in behalf of the Paris Evangelical Mission Society. On first coming out, four years ago, I was entrusted with the founding of a new station in the north of this country, in an entirely heathen district. After I had completed the preliminary work of founding the missionary station and several out-stations with native catechists and day schools, my wife's health rendered a change necessary, and our Conference removed me to my present station, in the centre of Basutoland.

The district consists of about 10,000 inhabitants, 730 of whom are church members, and over 300 catechumens. We have six out-stations, seven native catechists, nine native schoolmasters, and six schools, one of which has 200 pupils.

In this part of the country the Gospel is more or less accepted and respected by the majority of the inhabitants. At the same time they remain perfect heathens, given up to all their superstitions and customs, to their immoral lives also. The chiefs set the first example. Here, at Makeneng, a few hundred yards from our church, is our young Chief, eldest son of the paramount chief of Basutoland, a decided and almost an open enemy of the Gospel.

It would strike a visitor as a strange contrast, coming out from one of our well-attended Sunday services, from a full chapel, the beautiful rendering by two or three hundred voices of one of our hymns, were he then to climb to the chief's village, so near at hand, there to witness all the rude signs of heathenism, the coarse language, and, very often, the indecent dances.

Such contrasts are frequent in the mission fields, as they are, indeed, in our European cities. For, alas! we must acknowledge it with shame, a white heathen is even worse than his black brother.

Yours sincerely in Christ Jesus,

Alfred Casalis.

HONG KONG.

This pretty little British colony, an Eastern centre of Western civilisation, political influence, and commerce, is also a centre of Christian effort and of missionary enterprise. All this is well known in England, but it is pleasant to be able to report that the various agencies, which exist specially for the purpose of spreading a knowledge of the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ, are accomplishing the work for which they are supported by the Churches at home. C.M.S. work appears very substantial and effective. Its workers include some most enthusiastic and devoted men and women, and their methods and measures appear wise and suitable. Errors of judgment occur of course, and when they are recognised no one regrets it more than the workers themselves. Miss Johnston's excellent girls' school work, carried on in the name of the Society for Female Education in the East, but closely affiliated with the C.M.S., flourishes.

The Seamen's Mission, under Rev. A. G. Goldsmith, is doing a very useful work, and is a power for good amongst the many mariners who visit this well-frequented port. The soldiers are not forgotten, and they have every opportunity of learning of Jesus and his power to keep them in the midst of all their temptations, if they wish to do so. Many other agencies are at work, some locally, others mainly amongst the heathen, in various districts of Southern China.

Looking broadly at the missionary work carried on in China, while there are difficulties, dangers, and discouragements to be faced, yet blessing and victory has been vouchsafed in the past, and without any doubt will be so in the future, in proportion to the power working in and through the workers. The Word of Truth is being widely disseminated, and the Word of Truth does not return unto the God of Truth without performing that which He desires. Much fruit is permitted to be seen, but doubtless there is much more which exists, but is not visible. The visible result may be small compared with the visible need, but it is amply sufficient to stir up sentiments of gratitude for the past and hope for the future. The greatest need is, not so much for more workers, as for those who are here to be filled with the Spirit.

MR. MOODY INTERVIEWED.

To a representative of The Chicago Record, a daily paper of large circulation, Mr. Moody has lately imparted many interesting facts and opinions relating to present movements in Chicago. Answering a question with reference to preaching in the streets, Mr. Moody said :—

"I have always found the police in Chicago ready to do their duty. While I believe in open-air meetings and preaching the Gospel wherever it can be preached wisely, I do not believe it is right to obstruct public thoroughfares or to hold meetings where the people who own or lease the property object. I believe obedience to the golden rule would solve the difficulty. My sympathies are with the police when they try to keep the streets clear for the purpose for which they exist and to suppress disorder."

"What has your experience taught you as to the best methods of evangelisation?"

"It would take a long time to answer that question fully. Briefly, the preaching of the simple Gospel in the power of the Holy Ghost and coming in actual contact with the people. The work is varied, and great is the variety of men needed for it. We need scholarly evangelists and evangelists who have come out from the common people, but every man to succeed must have common sense, an unblemished character, consecration, large sympathies, love for his fellow-men, faith, patience, enterprise, energy, familiarity with the Word of God and the baptism of the Holy Ghost."

"What, in your judgment, is the greatest need of Chicago and of the country?"

"The old Gospel."

"So far as you have had opportunities of observing, is there as yet much actual suffering among the poor of Chicago?"

"I have had very little opportunity to observe personally, but I fear there is much distress. By far the greater part of it comes from intemperance, improvidence, and laziness."

"Do you think the unemployed, who are unusually numerous now, are likely to better their condition by such demonstrations as they have made of late?"

"No. Such demonstrations injure trade, shake public confidence, and cause money to be hoarded up, thus causing great stringency and distress, which falls more heavily upon the working class than any other."

"What advice would you give them?"

"First of all, to seek the kingdom of God and his righteousness, believing his promise, which I never knew to fail, that all things will be added unto them. Second, to pray to God for work. Third, to be as patient as possible during these times of hardship. Fourth, to look earnestly for work. Fifth, to take any honest employment that offers itself. Sixth, to study economy. I think one of the great needs of our country is that the labouring men should own their own homes.

"What these men want is not charity, but an opportunity to earn an honest living. Charity is degrading, employment is elevating. No self-respecting man wishes charity. Give him a chance to work, and he will support himself and family, and, at the same time, preserve his self-respect."

THE COWBOY PREACHER and his wife (Mr. and Mrs. Rice) have been arrested several times for street preaching in Chicago on the plea of obstruction, their meetings being very largely attended. Their demand at last to be tried by jury has resulted in their acquittal. Such arrests are now becoming frequent, some of Mr. Moody's students having also experienced difficulty. The public press is calling attention to the fact that only Protestant preachers are thus molested. The American Free Speech League has taken up the matter, and is determined to break up this persecution.

DISTINCTIONS.—Steal a chicken, and you are a thief; steal 1000 dollars from your employer, and you are an embezzler; steal 5000 dollars from the Government, and you are a defaulter; rob your competitor on the Stock Exchange of 10,000 dollars, and you are a financier; rob him of 100,000 dollars to 500,000 dollars, and you are a wizard or a Napoleon of finance; wreck a railroad and gather it in, and you are a "magnate"; wreck a great railroad system, and you are a "railroad king"; conduct a "negotiation" by which a strong nation plunders a weak nation of thousands upon thousands of square miles of territory and makes the weak nation pay milliards of money indemnity for the wrong it has suffered, and you are a diplomat. A MINISTERS' QUIET DAY.

REV. F. B. MEYER, the president of the Baptist Ministers' Prayer Union, invited the Baptist Ministers of London and the neighbourhood to a quiet day at Christ Church last week. About a hundred assembled at noon, including a few clergymen and ministers of other denominations specially invited.

"I am glad," said Mr. Meyer, reading and commenting on Mark iii. 6—15, "that we meet within the sound of the busy line of London. 'They pressed upon him.' That pressure, how awful we often feel it to be, how heavily do the people around us press us with their needs and their sorrows. We feel the pressing of the great life of London against the walls of this Church. Yet who would care to live his life in such a world of this if men did not press upon him? What more sad than to go on day by day with no one coming to lay on you the burden of his care and his sin? Yet there must be times of withdrawal."

There were but two set addresses at the morning meeting, and they were both short, one by Rev. J. R. Wood, of Holloway, on Christ's judgment of his people because of their imperfect works (Rev. iii. 2), and the other by Rev. W. R. Skerry, of Camberwell, on "The Peace of Christ."

At two o'clock a simple cold lunch was provided, prepared by some of the ladies of the congregation. A few words were spoken by Dr. James Spurgeon and Rev. Duncan Macgregor, of Dunoon, on behalf of the Scotch members of the Prayer Union, and there were some very frank utterances from Mr. Meyer himself. To the afternoon and evening meetings the wives of ministers were invited, and a good many responded. In the afternoon the only formal address was by Rev. W. Williams, of Upton Chapel, on the 'Demonstration of the Spirit.' Revs. George Wainwright, of Bournemouth, John Wilson, of Woolwich, James Mursell, of Derby, and D. Macgregor, of Dunoon, responded to Mr. Meyer's appeal that 'Two or three brothers should, in a few minutes each, tell us of any special demonstration of the Spirit that they have witnessed in their life or their ministry.' Mr. Meyer followed on with testimony and appeal on the same subject. During tea an informal discussion took place in regard to a proposal of Mr. Meyer to hold a monthly devotional meeting of ministers in London. After tea there was a gathering in the church for the Lord's Supper. Rev. F. C. Spurr gave a short address on being alone with Jesus.

During the day a fraternal message of sympathy and prayerful interest was sent to Mr. Thomas Spurgeon, who has since replied in very cordial terms.

THE Y.M.C.A.

THE call for the Young Men's Christian Association Congress, in connection with the Columbian Exposition, will be issued soon.

Mr. Thomas Moffett, who has for many years taken a prominent part in connection with Y.M.C.A. work in Newcastle-on-Tyne, has undertaken the secretaryship of the Leeds Y.M.C.A.

The Newton Abbot Association has suffered a considerable loss by the death of its hon. sec., Mr. N. Perry, who was a very devoted worker. Mr. H. G. C. Bishop has accepted office as his successor.

Amongst other interesting engagements during the ensuing quarter at the Aldersgate-street Association will be a series of lectures or Bible studies by Rev. Canon Girdlestone, M.A., probably on the inspiration of the Bible.

In the Dundee Institute a few days ago, Mr. S. J. Celestine Edwards delivered a lecture on "The Racial War in the Southern States." A resolution was passed, expressing indignant condemnation of the wrongs which are being inflicted upon Afro-Americans in the Southern States.

Sergt.-Major Morris, gen. sec. at Croydon, has conducted a very successful mission in connection with the junior branch at Sheffield. The attendances on each of the ten days varied from 120 to 250, and it is believed that much good has been done. A week-night boys' Bible-class has been formed, as the outcome of the mission.

The Open-Air Mission in connection with the Devonport Association has had a most successful season. The meetings—both in the streets of the town and in the outlying hamlets—have been characterised by marked attention on the part of large crowds, while the attendance of workers has been invariably great.

The Trowbridge Association Rambling Club concluded a successful season by an excursion to Westbury. They were conducted over the iron works by Mr. Tennear, who explained the working, from the digging of the ore to the production of the finished article, an interesting sight being the tapping of one of the furnaces, and the running of about thirty-five tons of molten metal into the moulds.

The organ of the Melbourne Association says:—"There never was a time when the work demanded men, strong with faith and having power with God, as to-day. We need additions to our working force in all departments. The work also demands a leader, and the Board of Management are seeking both here and abroad (in the old world as well as the new) for an efficient general secretary."

Mr. J. B. Martin, who has been an active Christian worker in connection with the Adelaide (South Australia) Association, has been accepted for work in connection with the Zambesi Industrial Mission. Three more members of the same Association, Messrs. R. W. Middleton, A. Biggs, and W. Fleming, are studying at Belair, under Rev. Lockhart Morton, with a view of proceeding to China as missionaries.

IRISH NOTES.

REV. J. HARRISON, of Arklow, while preaching last week in the open air at Courtown Harbour, was struck with a stone on the forehead and seriously hurt.

Rev. Dr. Hall, of New York, has sailed from Queenstown for America, after spending his holiday in this country, where he preached with great power several times during his brief stay.

The Belfast City Mission has grown so much of late that it has taken a new departure, and has rented the Ulster Hall, the largest public building in the city, for evangelistic addresses to the masses on Sunday evenings.

A most impressive convention has been held at Drimoleague, co. Cork, a place which was visited a few years ago with one of the most remarkable revivals which has occurred in the South of Ireland in modern times. Lady Carbery and Captain Townshend took part in the proceedings.

AN evangelistic mission conducted during the past week in Carlisle Memorial Church, Belfast, by Rev. Thos. Waugh, has come to a close. The services were attended night after night by about 2000 persons, and many professed to decide for Christ. Mr. Jno. Anderson, of Dundee, has held in Cromac-square Mission Mall, Belfast, a very successful Gospel Mission, and similar services have been held at Portadown by Messrs. Beech and Griffin, of the Mission Car "Peace."

SCOTTISH NOTES.

AN unsectarian aggressive evangelistic work is carried on in Ashley Hall, Castle Douglas, on Tuesday and Friday nights, and open-air meetings on Sabbath. Mr. and Mrs. Dobie, with other workers, conduct meetings at intervals in the outlying villages.

Bible-classes are being resumed all over the country, and to the teaching of them ministers are devoting themselves with more earnestness year by year. In all the Presbyterian churches there is now a committee of assembly, who have charge of this work, and help it forward by giving out subjects of study and offering prizes.

In several of the Glasgow newspapers there have been appearing recently articles calling upon the churches to institute conferences of ministers and Christian workers of all Evangelical churches, for the purpose of discovering how the spiritual needs of our great cities can most efficiently be met. This is a healthy sign, and much good would undoubtedly result from such brotherly conferences.

At their last monthly meeting in Glasgow the board of the National Bible Society of Scotland agreed to call the attention of the Foreign Office to the disturbed state of the Hu provinces of China, with a view to the better protection of British subjects resident in the interior. Two of the society's agents in Kiang-si and Kwang-Si had been assaulted. It was reported that twenty-seven men had been added to the staff of colporteurs employed in Japan by the three Bible Societies, bringing the number up to over 110.

A series of six lectures has been arranged to take place during the coming winter, to which the boys attending a number of Edinburgh schools are specially invited. The lectures will be delivered by well-known missionaries, who have laboured in different parts of the world, and they will tell about their own work and experiences in the foreign mission field. The lectures will be delivered once a month during the winter session, on Friday evenings, in the Free Assembly Hall. Among the lecturers will be Dr. Harry Grattan Guinness, Rev. W. Ewing, of Palestine, Rev. R. Wright Hay, Dr. Macfarlane, of New Guinea, and others.

Letters to the Editor.

A SUGGESTION.

Dear Sir,—May I suggest that a fund be raised to aid poor evangelists in time of sickness, to give temporary relief when needed, and to provide a small annuity for old age? Perhaps some of the Lord's people to whom He has given wealth will start such a fund, which I am sure will be of great and lasting benefit to these, his servants, many of whom have but slender means.—Yours truly,

A Sympathiser.

EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE.

Dear Sir,—There is a paragraph in your last issue over the initials "J.E.B.M," and which is indexed as "The Evangelical Alliance" (page 10), and conveys a wrong impression. Our council will be much obliged if you will state in your next issue that the paragraph containing summary of the programme for the Chicago Conference should have been headed "The United States Evangelical Alliance."

Yours truly,

7, Adam-street, Strand. A. J. Arnold.

"GET THEE BEHIND ME, SATAN."

Sir,—In your issue of Sept. 7, there is a passage which seems to imply that when the believer realises the seductive influences of the great adversary, he may make use of the above expression of our Lord's. May I venture to suggest that for this there is no Scripture warrant? Surely, when the Master saw the working of Satan in Peter, his principal object was to protect Peter, and so by ordering Satan behind Him, the Lord stood between him and Peter.

Again, when in Jude we read about Michael the Archangel contending with the devil about the body of Moses, he durst not bring against him any railing accusation, and high and powerful as the Archangel may be, he evidently could not himself cope with the god of this world, but said, "The Lord rebuke thee." Let us also in our conflicts make use of the same prayer.—Very sincerely yours,

Alex. H. Hutchinson.

GIVING OR GETTING.

Dear Sir,—Your sketch of the late Mr. J. D. Allcroft leads me to send you my experience of him. A total stranger, last March I called by appointment upon him at Lancaster-gate and asked him to help toward the purchase of this Cottage. Immediately he questioned, "How much do you want?" "£25." "Let me write you a cheque for it at once."

While he wrote it I made some remark of how joyful it was that he could, and good of him that he did, help thus generously. He put his pen down and looked piercingly up. "You make a mistake. It is no generosity. I am certain, by years of experience, that I am not one penny the poorer for anything I have ever been able to give. What is called giving is getting when it concerns God's work."

The words seem too valuable to keep to myself. Afterwards, as in his courtesy he let me out himself, he thanked me for coming, and his last words were, "Mind, come again, if not before, next year, and let me renew."—With kind regards, believe me, yours sincerely, Annie N. Price.

"ONE BY ONE."

Dear Sir,—I am thankful to record that over three hundred little "One by One" books have been distributed by me since my letter to you a month ago. Some who have received them appear to be under the impression that they cannot hold the book unless they join the "One by One Band." Will you allow me to state that that is a wrong impression? I shall be glad, upon the receipt of one penny stamp and the address, to send the book to any person who desires to win souls to Christ.

I am sure many of your readers would unite with me in praising God, if they read some of the letters I have received from those who, while busily engaged in the concerns of this life, long to know the joy of soul-winning, and from others who, following Jesus, are learning the art of "making disciples." Two write: "At the beginning of the year we commenced your plan and have been greatly blessed. Our faith has been strengthened. We were led to search the Scriptures for promises and evidence of God's faithfulness. This has been a delightful study, and the Holy Spirit has given us new light and life." One writes: "I am so glad to say that I have begun to work upon the 'One by One' principle, and some have already been saved." Another: "For some time I have definitely prayed for individuals daily, and have had definite answers." One writes: "I have just been appointed leader of a class of young women, and find your 'One by One' plan just what I want, to get them to work on definite lines for the salvation of others."

Most Christians need to cultivate the habit of personal intercession, and to do this requires application, method, and thought which my little book helps to do. We are saved to glorify God in saving others. This is the duty of every Christian! Perish the thought that it belongs only to ministers, and that the proper time to do it is only in special meetings!

Yours in Christ Jesus,

Thomas Hogben.

WHOM WILL YOU HELP?

Dear Sir,—The remark was made in a Times leader some time since, "This is an age of associations, in which kindness is cut up into shreds, and distributed in the shape of guinea subscriptions to public institutions. What England wants more than anything else is a revival of spontaneous and intelligent personal agency for all the purposes of Christian charity." This is as true to-day as ever. The appeals to public generosity from innumerable societies, more or less excellent, are so constant that the charitably-disposed are somewhat bewildered. It is at all times desirable that the recipients of help should have a personal knowledge of those who have their interest at heart.

Emigration or colonisation has long been advocated as a relief for the misery of the unemployed in this over-populated country; the question is, however, frequently asked, Have colonisation schemes been successful? I can only say that when properly supervised they have been uniformly so. I will not attempt to discuss this matter; my object is to show a way by which people may have the answer in their own hands. How can those desiring help be brought into touch with those willing to assist them?

Having given considerable attention to this subject and lectured in many parts of this country, I continually receive applications from all classes of workers. Some of these would make ideal colonists. By remaining at home they can only look forward to a life of semi-starvation and misery and be dependent upon the poor rates, which must thereby become greatly increased. I can supply the names and addresses of families, large and small, also single individuals, male and female, needing and deserving help. I have at the present moment some scores of cases I am quite unable, for lack of funds, to assist. I shall be glad to hear from anyone wishing further details and ready to assist in this direct way.

The winter is coming on, and the prospects both in the agricultural and town districts are painful to contemplate. From the agricultural districts there will be streaming into London the needy and distressed labourer, swelling the ranks of the unemployed, and coming under many evil influences. If each reader would bring to one individual or family the Gospel of a brighter home thousands would be made glad, and in their new homes the name of their benefactor or benefactress become a household word. I am preparing to send a personally-conducted party to New Zealand about the latter end of October if circumstances permit, but little can be done without the aid of the benevolent, whose money advanced can be largely secured on the land taken over for settlers. I await correspondence.—Yours sincerely,

J. E. Cracknell.

A NATURAL CURE.

Sir,—The perusal of an article in your issue of July 6, "The Fever-Stricken Missionary," incites me irresistibly to beg that you will allow one who has lived for years in a tropical country, and endured its worst fevers, to put before your readers the simplest remedy of nature which is effectual in subduing the severest cases of fever. "It has been said that these fever-martyrs need not have died," is more true than the author of these words imagined, for they died through the ignorance of the irresistible power that nature possesses of overcoming disease.

I have no medicinal remedy or treatment to advertise. It will be enough to say that certain European missionaries located on the deadly Gold Coast of Africa, Dar-es-Salaam, etc., gratefully certify that the natural cure enables them to live in the most deadly climate without fear of fever, etc. I will not here give a description of this most simple method of self-cure, for the details would only provoke the pitying smile of incredulity from those who imagine that they are fully acquainted with all the laws that govern the physiological processes of the internal organs and tissues of the body.

Please to understand that I have not the least personal interest in placing this matter before your readers, neither am I writing with the object of promoting any other person's interest. I am only most deeply anxious that those living in deadly climates should benefit as I myself have benefited, and as many others in this country have benefited. I do not write this for the benefit of the general public, from whom I do not expect the perseverance, patience, and self-denial which are necessary in carrying out the method of treatment so thoroughly as not only to restore a state of health, but also to invigorate the constitution in a remarkable degree, even though living in a feverish climate. It is marvellous how even a quarter of an hour of this treatment reduces the temperature of the fever-stricken body, and opens the pores of the skin in cases where every known febrifuge and medical treatment has completely failed.

Not further to occupy your space, let me beg of any missionary whose eye may meet this letter, to write to Messrs. Williams and Norgate, publishers, London, for a copy of "Kuhne's New Science of Healing" (7s.), and to suspend all hasty judgments until they have thoroughly studied this theory and the facts innumerable that will be placed before them. Then, if that does not suffice, let them address, Herr Louis Kuhne, 24, Flossplatz, Leipzig, Germany. Let the fullest investigation be made of all the results of this treatment in the cases of missionaries living in Africa, America, India, China, etc. I assert what I know, what I have seen, what I have proved. Should not that outweigh mere opinion?

This method of treatment not only overcomes fever, but its systematic use keeps the body delightfully cool and vigorous in the hottest climates of the world, and it costs nothing but perseverance and a little self-denial.—Yours faithfully,

A Friend of Missionaries.

WORK IN KANSUH.

Dear Sir,—I have just read the letter under the above heading in your issue of the 14th, and wish briefly to draw attention to two points,

1. The writer's name is Horobin not Horsburgh.

2. Contributions either for the general fund of the Mission, or for any special branch of its work, should be addressed to the Secretaries of the Mission, and not to me by name.

Mr. Horobin has given my name in virtue of the office until recently held by me as the financial secretary of the mission. I have, however, just resigned that post preparatory to returning to China, to undertake work of a similar nature in connection with the Mission.

May I venture to ask the prayers of your readers for my wife and myself in this undertaking, after seventeen years of absence from the field; and also for our younger children who accompany us, and the older ones whom we leave in England for the present? We are hoping to sail by P and O. steamer Japan, on October 7, accompanied by Mrs. Gray-Owen, and two children, returning, and ten sisters newly going out. So we shall be a goodly band. Other parties have preceded, and more will follow, for whom prayer will be valued (2 Thess. iii. 1, 2).

Faithfully yours,

Charles T. Fishe,

China Inland Mission, 2, Pyrland-road, London, N., September 16.

REQUESTS FOR PRAYER.—For blessing on a mission at Renfrew, and a fortnight's meetings to be held at New City-road, Glasgow, by Mr. R. McLean, commencing October 8th.—For an eight days' mission by Mr. William Forbes, at Tunbridge Wells, to commence on Sunday, 24th.—That the ministry of the new Vicar of St. Thomas', Lambeth (Rev. J. B. Barraclough), may be "in the fulness of the blessing of the Gospel of Christ."—For a mission at All Saints', Belfast, conducted by Rev. Dr. Morris, September 24 to October 24.—For a blessing on a mission to men only, by Mr. W. R. Lane, in the Hall of the Dublin Y.M.C.A., from Sept. 29 to Oct. 8 inclusive.—For blessing on the Gospel preached in the Great Assembly Hall, London, during October, by Mr. John M. Scroggie.

ROMAN CATHOLIC BIGOTRY IN MADAGASCAR.—Emily Sims, writing from Arivonimamo to The Friend, says:—"The meeting-house in the village here is not the success we should like it to be. The Roman Catholic priest tries his utmost to hinder the work. I am astonished at the lies such men can tell. He has a large picture in his room of 'Satan throwing the Protestants into a lake of fire.' All the Malagasy who visit him are asked into this room. He soon draws their attention to the picture, and tells them if they go to our place of worship they will be served like that. Some are ignorant enough to believe all he tells them: others ask him a few questions, and find out for themselves his bigotry. The children belonging to his school are very ignorant. Three of the children from his school have joined H. Deane's classes here, and two of them have lately given their hearts to the Saviour. We are glad to say that both boys and girls in the station school here have decided to serve Jesus. Four of our servants are true Christians."

The Christian.

☞ It is particularly requested that all letters relating to business matters should be addressed to the firm, Messrs. Morgan and Scott, and not to individual members. Notes and Comments.

NEXT week we purpose giving portrait and sketch of Rev. MATSUNA OKUNO, Christian Worker in Yokohama, Japan.

While the monumental biography of Mr. Spurgeon is being awaited, narratives of his life and work are finding many readers. The reception accorded to Rev. James Douglas's volume THE PRINCE OF PREACHERS was very cordial, and the "sketch, portraiture, and tribute" which it gives has, it is gratifying to know, been inspiring to many. Doubtless there will be a large accession of readers now that, in addition to the bound editions, there is an unabridged issue, in attractive paper covers, at the popular price of one shilling. (Morgan & Scott.)

The opinion seems to be universal that we shall have hard times this winter; London will probably suffer the most. The organisation of labour presses the unskilled labourer out into the cold, yet men come crowding into the city as if it were the land of promise. If the farmers can succeed during this fine weather in getting their land ploughed and the seed in, they will dismiss a large number of their labourers, and things will be worse than ever. The coal strike has cost us some millions, and will probably drive more men to London.

What are we to do to meet the impending want? Mr. John Burns, M.P., has given some of his views to The Westminster Gazette:—

Don't create new industries, or plant farm colonies, or open municipal workshops. You will merely increase the genuine unemployed. You will draw off honest men from their own industries by competing against them with low-class labour, while these labourers, already of a low and degraded type, increase one another's degradation by association.

Mr. Burns thinks that the "ruffians of the casual ward will convert the farm colony into a rural penitentiary. Labour colonies, to be really effective, must be disciplined and organised on a prison labour basis, with penal discipline. Municipal workshops will produce goods for which there is no demand. If there were there would be no unemployed."

The remedy for our impending troubles seems to be of no use this year: it is to keep back as much work as possible for the winter. The Battersea Vestry and the London County Council keep their work as far as possible for the winter months, and adapt their work to the exigencies of the outside labour market. The vestry have decided to employ nearly exclusively men over forty, "leaving the younger unmarried men to shift with the private employer." Mr. Burns is of opinion that men over forty are much better workmen than youngsters for certain work, as they have settled habits and steady ways.

Above all, men of work and action are wanted, not Utopians. But, beyond this, reduce the hours on trams, 'buses, railways, and all industries. Abolish overtime, eliminate the middleman, kill piece and task work, fight the permanent official, and make him so arrange the country's work that the average day will be the maximum, and, if this were done, much relief would come.

How much these and other prescriptions which are offered sound like the experimental treatment of symptoms while the cause remains untouched. "Give the king thy judgments, O God, and thy righteousness unto the King's Son. He shall judge thy people with righteousness, and thy poor with judgment." "Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly."

One of the most striking features of the magazines for September is the number of articles bearing on the future of the world. The possibility of a union between England and America; the ultimate destiny of mankind in the formation of the United States of the world; the Chinese Conquest of Europe; a dream of a Puritan Rome; how London was destroyed; how the world will end, are their subjects. As sub-sections of the theme, we have "The Doom of the Man Clerk" and "The Engine of the Future." The craving to draw aside the veil which hides the future, the determination to reason our way into the unknown, or to dream ourselves into it, never leaves us until we learn that our work lies in "to-day," and that we have to "walk by faith." True, there is a wise ordering of our steps according to the light of truth and of great principles—this is faith—and so guided we may "see afar off." But a good deal of the matter we have referred to has more guessing than guidance in it.

And yet we have our present position clearly marked in our inspired Chart. The times of the Gentiles began with Nebuchadnezzar, to whom God committed the royal prerogative in its highest form: "Thou art this head of gold." The rulers did not rule in the fear of God, but oppressed the people. Therefore the royal prerogative declined through each successive kingdom, the Kings becoming less and the People more—the metal degenerating from gold to earthenware—and now we have, not royal prerogative, but "Government for the People by the People"! If one man cannot govern, can a million govern? If one cannot drive the coach, can ten? If the Captain has proved incompetent or tyrannical, can the crew and passengers navigate the ship?

The rule of God is absolute, autocratic, despotic. And we pray "Thy Kingdom come!" The absolutism, the autocracy, the despotism of infinite love, infinite wisdom, infinite power. "How long, O Despot, holy and true?" cry the martyred souls beneath the altar. He which testifieth these things saith, "Surely I come quickly. Amen. Even so, come, Lord Jesus." That we are in the last days of the Times of the Gentiles is as certain as that Europe is north of the Equator, or that the sun is in the heavens.

The earthenware is not better than the gold. The remedy for the misrule of kings is not the rule of the people. Not quantity but quality is the first necessity in government. The remedy for Nebuchadnezzar is not King Demos but King Jesus. Not the first but the fourth of the four kingdoms—whose axiom is Vox populi, vox Dei—is preeminently "dreadful and terrible and strong exceedingly," which "devours the whole earth, breaks it in pieces, and stamps the residue with its feet." Witness America and Australia, India and Burmah, Cochin China and Siam; witness the partition of Africa; witness the disappearance of aboriginal races; witness the down-treading of nations into the mire by the drink and opium traffic; by slavery still rampant under euphemistic names; by legalised vice; by merchandise of the bodies and souls of men.

Long has the cry gone up, "How long, O Despot, holy and true?" Soon earth and heaven will ring with the reply, "Alleluia! Salvation and glory, and honour and power, unto the Lord our God. For true and righteous are his judgments." And they shall bring the glory and honour of the emancipated nations into the city where Jesus reigns as King.

And peace, for war is needless;
And rest, for toil is past;
And goal from tired labour;
And anchorage at last.

Evangelical members of the Church of England will not be alone in welcoming Rev. Charles Hole's endeavours to furnish, by means of brief memoirs, "a biographical account of the eighteenth-century revival in the Church of England." The first contribution to this enterprise is a memoir of REV. BENJAMIN JENKS, rector of Harley, Salop, born 1646, died 1724, a Christian of learning and faith, conviction and courage. (3d. A. Bachhoffner, 62, High-street, Clapham.) Mr. Hole's design is to popularise knowledge concerning men who, to use his own words, "in many difficulties and discouragements, under some obloquy, and not without their share of imperfections, reasserted the Evangelical principles on which the Church of England stood reformed and established, at a period when they had come to be obscured, ignored, or flatly denied." We trust these memoirs, which are at once succinct and instructive, will have a large circulation, and be influential of much good.

Rev. C. C. Starbuck says in The Andover Review, that the Protestant missions in the German colonies, especially in Africa, are now in danger at the hands of their Protestant governors, who are endeavouring to make them the instruments of Government policy. They want the missionaries to put two things in the foreground: first, to preach the supreme authority of the Kaiser first, last, and midmost; second, to teach the negroes that the chief end for which they were created was to work for the white men. After that, they may give attention to the things of the Gospel. This will prove a harassing and hindering influence to the missionaries, and such governors will prove a terrible stumbling-block to the heathen. The experience is not new in the mission field. And although Englishmen may not be so openly intimidated or bribed, indirectly of course, in some parts they have had, and have still, their trials from political influences.

The American Catholic Quarterly Review is very jubilant on the subject of "Our Converts," which, out of a Catholic population of 14,000,000, is estimated at 700,000; these are "the glorious and triumphant gains of the Church from the Protestant sects." Few converts are claimed to have been made from the ranks of infidelity, atheism, deism, and other schools rejecting Christianity.

The Protestant sects, those professing Christianity and struggling for the light of truth to the best of their opportunities, have yielded up to the Church, from the bosom of error, this goodly army of sincere and devout Catholics.

The names of the most notable of the converts are given. Many of them have attained to high rank in the priesthood. Per contra, it would be interesting to know what the losses of the Church have been, for 14,000,000 seems not a large number when compared with the immigration of Catholics from all the countries of Europe for many a decade. Is it true that by the third generation the Church has lost all these? Then again, there is much significance in the fact that the gains are not from the outside world, from the secret or open enemies of Christianity. Romanism is powerless against them.

The following verses are samples of those sung at a recent Romish procession through the streets of London:—

"Faith of our fathers! Mary's prayers
Shall win our country back to thee;
And through the truth that comes from God England shall then indeed be free."

. . . . . .

"Oh! when shall we gaze on
Her glory restored?
Oh! when will poor England
Return to her Lord?

"Behold in St. Paul's
The sweet Mother replaced,
And Westminster now with Her image is graced."

Those who have been labouring to re-introduce into the churches emblems and ornaments banished at the Reformation, will surely find in the concluding stanza, just quoted, a word of warning. Whatever be their idea in bringing back such symbols, Rome stands ready enough to claim the restoration as an important gain for her own ends.

Among the interesting tokens in the East, not the least significant is the activity in the Holy Land itself. Many signs of awakening from the long sleep of centuries are to be observed. The following paragraph, from the Pall Mall Gazette of Friday, supplies a good illustration:—

Palestine has apparently been delivered over to the engineers. No sooner is the Jaffa-Jerusalem Railway completed than a proposal is made to construct a port at Jaffa, and a firm at Constantinople is already negotiating with the Porte for the concession. The construction of the Acre-Haifa-Damascus railway is advancing, and within a few years trains will, in all probability, run by the banks of the Jordan and along the shore of the Sea of Galilee, while steamers ply on the lake itself. Even Boyrah is threatened with a branch line. At Jaffa another engineering work is in contemplation. The British Consul at Jerusalem sends the report of the local Government engineer on a scheme for irrigating the orange gardens and plains of Jaffa by utilising the waters of a brook a few miles to the north. According to this report, the proposed aqueduct would be highly beneficial, might be constructed without difficulty, and would yield a handsome profit.

The subject of vivisection deserves the increasing attention it is receiving. The blessing of Him who cares for all sentient creatures cannot be expected on the science which breaks his laws by the unnecessary torture of dumb animals. Do all who condemn vivisection discountenance other modes of cruelty? A correspondent writes that he was recently kept awake all night by the constant moaning of a calf. It is not generally known that in order to make veal white to please the taste or the eye of consumers, the animal is slowly bled to death! If all consumers would protest against this, and only purchase veal of the natural colour, as in Switzerland, this custom would be discontinued. Unlike vivisection, it is in our own hands.

The barbarous custom of bracing up the heads of horses by a "bearing-rein" still lingers, and should be protested against wherever seen. "In Wales," writes a correspondent, "I saw horses dragging carts heavily laden with stones up a steep hill. In order to draw easily the horse naturally holds its head down. It is cruelty to fasten it back and use the whip. A visitor appealed to a carter and unloosed the strap with his consent, whereupon the horse at once used the liberty thus given, and the driver was pleased with the result." Very often torture is inflicted not from design but ignorance.

In the neighbourhood from which Primitive Methodism took its rise, it has just done itself great honour. The Staffordshire colliers have behaved themselves with perfect self-control during the time of the strike; they condemned by resolution at a meeting on Walsall Wood Common the riots which have occurred, and pledged themselves to continue the struggle to the end in a manner becoming Englishmen and Christians. At another meeting, numbering about seven thousand miners, they chose the Primitive Methodist minister chairman, and opened their proceedings with prayer and the singing of hymns. The announcement of the end of the strike in that district was received with cheers and hallelujahs. In Somersetshire also the influence of the same body of Christians is said to have been all for good. All who love the fair fame of Christianity cannot but rejoice at these proofs of the power it exerts; and many more no doubt might be given.

Mr. Walter Besant, says The Review of Reviews, is of opinion that while "The Pilgrim's Progress" remains and is read by our boys and girls, two or three truths will remain deeply burned into the English soul. The first is the personal responsibility of each man; the next is that Christianity does not want, and cannot have, a priest. "I confess," he says, "that the discovery, by later reading, that the so-called Christian priest is a personage borrowed from surrounding superstition, and that the great ecclesiastical structure is entirely built by human hands, filled me with only a deeper gratitude to John Bunyan." The lesson from this is obvious: get the boys and girls to read the famous allegory.

Aline Gorren describes, in The Atlantic Monthly, "the moral revival in France," which she dates from the day when the French peasants at Sedan heard their German conquerors sing Luther's hymn on the battlefield. The writers who are the leaders of this movement she believes to be thoroughly sincere, loyal, and earnest. They not only admire, but would desire "to revive, the morality of the Christian religion, rigidly to enforce it, to make it the ever-present rule of every-day life, but all this while repudiating its orthodox, dogmatic foundation." The writer would have been explicit had she informed us what foundation she means: the one laid by the Roman Church, or the one laid down by God Himself, even Christ Jesus. The attempt to get the morality of Christianity apart from its distinctive truths is like the attempt to get roses without a rose-tree. The idea of one of the leaders of the movement to have "an intellectual priesthood, which shall regard all its gifts and attainments as usufructs, to which the mentally unendowed and physically disinherited have a right," is a travesty of the priesthood of Christians, which rests not on mental superiority, but on the sacrifice and intercession of God's own Son.

Mr. John G. Speed gives, in The Forum, some curious and painful proofs of the deterioration of the New York press: According to the tables he has drawn up, it appears that whereas in 1881 The Tribune gave 2·00 of religious news or matter, it now gives 0·00. A decline is also seen in The World, The Times, and The Sun. Science and literature also receive less attention now than they did twelve years ago; but, on the other hand, more attention is given to gossip, scandals, sporting, and fiction. The amount of space given to gossip is multiplied as much as twenty-three, sixty-three, thirty, and six fold. Chicago, however, presents, in the same period, "a steady and noteworthy improvement."

Restitution for wrong done wittingly or unwittingly, is the last effect of a quickened conscience. Restitution of money received from a man who had no right to give it, is a tribute due to justice. Some religious societies which had received subscriptions from Jabez Balfour set the example of sending them to the Liberator Fund, and other societies of a political and philanthropical kind are following suit. This is good for all who are immediately concerned, and also for the public conscience. It is to be hoped that for the future no man of position and reputation will give his name to a commercial concern without knowing whether it is honestly conducted.

The Apostle Paul, who was a stern opponent of questions and the strifes of words, was, nevertheless, particular as to even the "form of sound words" in which he had taught Timothy the Gospel. No alteration can improve the form of the faithful saying. But there were also other faithful sayings, e.g. that in Titus iii. 4, 7; also in 2 Tim. ii. 11, which really refers back to verse 8. "Remember that Jesus Christ of the seed of David was raised from the dead according to my Gospel. It is a faithful saying. For if we be dead with Him, we shall also live with Him: if we suffer, we shall also reign with Him: if we deny Him, He also will deny us: if we believe not, yet He abideth faithful; He cannot deny Himself." The worth and power of these sayings, these forms of sound words, had been experienced in Paul's own heart, and seen in many a conversion.

A JEWISH RECANTATION.—After many fruitless attempts to gain a living as a missionary to his people, Mr. Abraham Hornstein, late of the Bishopsgate Mission to the Jews, has formally renounced Christianity, and applied to the Chief Rabbi for restoration to the Jewish fold. Our experience of this young man for some years has been far from satisfactory, and the step he has now taken is rather a matter of grief than of surprise.

Apocalyptic Interpretation.

In common with a large number of our readers, and notwithstanding the strenuous objections of others, we think that the papers by Sir S. A. Blackwood, now appearing in our columns, are doing good service to the present generation, which is rapidly forgetting the facts in European history written in blood by Romish Paganism—for Rome is as essentially Pagan to-day as before the Christian era dawned upon the world. We may not be convinced that the interpretation of the Apocalyptic symbols is in every point correct or admissible, but the historical sequence of events is incontrovertible. It is of supreme importance that our children should be acquainted with the blood-stained story of the Romish apostasy, in view of her subtle and indefatigable endeavours to gain among the Anglo-Saxons of England and her colonies, as well as of America, the prestige she has lost among the Latin races.

But it would not follow that every other interpretation of the Apocalypse than the "historical" must be false, even if that in all points were indisputable; for the truths of this wonderful book lie deeper than the superficial facts of history. When John Newton said that the great Pope and Antichrist is Self, and when he thus expounded the seven thunders of Rev. x.—

> Let us love, and sing, and wonder:
> Let us praise the Saviour's name;
> He has hushed the Law's loud thunder;
> He has quenched Mount Sinai's flame:
> He has washed us in his blood
> He has brought us nigh to God;

and when Charles Wesley prayed—

> Awake, the woman's conquering Seed,
> Awake, and bruise the serpent's head;
> Tread down thy foes, with power control
> The beast and devil in my soul:

they took a profounder view than that which only perceives the fulminations of the Papacy in the seven thunders silenced by the Voice from heaven; and which only sees Papal Rome in the Anti-christian Beast.

Whether the Man of Sin shall be the last Pope or not, it appears to us that, in the nature of things, there can be no crisis without a man equal to the occasion. The course of events is always tending to a critical result, and as every crisis in history has turned upon the action of some commanding mind, so the coming crisis which the whole world expects, and in which the evil principles now seething and fermenting attain their acme, "until the whole is leavened," can only be brought to an issue by a man, into whom, in a very real sense, Satan shall have entered, and to whom the kings of Christendom shall with one mind give their power and strength.

Babylon, the Mother of Harlots and abominations of the earth, is older than Papal Rome. She dates back to Semiramis and Nimrod and Babel; and through them to the antediluvian apostates who filled the earth with corruption and violence, so that life became unlivable.

We are not concerned to question what others see or think they see, unless it contradicts what we believe to be the truth. Therefore we do not call in question the historical method of interpreting Apocalyptic symbolism. With most of its essential conclusions we heartily agree. But it is not competent to any interpretation to claim that it alone is true, unless it can be proved to have exhausted the meaning of the text. This has not been done by the historical interpretation, or by any other. The interpretation of Presentists and Futurists alike is that the Man-Child of Rev. xii. represents the Church in some period of her history. But surely the first impression on the mind of every reader is, that the Man-Child is Christ. The student must be educated in some school of interpretation before he acquires the idea that the Church, which is characteristically symbolised as a woman—for she is the bride, the wife, from Gen. iii. 22 onwards—is here symbolised by a child who is emphatically a male.

Until this interpretation has accounted for the similarity and yet the contrast between the woman of Rev. xii. and the representation of the sign Virgo in ancient mythological planispheres; until it has taken into consideration that the Man-Child is the Male Son, a male with emphasis, and that the crowning abomination of Paganism was its worship of the male (Ezek. xvi. 17); and until it has proved that in thus exalting the Man-Child, the Male Son of the sun-clothed woman, God was not showing the true object of worship in contrast with the obscene idolatry of Paganism—it is not entitled to claim for itself that it alone is true and that any other interpretation must be false.

There is more in this Divine Revelation, the fruit and flower of Scripture, in which all the truths of the Bible are gathered up, than has entered into the mind of all the interpreters of all the schools combined.

We all owe it to ourselves and to one another, as well as to God and his Word, to acquaint ourselves with what others have seen in its clear but unfathomed depths. And we should all keep our minds so free of prejudice as to esteem the conceptions and discoveries of others not less highly than our own. M.

LOOKING BACK.

Deut. viii. 2.

"All that the Lord hath spoken will I do,"
"In life, in death, I am for ever thine";
When first the sweetness of thy love I knew,
Thus my heart answered Thee, O Saviour mine.

The wilderness was all before me, then;
Now, nearly forty years of wandering lie
Behind my weary pilgrim feet, that fain
Would rest beyond the Jordan drawing nigh.

My strength is failing, and my hair is grey;
And now, obedient to thy holy word,
I would look back, remembering the way
Which, through the desert, Thou hast led me, Lord.

To me, at eventide, there cometh light,
By which I read the history of those years;
Humbled, heart-broken, misty grows my sight—
I scarce can see the glory for my tears.

What tender loving-kindnesses have shed
Radiance by night, shadow from heat by day;
How patiently thy Holy Spirit pled
With this vain heart, so prone from Thee to stray.

How much I meant to do for Thee, Beloved,
What a straight pathway for my feet I traced:
Alas! how crooked hath my walking proved;
I have not glorified Thee, but disgraced.

What sins of pride and hasty temper still Deface the life that should have copied thine:
In word, I daily sought thy blessed will,
In act, too oft, I followed only mine.

How I have missed the grace that might have made
My path a light to lead dear souls to Thee.
How often have my foolish footsteps strayed,
Till Thou wert forced, in love, to chasten me.

My sun is setting; not in golden sheen,
But stormy clouds; wounded and faint, I lie
Upon the battle-plain, that might have been,
Save for my faithlessness, the field of victory.

But Thou hast conquered sin and death and hell;
Great Captain of Salvation, unto Thee
Helpless I cry, O Lord, Thou knewest well
Ere thou didst call me, treacherous I should be.

And yet thy love flowed forth to worthless me—
Thy precious love, which cannot change nor fail;
And, in thy strength, I will rise valiantly,
To fight anew, and, in thy strength, prevail.

When in thy presence I at last shall stand,
Victor through Thee, tho' tears of shame must fall
To think how I have grieved Thee, thy dear Hand,
Wounded for me, shall wipe away them all.

MEDICAL MISSION IN SYRIA.

A very full and interesting paper on this subject, by Dr. Post, of Beyrout, appears in the Missionary Review of the World for September. We extract a portion:—

"The Medical Department of the Syrian Protestant College is a medical mission of the most productive kind. It works directly and indirectly for the body and the soul. Its direct work is chiefly in connection with the noble hospital of the Knights of St. John in Beirût. These knights consist of the cream of the German nobility, and their order supports forty-three hospitals, of which that at Beirût is the only one out of the fatherland. When it became known to the Turkish Government that the Order wished to establish a hospital in Beirût, the authorities gave them a fine plot of ground, about four acres, on which the hospital now stands. The municipality of Beirût also pays a considerable sum annually for the support of poor patients, principally Moslems, in the hospital. The Government also gave the Order the large property in Jerusalem, where ruins of the mediæval hospice of the old Order of St. John still stand. The Johanniter Hospital, at Beirût, consists of a central building, with sixty-three beds, an outside building for contagious diseases, a polyclinic, where from 10,000 to 15,000 free consultations are given every year, and various accessory buildings, all surrounded by a beautifully arranged garden, and having a grand outlook over sea and land. About 500 patients are treated annually in the wards of the hospital, of which number more than a third are of non-Christian sects. An open Bible, Scripture readings, personal conversations, and Sabbath services remind all these people whence their blessings flow, and invite them to trust in Christ for the salvation of their souls. The people who thus hear the Gospel are for the most part those who would not otherwise be accessible to missionary teaching. The Sisters of Kaiserswerth (Protestant Deaconesses) are the nurses of this institution, and the professors of the Medical Department of the Syrian Protestant College its medical attendants and evangelists. Each of them has a direct influence of his own as great as his strength and zeal.

"But it is the indirect work of the college which gives it its chief importance. It is training the young to carry outward, in ever-widening circles of beneficence, the work of the professors. It was impossible to give an account of the medical missionary work in this land without frequent mention of the graduates of this institution. It is difficult to give an idea by statistics of the good done even by those of our graduates who have not become connected with missionary institutions. I believe that it would be a small estimate of the service rendered to the poor by our men if we put it at the figure of a hundred thousand free consultations a year, quite outside of all establishments. If we add to these fifty thousand a year in connection with the various agencies mentioned, some conception may be formed of the scope of our work in relieving human misery. It is by no means illegitimate to add to these large figures the much larger number of those who are able and willing to pay in whole or in part for the benefits received, but which never could have been rendered had not this institution been found."

NORTH AFRICA MISSION.—In connection with the West London Auxiliary of this Mission a goodly number of friends gathered together on Friday afternoon at Morley Hall, 316, Regent-st., to bid God speed to the Misses Lambden and Frostick, who leave England shortly to enter upon missionary work in North Africa. Mr. A. T. Jay presided, and amongst those who took part in the meeting were Rev. F. B. Meyer, Dr. McKilliam, and Rev. James Baillie. Miss Lambden gave some interesting particulars of her past work in North Africa.

FEMALE MEDICAL MISSIONARIES.—The secretary of the Zenana Medical College has had good meetings in the Town Hall, Tunbridge Wells, St. Matthew's School-room, Kemp Town, All Saints' Parish Room, Eastbourne, and the Y.M.C.A., Brighton. Dr. Prankard, Medical Missionary, at two of these meetings endorsed the cry for more medical women. Dr. Gorrequer Griffith gave interesting details. Miss Hobbs, now on furlough, gave many instances of what she had been enabled to do in relieving the suffering women and children. She pointed out the terrible need of more workers, as many medical stations at present were under-officered, and in several cases entirely suspended for want of fresh assistance to take up the places of those invalided.

Key-Words of Life.

Rev. F. B. Meyer, B.A.

MAN IN CHRIST.

Christ is the ideal man. Once, in the course of the ages, the plant of human nature seemed to bear a perfect flower of stainless purity and ineffable loveliness. The black touch of the world's sin could not befoul it. The storms that swept over it might strike it for a moment down to the black soil out of which it sprang, but could not bemire it. It reared itself in more fearless beauty, and grows to-day fair and strong in the universe of God, for it burst through the narrow limits of its original home as a tall palm through the frail roof of the confining glass into the air and light of heaven.

The Man Christ Jesus was before the first man Adam, so far as the thought and purpose of God are concerned. And when the great Potter took in hand the red earth to make a man, He made it in his own image, and after his likeness. And what could these be but the nature and lineaments of that blessed Son of his love who was his fellow—Himself? The Incarnation and Ascension were only possible on these conditions. How could the Son of God have become incarnate unless the nature He was to assume had already been made after the model of Himself? And how could our human nature be taken into the ineffable glory of the Throne unless, in a sense, it had belonged there before the worlds were made?

But Adam fell from his original type. They say that this aptness to deteriorate runs through nature. And in his fall we all fell. All who are one with him by the bonds of natural relationship shared in that sad act of disobedience and its results, when the apple was eaten and the threshold of Eden passed, never to be re-crossed. How great that fall was may be judged when we consider the wizened babes, the wretched women, the blear-eyed, soddened victims of drink and sin which abound amid the most civilised and refined cities of the world, and compare them with the Man of Nazareth, that holy thing which was born of the virgin-mother.

But Jesus is more than type. He is the Second Man, the life-giving Spirit, and capable of repeating Himself in myriads of souls, not in his Divine fulness but in his human beauty. This is the power of life, possessed in common by plant and animal—the marvellous gift of reproduction! Adam begat a son in his own likeness, after his image. And the Second Man possesses the same glorious power, by which He is able to fashion anew the body of our humiliation, that it may be conformed to the body of his glory, according to the working whereby He is able even to subject all things unto Himself.

Eph. ii. 16. The New Man.—When this Epistle was written, the hatred of centuries had reached its climax. The Jew, able to trace his unbroken line of descent from Abraham, proud of the religious prerogatives of his race, magnifying his unique relationship to Jehovah, looked with scorn on the uncircumcised Gentiles around. They were Gentile dogs. He spat on the ground if they crossed his path. They were without hope unless they submitted to the initial rite of his religion. This hatred the Gentiles were not slow to return. In the Church itself there were traces of this enmity, but how much more in the world, which was untempered by Christian grace.

As long as the Mosaic ritual was the prescribed method of approaching Jehovah, there was no way of removing this hostility. The Jew entrenched himself within its barriers, justifying his hatred by religious sanctions. The Gentile chafed and rebelled against its exactions. But our Saviour, in his flesh, and by his cross, broke down the middle wall of partition, and abolished the enmity even the law of commandments contained in ordinances. He fulfilled the law so perfectly, not for Himself but for all, that it had no more to ask. Its claims were met and satisfied, and therefore the Jews could not insist on them, on the one hand, or the Gentiles chafe beneath them on the other.

Moreover, by his death the Saviour has made an atonement and propitiation for men as men. Not for the Jew in one way, or the Gentile in another, but for all on the same terms. By one death, in one body on the cross, which is common to the whole world of men, and by his intercession, through which both have access to the one Father, He has brought to an end the divisions of ages.

But He has done more. In his resurrection, He is constituted the origin and head of a new race. The race of regenerate men! The race of his resurrection life and power! The race of the new heavens and the new earth! All who believe in Him are born into that New Humanity. It is the one new man, which is composed of all nations, and kindreds, and peoples, and tongues.

Eph. iii. 16. The Inner Man.—Beneath the play of our outward life, and beneath the workings of our busy brains, there lies a deeper self, which the Apostle calls the inner man. There is an objective and there is a subjective self. The former occupies itself with collecting impressions and thoughts from the world around, and in action or speech; but the latter, veiled from observation, muses, arranges its stores, carries on long trains of thought, holds fellowship with itself, and God, and the unseen. It is this part of our nature which perceives truth, not by trains of argument, but by the flash of intuitive perception, and which receives those mighty tides of Divine power that wait around us seeking for admission.

This inner man is in all saints, but many live in the outer courts of our nature, occupied with the mere externals of our life and the world. We give these inner chambers over to neglect and dust, seldom entering them, or indeed cognisant of their existence, save when in hours of unusual solemnity they assert themselves and compel attention. But Mary, the mother, lived in them, when she pondered things in her heart. The prophets derived their visions and inspirations through the same channel. And as we cultivate it by devout meditation, and prayer, and attention, we shall be sensible of new powers of vision and energy arising within us.

It is in this inner man that the Spirit finds his home and seat. This is the Holy See. Here He elaborates his purposes, formulates and issues his decrees, and stirs to heroic action. And when all its avenues are open to Him, He so infills with his own power, and indwells with Divine energy, that the inner man is strengthened with might, according to the riches of his glory.

Eph. iv. 13. The Full-grown Man.—From the hands of the Ascended Saviour, gifts are distributed to his Church. He gave some, apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers. But to every member of the Church, the weakest and obscurest, some special grace was given, according to the measure of the gift of Christ. Every joint in the body has some function to perform to all the rest, and to the growth and perfectness of the whole.

But, alas! too many of the saints are either unaware of the possession of gift or gifts, or they leave them buried in a napkin in the earth, or they are out of joint and so unable to do their specific work. The special offices of the Church, the apostles, the prophets, the pastors, are intended to stir the saints to discover their gifts, and, if needs be, to put them into articulated union with the Lord, so that they may take up the work of ministering to the rest of the body.

This meaning, which is somewhat obscured in the older version, is made abundantly clear in the revised. "For the perfecting (the setting in joint) of the saints unto the work of ministering, unto the building up of the body of Christ" (12).

As the piccolo may be missed out of a great orchestra; as each single joint is indispensable to the body's health and vigour; so each believer has a part to do, by thought or speech, by suffering or action, in building up the great mystical body of the Lord. Some vision of his beauty received and passed on, some deep sweet word, some trait caught from fellowship with Him and reflected from the pallid brow of sickness, some unselfish act of which the world knows nothing—such are the contributions that we make to the upbuilding of the body. We may seem to do nothing else than minister to the particles just against us, but this reacts on the whole.

And presently, it may be nearer than we suppose, the body will have reached its full growth, will have attained to the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ, will be worthy of its Head. All the saints with Jesus shall make together a full-grown perfect man, which shall realise in completeness the Divine ideal.

Eph. iv. 22. The Old Man.—The old man is the aggregate of habits and methods of life, which marked us before conversion. The phrase describes the impression which we produced as men and women upon our fellows. What we were wont to be, and say, and do. That form of character and life which was ours before the great change operated through faith in Jesus.

It is called the old man, as if there were but one, because the habits and tastes, the thoughts and acts of men, before conversion, have much in common. There is not much to choose between them. It is one evil nature; one likeness to fallen Adam; one type of evil, though its forms are modified in different temperaments and by special circumstances.

It is under the control of deceitful lusts. In other words, it is shaped by the passionate desires which have their origin in the strong natural tendencies of our being. These were given us by God to be the motive-forces of our nature, but not to rule. Given us to render service as the fire in a steamer, the electric force in the Leyden jar; we abuse them when we let them pass out of our firm control and assume the direction and control of our existence. For when once they are permitted to usurp this position, corruption ensues, and the nature rots piecemeal before their insidious action, as the body of the leper beneath the living death that eats away his flesh. Ah! deceitful lusts, promising liberty, and happiness, and joy, but resembling the Syren sisters, whose upper form was fair, but whose lower extremities were disgusting; and whose sweet songs were intended only to allure to ruin.

We must not defer this. The tense indicates the sudden resolve of the will, inspired and empowered by the Holy Spirit, to be no longer under the dominion of these terrible passions. Once and for ever put off these habits, as the beggar his rags, or as Lazarus the cerements of death.

Eph iv. 24. The New Man.—This is the aggregate of blessed habits that mark the life of the converted. The white robe of purity, the girdle of self-restraint, the silver of humility, the jewels of holy character. All through the Epistles we are bidden to don it. "Put on the armour of light." "Put on, as God's elect, a heart of compassion." "Put on the Lord Jesus Christ."

It is the new man, because the habits and character of the children of God are very similar. There is a family likeness common to all. It is after God, because it is created in his likeness. It is the fashion of God in human nature, perfectly exemplified once in Jesus Christ, and now waiting to be imparted by the Holy Ghost. It is righteous toward man. It is holy toward God. It is true, perfectly transparent and sincere. Put on this holy thing. Created in Jesus, and therefore not to be woven by human effort or spun by outward obedience to rites, but to be simply assumed.

Put it on by faith. Do not try to build up Christ-likeness by your repeated endeavours. Just assume it by faith. Believe it is yours. Reckon that it is so. Go out believing that Christ is in you and his beauty on you as a beautiful robe, and so shall men realise that it is not you but Christ.

National Protestant Congress.

The official programme of the National Protestant Congress, which is arranged to meet at Bath this year, from October 16 to 19 inclusive, has been issued, and appears fully to come up to the three Congress programmes which have preceded it in interest and importance. The subjects include: "The Unity and Continuity of the Church of Christ," "Romanism as a Spiritual and Political Power," "The Atonement," "Romanism and Ritualism Antagonistic to the Word of God," "Educational Efforts of Romanists and Ritualists," "Holy Scripture Illustrated and Confirmed," "Rome's Tactics," and "The Second Advent."

Among the speakers are the following:—Professor Hull, Miss Golding, Pasteur C. Merle-D'Aubigné, Revs. Canon Garratt, Dr. Ker, Dr. Kane, Dr. Hiles Hitchens, Dr. C. Clemance, Dr. W. M. Nicolson, Dr. C. Porter, Talbot Greaves, Handley Moule, J. G. Gregory, J. Sturrock, C. H. Wainwright, F. A. C. Lillingston, Jas. Lunt, H. B. Woodman, John G. Train, J. Urquhart, and W. Fuller Gooch.

Ladies' meetings in connection with the "Women's Protestant Union" will also be held during the Congress week.

It is to be hoped and expected that the friends of Protestantism will rally round the Congress as they did in such a splendid manner at Portsmouth last year.

A NINE DAYS' MISSION, under the auspices of the Uxbridge and District Total Abstainers' Union, has been held at the Town Hall, Uxbridge.

Apocalyptic Scenes.

By Sir S. Arthur Blackwood, K.C.B.

XXVIII.

THE SECOND SIGN.

"And there appeared another sign in heaven; and, behold, a great red dragon, having seven heads and ten horns and seven crowns upon his heads."

Of all the seven signs, this, the second, occupies the largest space in the vision, commencing as it does at ch. xii. 2, and only terminating towards the close of ch. xx. It is the most complex of the symbolic representations which were made to pass before the Seer's eyes, the appearance of the central figure in it changing several times, and it is described in terms which, though sometimes very plain, are generally most mysterious.

It will be only possible in this paper to note some of the principal features of the chief actor in the scene which is the sphere of the second sign. In the next I propose to trace the action. Let us, then, note the following points:—

1. The being depicted.—"A great red dragon." There can be no doubt as to the personage represented by the symbol. It is expressly declared to be "that old serpent, called the Devil and Satan, which deceiveth the whole world" (v. 9), and again in ch. xx. 2, "the dragon, that old serpent, which is the Devil and Satan." There is then no room for controversy here. The Holy Ghost Himself has explained the symbol. It is the great enemy of God and of his Christ, the enemy of mankind, the serpent of Edenic days, the "liar" (Jno. viii. 44), "the tempter" (Matt. iv. 3) "that had the power of death" (Heb. ii. 14), "that wicked one" (1 Jno. iii. 12), "the prince of this world" (Jno. xiv. 30), "a murderer from the beginning" (Jno. viii. 44), "the prince of the power of the air, that now worketh in the children of disobedience" (Eph. ii. 2), "the god of this world" (2 Cor. iv. 4).

How unspeakably solemn is this apocalypse. The veil is lifted by the Divine hand, and the superhuman, the hellish power, which has been working all through the centuries since the creation of man, working in and through man, stands revealed to us. He is exhibited as the prime mover and agent in all the lies, the delusions, the deceptions, that have defiled the Church, and desolated Christendom during the whole of this dispensation—as the one that "deceiveth the whole world." "The working of Satan with all power and signs and lying wonders, and with all deceivableness of unrighteousness," is disclosed to "him that hath an ear to hear." It is a deeply solemn picture that is here presented. How truly awful is the reality!

2. The sphere of his operation.—This is described by means of several most expressive symbols, upon which great light is thrown, either by the explanations directly given to the Apostle, or by the recognised meaning of similar symbols in certain fulfilled prophecies of the Old Testament. The vision, as it proceeds, reveals different aspects of the sphere of draconic, or Satanic operation, varying according to the precise period of time with which the prophecy deals. And prominent among them we should note the following:—

(a) The geographical sphere.—While it is perfectly true that no part of the inhabited world is exempt from the malign influence of the great enemy, it is only a portion, and a comparatively very small portion, of the world which is represented, for the purposes of the vision, as the scene of his working. That portion is the territory originally called the Roman Empire, but for the past fifteen centuries known as Christendom, that is to say, that part of Christendom which falls within the limits of the ancient empire. This is evident from the fact that a symbol, having many points of resemblance to, indeed almost identical with, that under notice, as exhibited at different times, was shown to the prophet Daniel, and declared to possess the signification given above.

In the vision recorded in the seventh chapter of that book, it was revealed that the four wild beasts which he saw denoted four kings or kingdoms (v. 23) which should arise, and should continue to exist, successively, until the time of the end, when the Kingdom of the Son of Man should be established. They appeared under the forms of a lion, a bear, a leopard, and of a fourth beast, "dreadful, and terrible, and strong exceedingly," which had ten horns.

These four world-empires are generally admitted to be the Assyrian, the Medo-Persian, the Grecian, and the Roman. And in the vision we are considering, we see all the features of the Danielic wild beasts repeated. In ch. xiii. 1, 2, where a phase of Satanic working is revealed, and where a wild beast appears to which the dragon gives "his power and his throne and great authority," the creature is shown as possessing the characteristics of a leopard, a bear, and a lion, and as having ten horns. It is impossible to doubt that the symbol represents the Roman Empire, which arose upon the ruins and occupied the territories of the preceding three empires. The wild beast of the Revelation, under Satanic influence, is the fourth beast of Dan. vii. The geographical sphere of diabolical operation is the Roman Empire.

(b). The political sphere.—It is not only in a given geographical district that the energy of the dragon, that is the Devil, is represented as being put forth. It is also a political power. For we read in ch. xiii. 7 that this wild beast, endued with the might of hell, was given "power over all kindreds and tongues and nations," that is, of course, to such as came within the geographical limits already defined. In Daniel vii. 25 it is described as "changing times and laws." And the ten horns, which are explained both in Daniel vii. 24 and in Rev. xvii. 12 to mean ten kings or kingdoms, and which receive power "one hour," or contemporaneously with the wild beast—i.e., are part and parcel of the empire denoted thereby, are described as giving "their power and strength unto the beast" (v. 13). "These shall make war with the Lamb" (v. 14). The sphere of diabolical operation is consequently political as well as geographical. And hereby is the solemn truth revealed that the governments of this world—that is, of that part of the world which is the scene of the prophecy—are, speaking generally, under the influence of Satan, the prince of this world. That there have been some really Christian rulers, who, as well as governments, have sought to rule righteously, that in several countries legislation has been based on Christian principles, and that Christianity has exercised a wonderfully formative, restraining, and controlling power over the nations, and that to an extent that is perhaps little understood, is no doubt true. Yet the fact remains, as declared in the prophecy before us, that beneath and behind these earthly governments, working with ceaseless energy in the political movements of the dispensation, there has been the diabolical power of the serpent, the great red dragon of the Apocalypse.

(c) The ecclesiastical or religious sphere.—It is here that the activity of this fearful being is represented as principally exercised. Whether by open persecution, or secret wiles, it is always against and mainly through the professing Church of God that his constant machinations are directed. This will be seen more clearly as our exposition of the historical fulfilment of the prophecy proceeds. I only desire here to point out the fact, as generally indicated by the language of the second sign, supported by passages from other prophecies, both of the Old and New Testaments.

(a) Against the Church.—The enmity of the seven-headed and ten-horned dragon, called the Devil and Satan, is first manifested in the attempt to destroy the man-child which the sun-clothed woman brought forth—that is, the body of Christ, destined in due time to association with Him in his dominion (ch. xii. 2). And, indeed, previously to this, as intimated in the same verse, he had been successful in his attack upon "the third part of the stars of heaven": and the stars are the angels, or rulers, of the Churches (ch. i. 20). Then he persecutes the woman herself (v. 13), and seeks to overwhelm her with the flood out of his mouth (v. 15): and next proceeds to make war with the remnant of her seed (v. 17). We also find from ch. xiii. 7 that it is given to the wild beast, which is endued with Satanic power, "to make war with the saints and to overcome them," a result which had been predicted of his warfare against the two witnesses in ch. xi. 7. The same is declared of the little horn of the fourth wild beast of Dan. vii., of which we read in v. 21 that it "made war with the saints and prevailed against them," and in v. 25 that "he shall wear out the saints of the Most High." Thus, whether the Church be represented under the name of "the saints," or by the different symbols of the woman, the man-child, the remnant of the woman's seed, or the witnesses, symbols varying according to the aspect it was desired to exhibit, we see that it is ever against the servants of God that the diabolical warfare is waged.

(b) Through the Church.—It is here that the subtlety of the serpent has been most successful, as indeed was likely to be the case. In very early days an apostle had warned Christians of his devices, and told them that even then there were the "ministers of Satan" among them, "false apostles, deceitful workers, transforming themselves into the apostles of Christ" and "ministers of unrighteousness," copying their master, who is "himself transformed into an angel of light" (2 Cor. x. 13, 15). Other prophecies by Paul, Peter, Jude, and John had declared that diabolical activity was to be expected in the midst of the Church itself; and it is here, in the final revelation of the things that were "shortly to come to pass," that the work of the adversary is once again depicted in the fearful symbols which we are considering. It is only possible in this paper to glance at them; the fuller exposition and historical fulfilment will be given later.

We see, then, that the second wild beast of ch. xiii. 11, which is simply the lieutenant of the first, invested with "all the power of the first beast," and also acting as its minister, while it speaks as a dragon, it has two horns as a lamb, and that it is called "the false prophet" (ch. xix. 20 and xx. 10). It is while wearing the outward garb of them that are of the flock of Christ, and professing to be a teacher of Christian doctrine, that this phase of the bestial power was to appear; and we cannot fail to recall the words of our Lord, "Beware of false prophets, which come to you in sheep's clothing, but inwardly they are ravening wolves" (Matt. vii. 15); the predictions of Peter, concerning the "false teachers" who should arise in the Church, and whose character and work are so fully described by him in his 2 Ep. ch. ii., and the kindred statements of Paul with regard to the entering into the flock of "grievous wolves," the arising of men "speaking perverse things" (Acts. xx. 29, 30), and teaching "doctrines of demons" (1 Tim. ii. 1). All this was to take place in the professing Church of God, which would thus become the very "seat of Satan," and the sphere in which his power would be exercised by the wild beast (ch. xiii. 2).

The same truth was even more expressly declared by the Apostle Paul in 2 Th. ii., where he foretells the development of "the mystery of iniquity," which was already working in the Church, and the rise and manifestation of "that man of sin," "the son of perdition," "that wicked one," "whose coming is after the working of Satan with all power and signs and lying wonders" (comp. the "wonders" and "miracles" of Rev. xiii. 13, 14, and xix. 20). There he distinctly asserts that the scene of such Satanic working would be "the temple of God" (v. 4), an expression which, with the analogous term "the house of God" invariably, in Apostolic teaching, denotes the Church. (See 1 Cor. iii. 16, 17; 2 Cor. vi. 16; Eph. ii. 19, 20; 1 Ti. iii. 15; Heb. iii. 6, x. 21; 1 Pet. iv. 5, iv. 17.)

Once again, we learn from Dan. vii. that one of the distinctive characteristics of the little horn, which is identified with the wild beast itself (just as the eighth head of the Apocalyptic wild beast is identified with the wild beast of that book (ch. xvii. 11) was that it had "eyes like the eyes of a man" (v. 8). In other words, it was to occupy the position of our "Episcopos" or overseer—that is, of a bishop, a ruler in the Church.

Lastly, we see in chap. xvii. that the seven-headed, ten-horned wild beast supports, and is thus one with, the great apostate Church, falsely calling itself Catholic, which there appears as "Mystery, Babylon the Great, the mother of harlots and abominations of the earth—drunken with the blood of the saints and with the blood of the martyrs of Jesus."

Such, then, is the sphere which the Scriptures of truth regard as the scene in which the operations of the great red dragon of the second sign, "that old serpent called the Devil and Satan," are carried on. It is geographical, political, and ecclesiastical.

How deeply solemn is the fact! The course of this world, or age, is still "according to the prince of the power of the air, the spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience." To an extent of which the world knows nothing, and of which, it must be feared, Christians generally are but little aware, the god of this world is ceaselessly at work. His power is fearfully great, his subtlety is inconceivable. But the Word of God lays bare his character, his ways, and his doom; and by that word which is "the Sword of the Spirit" can we alone resist and overcome him. Let us then, seeing that we knew these things before, beware lest, being led away with the error of the wicked, we fal[1] from our own steadfastness.

But a still clearer proot of this is furnished by the divine explanation of the symbol given in ch. xvii. The Apostle is there told that the seven heads of the beast (and the heads and the beast are identical, see v. 11, where the beast is said to be the eighth head) are (or represent) seven mountains on which the woman sitteth, and that the woman is "that great city which reigneth over the kings of the earth." The seven-hilled city is universally acknowledged to be Rome, and Rome, as is well known, was held to be synonymous with the Roman Empire. It is the only instance in history, with the exception of Babylon, its prototype, of a kingdom or empire being spoken of under the name of its capital city. This explanation defines the territorial limits of the symbol.

REV. W. HAY AITKEN IN THE CITY.

The special mission mentioned in our last as having been commenced by Mr. Aitken in St. Mary's, Aldermanbury, a church situated in the very heart of the busy City, has been continued with growing interest.

The midday addresses to business men have been largely attended day by day by the class desiderated, and it has become increasingly evident that hundreds are willing to spend part of their brief luncheon interval in listening to plain and clear preaching on practical matters of daily and commercial life. Last week Mr. Aitken dealt with such themes as "A workman not ashamed" of his work, "God's purpose in life," etc., showing the utter failure many men make of life, simply because they have not the fear of God before their eyes and fail to accept his way of salvation, and do not seek grace to renew and restore the nature that has been warped by reason of sin. This week Mr. Aitken is dealing with such matters as Intemperance, Gambling, Impurity, and Honest Doubt (Thursday), closing on Friday with the Gospel of the Cross.

Speaking on Monday on "The Vice of Intemperance," the preacher started with the injunction of Eph. v. 18. Intemperance he regarded as our most prominent national sin. After eloquently and forcefully depicting the ruin and wretchedness, the misery and degradation which result from intemperance, and showing that in certain parts Christian work has become well-nigh hopeless by reason of the tippling habits of the men and women, Mr. Aitken went on to sweep aside the plausible excuses so easily and lightly made for men of drinking habits. Whatever be man's estimate of drunkenness, we must regard it as a sin—because it militates against the great purpose of God in life, because it throws the whole moral machinery out of gear, because it wrecks our own manhood, injures society, wrongs families, wives, and mothers, and, worst of all, is a flagrant sin against God. After telling of a poor man (a graduate of Trinity College) dying in a garret from delirium tremens, who left as his last message, "Tell them to have done with it," the preacher closed with a few urgent words of Gospel warning and entreaty.

The evening meetings have been fairly attended—largely by young men and women employed in City warehouses. The mission services on Sunday were marked by much interest, and especially the afternoon address to men only.

TEMBULAND, SOUTH AFRICA.—The Free Church of Scotland Mission continues to employ the enthusiasm of Rev. D. Doig Young, and to excite the admiration of those who follow its development. In the report for last year we read:—"Not a few who were heathen when the work was begun in 1882, we have seen brought to Jesus; and, after living faithfully for Him, have died, still clinging to Him. We have the joy of seeing fully organised stations, with schools established, where there were none before—new centres of Gospel light for dispelling the surrounding darkness. Over 300 converts have been admitted, after trial and examination, into church fellowship; that is surely something to thank God for. It is true that that is nothing to the great mass around us who are even now revelling in their heathenism. But that mass has had the Gospel repeatedly preached to it, and though apparently dead, and, therefore, unimpressionable now, yet it can be renewed." Christian Associations for men and women, young and old alike, have been formed, and are being worked on undenominational lines.

A YEAR OF BIBLE WORK.

The eighty-ninth report of the British and Foreign Bible Society is a very complete record of Bible work in many lands. The opening section deals specially with finances. Though in this respect the Society has not yet recovered the position it held in 1888, the outlay of last year—£220,900—was more than met, and the large deficit substantially reduced. The steady and uninterrupted increase in the circulation of Scriptures has been continued, and last year's total reached 4,049,700 copies, being 60,000 more than in the preceding year.

The journals of the colporteurs in France, as everywhere else, are of singular interest. In these simple records there is much to engage the attention of students of social progress, much also for students of human nature. The spirit of the narrative is this year noticeably pleasant; though there is much to discourage, there is no despondency. The report says:—"In France, as in other Roman Catholic countries—but specially perhaps in France—the colporteurs find their path everywhere crossed by a figure they have long learned to regard as the most persistent enemy of their work—it is that of the curé, who, denouncing and often destroying their books as 'falsified Protestant versions,' is far from careful to have his people supplied with editions of his own."

In Belgium the colporteurs are doing useful pioneer work. German and Swiss Protestants do much Bible work on their own account. From Austria-Hungary it is reported that the circle of eager inquirers grows larger and wider every year. Signor Meille, of Florence, is somewhat despondent as regards Italy. After alluding to France, he says: "On both sides of the Alps we find the same feverish pursuit of wealth and of pleasure, the same disregard of honesty and morality consequent on the same low ideas of life and its aims. What comes to the surface is only a sign of the corruption of the mass below. Many agencies for good are no doubt at work among our people, and their efforts are often crowned with success, but sometimes we fear that the evil is stronger than the good." Again, he writes: "Perhaps to an increased circulation of the Word of God is the growing opposition of the Roman Catholic clergy. This opposition grows more systematic, more bitter, and more efficient also in many cases year after year. It seems as if secret instructions had been sent everywhere against our colporteurs, so that very often when they arrive in a place they find the people completely prejudiced against them."

Spain is making steady advance. The agent, Mr. Jameson, writes: "There is a most manifest movement towards something better and higher: several popular writers have been emphasising the need of a purer morality and a more spiritual religion. Twenty-five years ago the leaders of thought declared that the people could do without religion, but experience has shown that is an impossibility. The most advanced thinkers and eager politicians are pointing to the countries where the Divine Book has proved itself the power of God unto salvation, and, while rejecting foreign creeds and confessional forms of belief, they are open to study the Book itself, and to respect the Society which circulates it alone."

A Spanish colporteur writes:—"In a town of some importance, to which place I was invited to give the inaugural discourse at a Cercle. Several friends were waiting for me in the station, and I was taken straight to the house of one of them and treated most courteously all the time I was there. On the Saturday night I gave a conférence, at which some 300 people were present; among them medical men, advocates, aristocrats, and several ladies. The people were very much interested. The Alcalde thanked me publicly the next day. On Sunday afternoon, in spite of a bullfight in a neighbouring village, we had an audience of 500 people. There was much enthusiasm: the simple Gospel carries the heart captive, and the love of God constrains it. They all exclaimed—'That is true religion: the result has been magnificent.'"

Passing over other European countries, we come to Russia, in which a large amount of work was carried on. Mr. Morrison, of Odessa, acknowledges the generosity of the railway and steamship companies in Russia, remarking, "We now enjoy free passes over 6,000 versts of railway, and over 3,000 of river and sea." In conclusion, we read: "It is an element of promise, and of no slight importance, in the future of the great Slav Empire, that the Bible seems so likely to become a book revered and studied by its people; and there is no pleasanter fact in the history of the latest year than that neither famine nor pestilence, with all their train of sorrows, has lessened the desire of the people to possess themselves of the Word of God."

Much that is of deep interest is said about the circulation of the Bible in Turkey and North Africa. Then several parts of the "Dark Continent" are surveyed, after which the great Asiatic field is described. The testimonies from India are full of encouragement. One is from Allahabad, itself a centre of pilgrimage, not far from the temple-crowded city of Benares. In 1891 the circulation was exceptionally high; in 1892 it has, in the important items of depot and colportage sales, advanced still further. In summing up the partial results of the year, the agent says that "as a whole, the Kingdom of Christ is making rapid and many are looking for a large in-gathering of those to whom the Gospel has been made known." From Lahore, also in the north, and from Bangalore in the south, there are similar accounts. Similarly the Madras auxiliary reports a purely colportage circulation higher than ever before; a proof, says the secretary, that "the Word is gradually gaining ground, breaking up prejudices, and preparing the way for a great future." The same is the case in Bombay.

Miss Gray in her report of the Biblewomen's work at Cawnpore, writes:—"We have an old coachman and his wife who have served in the Mission very many years, and are much respected by everyone for their quiet, respectable conduct, and have great influence over all the other servants. The old woman, who must be quite fifty years of age, was always much interested in Bible readings, and about three years ago thought she would like to learn to read for herself, so we began teaching her the Hindi characters. It was very, very slow business, and often we almost despaired, but she was most persevering. About six months ago she seemed to make a great start, and began reading quite fluently, till now she reads the Gospels so nicely, and any Hindi book. It is quite a beautiful sight of an evening to see this old lady, sitting under a tree with all the servants sitting round listening to her reading from the Gospels or some Bhajan (hymn), which she explains as she goes on, just as it has been explained to herself. Every morning she collects the children in an empty outhouse, and for about two hours teaches them to read and repeat texts and hymns."

China and Japan are also dealt with, and then, come Oceania, Australasia, and the home field. The record is full of inspiration for those who have at heart the spread of the Redeemer's kingdom. The report, which is eminently readable throughout, is brought to a close as follows: "The Bible Society has taught many dialects their noblest use, and brought into kindlier concord than ever before the long-dissonant accents of Babel. The time foretold in ancient prophecy (Dan. vii. 14) when all PEOPLES shall become obedient to the Son of Man seems still distant, but the Bible Society has been privileged to bring sensibly nearer the period when all LANGUAGES shall serve Him."

MY BIBLE AND I.

We've travelled together, my Bible and I;
Thro' all kinds of weather, with smile or with sigh!
In sorrow or sunshine, in tempest or calm;
Thy friendship unchanging, my lamp and my psalm.

We've travelled together, my Bible and I,
When life had grown weary and death e'en was nigh!
But all thro' the darkness of mist or of wrong
I found there a solace, a prayer, or a song.

So now who shall part us, my Bible and I?
Shall "isms," or schisms, or "new lights" who try?
Shall shadow for substance, or stone for good bread,
Supplant thy sound wisdom, give folly instead?

Ah! no, my dear Bible, exponent of light!
Thou sword of the Spirit, put error to flight;
And still thro' life's journey, until my last sigh,
We'll travel together, my Bible and I.

The Chicago Campaign.

Dr. Monro Gibson, of St. John's Wood, recently returned from America, has been telling his congregation something of what he saw of Christian life and work in Chicago. Referring to Mr. Moody's campaign there, he spoke somewhat as follows:—

While the Fair was deserted on Sundays, the churches were crowded. Of course, wherever Mr. Moody or Mr. McNeill preached there was no getting in, unless you went an hour or more before the time. But even with only an ordinary preacher there would be a full church, and that not in the morning only, but also at the evening service, which it is specially difficult to keep up in Chicago, as I remember by experience. On week-nights, too, the people would come in numbers. Be it remembered that there was not only the Fair, with its marvellous illuminations, to contend with, but there were likewise the attractions in the city suited to all tastes—from the great Congresses on the questions of the day to the lowest variety show. One would think that in these circumstances it would be almost impossible to keep up the attendance on a week-night at a religious service. Quite the contrary. The churches had their prayer-meetings all through the dog-days, and sometimes when it was least expected there would be a crowd. One Wednesday evening I was asked to take a service at a new town on the other side of the Fair grounds. When I got there I was surprised to find that instead of calling the meeting in some small lecture-hall, as I had expected, they had opened the largest church in the place. But the event justified what had appeared to me their unreasonable expectation, for not only was the building crowded to suffocation, but very many had to go away. And lest you may suppose that I had anything to do with this, I may say that on comparing notes afterwards with one who had been doing the same thing in another suburb, I found that he had had precisely the same experience.

But the regular services were not all. Mr. Moody had not only done what he could to stir up the churches to special activity during the great opportunity of the Fair, but had made special arrangements for extraordinary services. He got possession of some of the theatres in central positions for evangelistic services. Sometimes he himself preached in them, but the success did not depend on his presence, for when he was away at Northfield you would find some able lieutenant like Professor Torrey, of the Bible Institute, Mr. Scroggie, of Glasgow, or Mr. Varley, of London, at the Haymarket, or the Empire, or the Standard Theatre, preaching the Gospel to a full house, and drawing the Gospel net at the close.

These theatre services were, as I have said, in central places; but further out, though still in the crowded parts, there were tents, as many as five, where the Gospel was preached night after night. I was only able to attend one of these services; it was in a large tent holding, I should think, about a thousand people, and so brilliantly lighted that the street, with its arc lights, seemed dark in comparison. There Mr. Schiverea, a man who years ago was rescued from evil ways by Mr. Moody, and who is now a preacher of great power with singular adaptation for reaching the common people, was holding forth to a thoroughly interested audience, which almost filled the tent in every part. It was a Saturday night, and the animated appearance of the throng in the tent presented a singular and most encouraging contrast to the deserted look of the saloons and places of entertaiment in the street close by. It was the liveliest place I saw that night, and I travelled a good distance along the streets.

The tent meetings are held in the evening hours, but when they are closed the work of the day is not yet done, for if you go to the Branch Institute building on the west side you may be in time for the ten o'clock meeting there, not a large and crowded meeting like the others, but specially interesting in its way; for to this place the students of the Bible Institute, and others working with them in the streets and lanes, will bring, by ones or twos, some of the very lowest of the people. There is a prayer-meeting earlier in the evening, and now from ten o'clock till midnight this hard and discouraging but Christ like work will be going on.

But, now, is not that enough? Surely it ought to be; surely there will be no attempt at morning work in so busy a time. Yes; there is more than an attempt, for it is quite a success. All through the season there have been held two morning meetings at the main Institute buildings on the north side, one at nine and the other at eleven, and now in the month of August, are they closed for the heat? No; they are crowded out of the lecture-room, to take refuge in Mr. Moody's large church. They do not fill it, of course, but even the nine o'clock meeting looks respectable in it, and the eleven o'clock meeting, which is taken by Mr. Moody himself after his return from Northfield, nearly fills it, with the exception of the galleries, which are not open. These morning meetings are for the special benefit, first of students at the Bible Institute, and next of the Christian people who wish to have their enthusiasm kindled to take part in the aggressive work, which goes on, as we have seen, in the evening and into the night.

There is a goodly number earnestly at work; but, after all, "What are they among so many?"—among the surging multitudes of the vast city? The streets of Chicago are ablaze with electric light. The poorest show will have its fugues of colours chasing each other on its great illuminated front compelling your attention half-a-mile away. How can the light of a few Gospel tents and of one or two ransomed theatres compete with these gorgeous splendours? They really cannot. And yet great things may be done by Gideon's little band; and then it is something to show the way, for from what is done in Chicago now, under all the disadvantages of the time, may we not learn what might be done in all our great centres of population—I do not say necessarily by the same methods, but what might be done by methods of working, which will occur to wise and thoughtful minds and loving hearts, if only Christian people were all ablaze with heaven's light, and glowing with the fires of heaven's high devotion?

Mr. Henry Varley writes:—

"Our central rallying place is the Bible Institute where the energy, ability, and unity of hearts would be hard to surpass. As the water in Ezekiel's vision flowed out, so here truth and zeal for God and man pour forth from nigh two hundred living springs. The students bear the impress of their beloved leader, and are a practical testimony to the efficiency of the training they are receiving for Gospel ministry.

"We make long days—of prayer, praise, service, testimony, teaching, and bringing in the sheaves. At night we meet in Mr. Moody's room to report upon the progress of the day. The power of Gospel song presenting the virtue of the old, old story is well illustrated, led by our friends Messrs. Stebbins, Burke, Towner, McGranahan, and Mrs. F. C. Pierson. The choirs sing admirably, and the male quartets render valuable help in the same attractive ministration.

"One of the first ministers to stand at Mr. Moody's side, and place his large church at his disposal, was Dr. E. P. Goodwin. Since May last this building has been in no inconsiderable degree a scene of revival and blessing. This good pastor raised to himself many friends in the old country two years ago, when before the International Congregational Council he made a bold stand for the Evangelical truth as it had been held and preached by the early fathers of Congregationalism. All honour to those who are not bowing the knee to the cultured criticism, which presents another Gospel, or at the best an emasculation of the Word of Life. It would do some brethren good to see here the power of the simple Gospel of the grace of God.

"The present month has been marked by the engagement, until the Fair closes, of the Central Music Hall, situate upon the "Regent-street" of Chicago, where 2000 persons can be accommodated by its spacious auditorium. Here has been instituted a great city noon prayer-meeting which has been attended by a full audience. Mr. Moody presides, and various preachers exhort Christ, and from this centre blessing cannot but flow out.

"The most remarkable feature of the whole season is the silently-achieved triumph of the Lord's Day preservation. The Fair directors secured an injunction preventing the Exhibition from being closed on Sunday. Might triumphed over right for greed of gain. But this great people would not, and will not, go. The Sunday opening is a deserved failure; a few thousands attend, but not enough to meet the expenses entailed by opening. Thank God for this noble protest against the lawless judges and commissioners, who would unjustly destroy the sanctity and glory of the Day of Rest. Sound this glad fact throughout the world—the American people's voluntary defence of the Day of Rest, and home, and God. I quote actual figures to illustrate the position: Saturday, September 2, paid admissions, 152,063; Sunday, September 3, paid admissions, 25,439; Monday, September 4, paid admissions, 161,854."

THE GOSPEL IN FRANCE.

The work in France, conducted by Rev. William Gibson, under the direction of the Wesleyan Missionary Committee, continues to grow. This is evident from the fourteenth annual report, which opens: "God makes all things work together for good to the Mission, even its frequent failures and disappointments. Success inspires success, while failure guarantees against failure by teaching caution. Above all, we are proving more and more clearly our absolute dependence upon God for the 'increase.'"

While the head-quarters of the Mission are at 4, Rue Roquépine, Paris, there are several subsidiary centres of operations. Speaking of the general work, Mr. Gibson says: "We are thankful to find that our converts at once begin to look upon themselves as workers with us. A bright lad, of English origin, recently converted in the English work, is full of zeal, and his happy face is an inspiration to us. In the classes the testimonies are spontaneous. Clear notes of praise for deliverance from intemperance, from an evil life, from gambling, from anger, jealousy and repining, and last, but not least, from gossip. We try to give special attention to the young. The hope of the country is in the children, and by far the most valuable work that we or any other Christian workers can do, is to rescue the young from popery and atheism, and to train them in the Word of God."

Of the work at St. Denis, just outside Paris, we read: "We have a sturdy evangelist there, whose shaggy hair and beard and general demeanour suggest John the Baptist. During the last year he visited a man on his death bed, and was full of hope about him, but suddenly, towards the end, the Romanists interfered, and influenced the man to take the last communion from the priest, and he died nominally a Catholic. His old parents, however, read the Bible which he had left with them, and they found that it answered to the needs of their souls better than the ceremonies of the Church; accordingly they came boldly to the hall, and soon received the truth in the love of it, and joined the little society. The man has just died, triumphantly glorifying God in the midst of terrible sufferings, exhorting his friends and neighbours, and praising and rejoicing up to the last. The poor lonely widow keeps faithful, and is a splendid help in the meeting. There is a great work to be done at St. Denis, which is a crowded working-men's town, a stronghold of atheism and a perfect sink of iniquity."

The British Seamen's Institute at Rouen, under Rev. W. H. Sarchet, is a real boon to sailors, who use it in large numbers. The colporteur at Elbeuf, though now and then encouraged by meeting with souls really seeking after the truth, finds his work hard and depressing, the people being taught by the priests that "extreme damnation is the penalty of reading a Protestant book, and that the Protestant's Bible is a tissue of lies from beginning to end!"

At Hâvre, temperance work makes cheering progress, and various agencies are well maintained. In Brittany much ground is covered, as the workers have requisitioned bicycles. Being called "heretics and devils," they have to endure hardship. Writing of the district around St. Servan, M. Pallot, evangelist, says:—"One of the chief characteristics of the people is that they are of a deeply religious disposition; but theirs is a religion mixed with profound ignorance and extraordinary superstition. They submit themselves entirely to the priests, who cease not to use their authority with undiminishing force, not only in religious affairs, but in the social life of the people. We thank God, however, for the few faithful ones who form the nucleus of our little church."

In conclusion, Mr. Gibson observes: "We are cheered by many tokens for good, and look on these as proofs that God will abundantly pour out upon us his Holy Spirit. French people are decidedly religious, and we believe that, turning away from the superstitions of the ages as they are doing now, they will be inclined to accept a purer faith which will make them peaceful, happy, and free."

For the Young.

A LETTER FROM CHINA.

Dear Sunday-school Friends,

Perhaps you would like a letter from the riot district of mid-China. I suppose it would sound grand to begin with a sentence like "The doomed salute thee!" But here we are doomed to peace in the midst of danger, a spread table in the presence of our enemies, and an overflowing supply of goodness and mercy. Heaven is a cheerful place, and the nearer we may be to heaven the more ready to join our cheerful song

With angels round the throne.

The fact is that at ordinary times, folks are apt to dream about the heavenly Father and our Redeemer. As a hymn has it, Christ's voice sounds

Far, far away, like bells at evening pealing, just a nice dream, and little more. But when things seen and felt are the dream, and the unseen things are the real things of the heart, life becomes different. And to us heaven is very real, and very near. It is worth a little danger to find out how real and precious our Lord is. His promises are not like treasures, given us in dreams which vanish when we wake up. No, the Bible is so real, and so is the hymn-book, too. And I want you all, quite free from danger of being killed by mobs of men made savage, led captive by the devil at his will, to put your hand in that true dear hand of Jesus, "being taken captive by the Lord's servant unto the will of God." That is the new version, you know.

Well, it is Sunday morning in midsummer. You will probably picture

Golden summer days,
When skies are fair and happy flowers are dreaming.

But it is grey to-day, a dull, cloudy morning, a rest from the continual glare. Midnight shade and clouded sun speak more to us of heaven than the dreadful heat, and the dazzling reflections from whitewashed walls. The Chinese have a saying, "If you live through the middle of the seventh month, you may think yourself an image of iron." And, sad to say, while writing this sentence I was interrupted by a messenger with a notice that a Norwegian friend had died, and is to be buried this evening. A strong man, too. The oldest missionary in Central China—nearly forty years out here—is lying ill. He was hardly expected to live last Monday. I mean Dr. John. Our own Mr. Bramfitt has had to go away to Japan, and Dr. Hodge is not back yet from the Wusueh bungalow, which has just saved Mrs. Hodge's life. Cholera, dysentery, malarial fever are the dark angels which are calling many aside.

But to Christ's friends they are friends too. Christ is so loving that everything He sends is loving too. We can see through the angel's mask. And in the graveyard this evening I know they will sing. And what if we could hear the songs of those two dear Swedish martyrs to whom we sang the "Christian's good-night" a few days ago! Nothing in Handel or Haydn, or Beethoven or Mozart would compare with that song.

And you to-day will be meeting together in chapel. I should like to be there, and hear the sweet instrument, and join in the familiar hymns. Do you realise how grand it is thus to praise God? If you had not heard an organ for months or years, and thought the English service a big one when there were more than ten there, you would value those times.

At the beginning of the year, I was packed off to Shanghai, and then to Japan. The voluntary in the cathedral almost made me tremble with delight. And yet the folks there thought it very ordinary.

But perhaps we get a hint now and then of heaven's music. And sometimes we get a burst of the grand music of the home prayers. On Missionary Sunday before the May meetings, I was lying awake after two at night, and when the evening prayer in the chapels was being offered, the prayer wave came rolling on, and seemed to flood one's whole heart. Remember that true prayers are felt out here. Those offered in the early morning come to us in the early afternoon, seven and a-half hours' difference. And often when I am preaching to the heathen then there comes a burst of holy influence. And the listeners feel something unusual. See, that man has started to his feet and stands to hear the message of the Gospel! But they have to be real prayers, or they do not travel here.

There are friends out here who pray at stated times, and one can set a watch by their prayers. No need to ring a bell. The bells in one's heart ring for worship. So don't think it makes no difference whether you pray for us or not. It does. And we always need your prayers. There is always some danger, there are always some sick. We are like trees transplanted into a different soil, and the prayers are like someone watering the roots. And we never have a service without praying for the services in England. We have the start of you, and it is never too late on Sunday to pray for your evening worship.

But you must not think our smiles are fringed with crape. We are happy, and often merry. Why should we not be, with such a cheering work and such a loving Lord? Of course, we have our discouragements, but, of course, we have our heart encouragements every day. Then we feel at home here. I, for one, do not want to return to England. I suppose I shall have to when the time comes. But it will be like leaving home. There are many native Christians we learn to love here, and the Chinese outsiders have many likable points. Not so the Mandarins. They are the curse of China. They are cruel at heart and very treacherous. It is they who hate us and want the people to drive us out or kill us, as they did our two Swedish friends a month ago. And that mob of ten thousand, still unpunished, are only fifty odd miles off, little more than a day's journey. There is hope for them. But what hope for the hypocrites of Mandarins? All that Confucius has done for them has been to give them a few nice-sounding phrases, a pail of whitewash to whiten the sepulchre.

Their justice has been to seize the friends of the murdered men and torture them. The poor man who carried their water, has had an iron pin put through his shoulder after having hundreds of blows.

The Mandarins are just polished savages. If we were in Central Africa, or Fiji of sixty or seventy years back, it would not seem so strange. Folks talk very lightly of hell nowadays. Surely there must be an awful punishment for such vile men.

I hear the Pope is taking away St. George of England, and giving us St. Peter instead. St. Peter's writings are very helpful, and lead one near to God. But we have a Saviour who is the true St. George, and the old dragon, so terrible and deceitful, must fall beneath Him. We get to know a little about this dragon in China. He is full of twists and turns, and with a cruel head, ugly and fierce. The Imperial edict of 1891, which was hoped to prove the Magna Charta of missions here, had a frame of dragons. But we have promises which are sealed with Christ's blood, and fringed with a design of golden harps and crowns.

But have you, my dear boys and girls, given up your hearts to Him? Have you ever really said "Thank you" to Jesus? What a big "Thank you" He should have! Our mouths cannot utter it. Yes, they can a little, with cheerful songs and cheerful words to show others how lovely is our Redeemer. But when we have sung his praises and spoken about Him, we have only just begun. He gave Himself for me. I must give myself to Him. Won't you each say it? Just repeat the words over in your hearts, "I must give myself to Him," until you say, I will, "I will now: I do now." I do pray for you that all in the Sunday-school may come to Him now. Is there one who dares to say "I won't" to Jesus? Surely not.—Yours very sincerely,

Wm. A. Cornaby.

CHILDREN'S SCRIPTURE UNION.—Oct. 1, S., Psalms, cxviii. 1-14; 2, cxviii. 15-29; 3, Jeremiah vii. 1-16; 4, vii. 17-28; 5, x. 1-13; 6, xvii. 5-14; 7, xvii. 19-27.

CHILDREN'S MEDICAL MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—This agency, the children's auxiliary to the Medical Missionary Association, is in its nineteenth year. There are now twenty-eight branches, from whom ninety parcels of books, clothing, etc., were received during the past nine months. The financial statement is not discouraging. The report says:—"We have been able this year to give away £160 to various home and foreign medical mission causes. Those who read Medical Missions at Home and Abroad monthly will not need details here as to these causes. Those who do not do so, will do well to remember that our fifth two-yearly volume begins in October. Eighteenpence enclosed to Dr. Maxwell, 49, Highbury Park, N., will cover cost of magazine and postage for a year."

PRAYING TO KEEP HIS CLOTHES.

The Slum Sisters in the city of New York are doing a wonderful work. Only a few of the many know how they minister in the Master's name to the very poorest of the poor. Down into the lowest depths of poverty and degradation they go and feed the hungry, clothe the naked, take care of the sick, and do the last services for the dead. While the more fortunate of the city dwellers have been enjoying the summer outing in the beautiful country or on the seashore, these ministers for Christ have been working for Him in the dark, cheerless, stifling places of the most uncomfortable and repulsive portions of the city. They could fill volumes with facts more pathetic, more thrilling, and more sensational than any story of fiction ever told. Among the pathetic incidents is this one told by Mrs. Ballington Booth:—

The child was a boy scarcely more than four or five years old. His parents had evidently been sent to the Island, or had drifted away somewhere. When found crouched in a corner of a hallway one chilly night in March, he was but half-clad, and was numbed with exposure to the cold.

Taken into the barracks, the waif was washed and dressed in clean clothes, warmed, and fed. He was delighted with the attention that he received, and particularly with his garments, so much so, that when one of the Sisters attempted to undress him for bed, he cried, under the belief that he was about to be permanently deprived of his new apparel.

This was very apparent when the Sister attempted to teach him the words of the simple prayer, "Now I lay me down to sleep."

Kneeling beside him at the bedside, the Sister said, "Say these words after me: 'Now I lay me down to sleep.'"

Peeping between his fingers, the little fellow lisped, "Now I lay me down to sleep."

"I pray the Lord my soul to keep," continued the Sister.

"I pray the Lord my clothes to keep," whispered the boy.

"No, not 'clothes to keep'; 'soul to keep,'" corrected the Sister.

"Soul to keep," said the boy.

"Now say it from the beginning," urged the worker in the slums. "Now I lay me down to sleep, I pray the Lord my soul to keep."

But the poor little fellow was too intent upon his treasures. "Now I lay me down to sleep, I pray the Lord my clothes to keep," he said, making the same mistake as before.

"No, no; that is not right," spoke the painstaking Sister. "You should pray God to care for you soul, not your clothes. I'll take care of those."

"And won't you pawn them?" replied the lad, to the astonishment of the Sister, "and buy rum with them? That's what they always did at home when I had new clothes."

Tears filled the eyes of the Slum Sister, but she brushed them aside as she kissed the child. His few words of precocious knowledge had revealed to her the story of his brief life, and she needed no more to tell her of the misery of his home. Although he finally mastered his little prayer, it was with the words, "I pray the Lord my clothes to keep," on his lips that he fell asleep.

CHILDREN'S S.S. MISSION.—SEASIDE SERVICES, 1893 Mr. H. Hutchinson, Admiral-street Hall, Liverpool, to Sept. 29; Grosvenor Hall, Rathmines, Dublin, Sept. 30 to Oct. 9; Mr. J. S. Tyler; Clarendon Villas Mission Hall, West Brighton, Sept. 30 to Oct. 9 (Mr. Edward Hughes will assist Oct. 6 to 8); Mr. G. Goodman, Baptist Chapel, Upper Holloway, to Sept. 29; Rev. M. J. Hall, St. Matthew's, Red Hill, Sept. 30 to Oct. 9; Mr. H. B. Claxton, St. John's, Upper Holloway, Sept. 30 to October 10; Barmouth Sands, Mr. Josiah Spiers and Mr. Robert Westall, till Oct. 6.

The annual seaside meetings to hear reports from workers will take place on Thursday, Oct. 12, at St. Martin's Town Hall, Trafalgar-square. Rev. E. A. Stuart, M.A., presides in afternoon at three o'clock; Colonel Wellesley Robinson, C.B., in the evening, 6.30 p.m.

THE CHILDREN'S AND INVALIDS' DINNER TABLE AND SOUP KITCHEN, 60, Paddington-street, High-street, Marylebone, W., is a charitable agency whereby the poor and neglected are helped during the winter months. The report, just issued, shows that from November, 1892, to May, 1893, some 589 children dined at the tables, and 2898 dinners were sent to sick children and adult invalids at their homes. The benefits of the dinners were extended to the parishes of Christ Church, Lisson Grove, and St. Paul, Marylebone. Friends who wish to buy tickets for distribution may procure them at the dinner-room.

NOTES ON DAILY READINGS.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 1.—PSALM LII.

1 Sam. xxii. gives the clue to this psalm. But the mighty man, addressed in ver. 1, is probably not Doeg, but Saul. How good it is to turn from our persecutors and enemies to the mercy of our God, which endures continually and saves us from their hands.

The deceitful tongue (2-5). The Psalmist addresses the tongue, as the source of the evil it spreads. But, of course, the evil lies deeper, in the heart, from the abundance of which the mouth speaks. We may judge of the inner evil by its issues in speech and act. Though so much is known by our fellows, how much there is within us all that is known only to ourselves and God. Who would not dread the unloosened tongue of high fever or insanity? We have great need to ask the Spirit of God to cleanse the thoughts of our heart by his inspiration. It will be found that the repression of wrong words will have a marvellous effect on wrong thoughts. Its doom (6-7). The doom that came to Saul comes here and hereafter to all who resemble Him. The only secret of permanence is to make God our strength, and to trust not in the abundance of his gifts, but in the royal and munificent giver.

The contrast (8-9). Yonder lies the uprooted tree (5), but here there grows the green olive, the type of grace, the oil of the Holy Ghost. And all around is the encircling presence of God. Here are three good resolves: never to distrust God's mercy; never to cease giving thanks; and never to swerve from that attitude of calm waiting, of interior recollection, which is the true attitude of humility and fellowship.

MONDAY, OCTOBER 2.—PSALM LIII.

Very similar to xiv. Though the aspect there is rather toward the righteous, by way of consolation, whilst this is directed against the wicked, in warning (Kay). Seven times the word God (Elohim) is used.

(1) It is a foolish thing to say that there is no God, but more foolish still to think it. More say it, however, than believe it. Many keep saying it, to keep their courage up, but they know that they are trying to hoodwink themselves. Corruption and atheism are first cousins. The atheism of Voltaire prepared for the excesses of the Revolution. (2) God is always in search of those that will worship Him in spirit and in truth, our Master told us so. (3) In God's sight shall no man living be justified. There is sin enough in the holiest day of the holiest man to make him seem vile before the eyes of the all-holy God. (4) Ignorance, ruthless oppression and cruelty, prayerlessness, are the three characteristics of a godless soul. (5) The corresponding verse in the duplicate Psalm describes God as being within the tents of the righteous. Here He issues forth to war for them, and to destroy their foes. (6) This prayer is a prophecy. The Redeemer shall come to Zion (Psa. lix. 20). And that time shall be associated with the repentance and forgiveness of the chosen people (Acts iii. 19). Let us ask God to bring again the captivity of our hearts, and of our churches, that circles of joy may spread outward to cover the world.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 3.—PSALM LIV.

1 Sam. xxiii. 19 gives the keynote to the psalm. The heart that walks in fellowship with God finds themes for its songs alike in the treachery of false friends, and the deliverances of its God. A prayer for help (1-3). The wronged saint longs to be vindicated as well as saved; not for the sake of his character so much as that no stigma may rest on that holy name by which he is called. For this vindication we must patiently wait, but sooner or later it will come. It is a great assistance to utter words in prayer. Pray audibly where possible.

The assurance of deliverance (4-7). To the eye of the Psalmist, there were two contending forces—those against and those with him; and amongst the latter he reckoned God as his great ally. The child of God living amid the seen and material is always conscious of being in alliance with God, who waits within the shadow to succour him. There is a comradeship, a hallowed companionship, a blessed fellowship between souls which are living on God's plan and God. Such reckon confidently on his help. "He shall requite." And even in the dark valley of shadow, the fragrant smoke of the free-will offering is seen ascending. Before the victory is accomplished, the songs of thanksgiving arise. So sure is the believer of deliverance, that he counts it already his own. He hath delivered: mine eye hath seen. Faith gives substance to things hoped for. It is the evidence of things not seen. And hope takes her harp and sings, for she cannot be ashamed.

WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 4.—PSALM LV.

The rebellion of Absalom and the treachery of Ahithophel suggested this Psalm (2 Sam. xv. 12). But how exactly it has described the experience of the saints at the hands of Judases, and Alexanders, in all ages. Many of these sentences might have been minted, as they were certainly appropriated, by our Lord Himself.

The general prevalence of wickedness (1-11). The timidity of the natural heart of the believer is set forth in many touching expressions. I am restless and moan (2). My heart is sore-pained (4). Fearfulness, trembling, horror (5). The dove is an apt symbol of defenceless innocence. But it is a mistake to think that flight will bring relief. We shall not get rest by flying from outward circumstances. The only storm and tempest that we need dread are those within, not without, the heart. There is no shelter from care and sorrow save the bosom of Jesus, who says, "Come unto Me, and I will give you rest." Stay where you are, and abide in Him.

A particular foe (12-15, 20-21). The evil that David dreaded focussed itself into one central figure, who had been formerly his bosom friend. Ah, it is bitter when love turns to hate, and wine to vinegar!

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 5.—PSALM XLI.

1 Sam. xxi. 11-15 should be read with this psalm, as having suggested it. It bitterly tells the beads of sorrow, but breaks out now and again in beautiful expressions of trust and exulting hope. (1) When man threatens his worst, he is the thunder cloud, on which the rainbow of mercy lies. (2) Those who are exposed to spiritual torture, through unholy companionships, all the day long, will appreciate this threefold reference to its long persistency. (3) It is good to trust when you are afraid, it is better to trust and not be afraid. (4) What a magnificent contrast between God and flesh. Flesh, what is it? It is as grass. It soon dies or corrupts. It is a veil. What is mortal man as compared with the Eternal? (5-8) The gleam of light is followed by the dark shadow of cloud, as the Psalmist turns from God to enumerate his griefs. The wrested words: the malignant thoughts: the espied steps: the hovering vulture-like waiting for his soul: the wanderings and the tears. This is how devils hate us. (9-11) Faith's certainties assert themselves again. God is with us, and at the voice of our cry He shall do for us as He did for the hunted patriarch (Gen. xxxi. 55). We shall praise God (the strong) and Jehovah (the redeemer). And so the refrain of ver. 4 breaks out again in ver. 11. (12-13) Fresh deliverances demand fresh vows of consecration. And remember that He who delivered your soul from death can keep your feet from falling. He reconciled you to God by his death. He will save and keep you in his life.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 6.—PSALM LVII.

The cave of Adullam, like Bunyan's den, was dark enough, but it became the home of song (1 Sam. xxi. 10-15; xxii. 1). The psalm consists of two strophes, each of which ends with the same refrain (5, 11). The desire of the believer is that all his sorrows should issue in the exaltation of Christ. "That Christ may be magnified in my body, whether by life or death."

First strophe (1-5). In intense prayer we use the same words. As the chick puts its mother's wing between itself and danger, so the soul God. Let God be your cave. Trust Him to perform all things for you. Nothing is too small or too hard for Him. Mercy and truth are a good escort. Daniel in the lion's den was in better plight than those whose enemies speak arrows and javelins, but the angel of the Lord is near to protect and deliver.

Second strophe (6-11). Evil comes home to roost. What men do to others, is done to them. Begin to observe this. The fixed heart is determined to serve God, to trust and wait for Him, to praise Him. Yes, and it should be fixed in determination, by the power of the Holy Spirit, to awake the dawn. There is no time like the morning-hour for praise and prayer. Watch the morning-watch.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 7.—PSALM LVIII.

This awful outbreak of righteous indignation seems to have been occasioned by unjust judges, who perverted judgment and took bribes.

Their sin (1-5). "Do ye indeed speak righteousness, O ye mighty ones?" (1 R.V. marg.). The sin of man must be traced back to their birth, and to the corruption of the race. The word translated poison is "burning-hot." Such is the effect of venomous, wicked words—"injected from the venom of that great serpent" (Kay). So dense and hard is the heart of man that the sweet strains of the Gospel awaken in him no response.

Their doom (6-9). The Spirit of God, speaking through the Psalmist, predicts the destiny of such. For let them, read they shall. Notice these striking similitudes. The lion's broken jaw-teeth, the ebbing waters, the snail dried up by the intense heat, an untimely birth, fire dying out from the quick-burning thorn, the whirlwind which nothing can withstand.

Their contrast (10, 11). The righteous rejoice, not in the agony of their foes, but in the vindication of the poor, and of the Divine character. The metaphor of washing the feet in blood is a very strong one. It simply expresses the joy which must fill every holy heart, that evil is not permitted to triumph, but carries in itself the seeds of dissolution. Wait patiently, O righteous but persecuted man, thou shalt garner the fruit (R.V.) of thy sorrows.

INTERNATIONAL S. S. LESSONS.

OCTOBER 8.

REDEMPTION IN CHRIST.

GOLDEN TEXT, Rom. iii. 19-26, v. 23.

THE theme of this lesson is well suggested by the Golden Text. To justify is to account and declare righteous. It is more than pardon. A justified man is not merely one whose sin is forgiven, but for whom every claim of justice has been answered. David describes it in Ps. xxxii. 2, "The man to whom the Lord imputeth not iniquity." This is the blessing we all need, and which God would have us possess now.

How difficult it is (19)!—Imagine a court of justice—a prisoner charged with crime—witnesses called—a verdict of "Guilty" given—how can such a man be pronounced just? That is what the Gospel does. See how already the apostle has proved all men—Gentiles (i. 21-32) and Jews (ii., iii. 1-19) to be guilty. How can the same God who has declared their guilt declare the same persons to be not only innocent, but righteous? If the Bible were closed, man would never be able to answer Job's question (Job ix. 2). The conviction and confession of guilt is the first condition of justification. Until the "mouth is stopped," and man, instead of justifying himself, acknowledges his sin, it is impossible for him to be justified. The Pharisee justified himself, therefore God condemned him. The publican condemned himself, and went away justified (Luke xviii.). Would you be justified? Begin by pleading guilty. Do not waste time in futile attempts to excuse or to remove your guilt. Your fitness for being justified by God is your need of justification.

How impossible it is by the Law (20).—Understand the term law as including Jews and Gentiles alike. It means all attempts of man to justify himself by his own works, whether by the observance of outward ceremony, amendment of the life, or frequent prayers. Scripture very often declares the impossibility of salvation by law. (See Psa. cxliii. 2, Gal. ii. 16.) Proof that it is not by law is found in the fact that Abraham, the friend of God, and David, the man after God's own heart, were justified by faith (Rom. iv. 2-8). Is the law, then, useless? No, for by it we have "the knowledge of sin." It is not intended to remove sin but to reveal it. Its work is to condemn, not to justify. It shows a man his true character. A mirror is useful for showing a man his need of cleansing, but is useless to effect the cleansing. Don't misuse the Law of God. It was never intended either to make men righteous, or to keep them so. It achieved its true purpose in Paul (vii. 7-10). There is no hope for any of us until the door of salvation by works is effectually closed against us.

God's method of effecting it (21-26).—Many very important things connected with God's way of salvation are in these verses. (1) Its source is the grace of God (24). God loves men even though his law condemns them. While confessing the guilt with which He charges you believe also that He loves you (Jno. iii. 16). (2) Its principle is "righteousness." The Gospel is not only a display of mercy toward the sinner, but of righteousness in the punishment of the sin. Note the frequent reference to this in these verses (21, 22, 25, 26). Whether God condemns or saves "justice and judgment" must be "the foundation of his throne" (Psa. lxxxix. 13). (3) Its basis is the atonement of Jesus Christ (24, 25). God forgives and justifies no man except on the ground of what Jesus has done. The death of Christ was the ransom price that secured for us redemption from the guilt and condemnation of sin. He is the place of meeting between God, the Holy One, and sinners, who are exposed to wrath. The propitiatory or mercy seat (25) was sprinkled with the blood of the atonement (Lev. xvi. 15). The victim offered for the sins of the people was the type of Jesus our Sin Offering, hence God could "pass over sins" committed before the actual atonement was made. Why was such a basis necessary? In order that the righteousness of God might appear. A little girl had been disobedient. Her father ordered her to stand outside the room for five minutes. The punishment was a severe one to her, and she wept bitterly as she went to obey. She had not been outside a minute before her brother opened the door, came and stood in her place, and said, "I will take your punishment." She went into the room, sat at the table, and when the five minutes had expired, her brother sat with her too. We are saved because Jesus has stood in our place. (4) The condition of it brings it near to us all. It is "freely"—unmerited—"without money and without price." Our hymn expresses it—"Nothing in my hand I bring." And "by faith"—not the mere assent of the understanding, but the removal of our trust from anything in ourselves to what Jesus did for us. It is without any distinction (22). In this matter the Jew and the Gentile—the learned and the unlearned—the moral and the immoral—are on the same ground.

The Holy Spirit's Work.*

BY REV. J. CULROSS, D.D.,
Principal of Baptist College, Bristol.

To know God is the first necessity of our being. Other wants may cry out more loudly and imperiously, but none is so profound. Is He a "Thou," or merely an algebraic expression summing up the forces of the universe? If He is a "Thou," what is his name? What is his character? What is his attitude toward us? What is in his heart? Does he care for us? Will He stoop to our prayer? Is there forgiveness with Him? What purpose is He working out? Is there a Beyond and Hereafter? If there is, what will be his aspect when we meet Him there? Questions like these concern universal man. They are old, yet ever new. They were asked yesterday; they will be asked again to-morrow, just as if they had never been asked before. And there can be no true rest for conscience and heart till a satisfying answer is found.

There are many things that we find out for ourselves by searching. We interrogate nature; we make one discovery after another; we correct our old mistakes; and so we rise into higher and higher knowledge. It is in this way that physical science has been built up. Slowly and laboriously we have found things out by searching—a searching, indeed, in which we have not been without God, but in which only the natural light has shone.

But the answer to those questions about God which press upon the conscience and the heart is not got by a scientific interrogation of nature. Chemistry, for example, does not answer—does not profess to answer—a single one of them. Geology does not answer them. Astronomy does not answer them. Go round the circle, and every science says: These questions do not belong to my province; I cannot answer them; you must go somewhere else. Nature strives to utter God's name, but cannot speak plain. She tells us something, but not enough. She leaves our greatest questions unanswered or uncertainly answered, and our most dread. Where our need is sorest Nature is dumb.

How, then, does the knowledge of God come to us? As the Lord Jesus tells us—by a Divine revealing. Such a revealing had been going on throughout the past, in manifold and wondrous ways, the story of which is treasured up in the ancient Scriptures. It was not merely that instincts were implanted in the soul, and yearnings created, and that God's works and providence bore unceasing witness to his living presence; but He had gone on disclosing Himself, over great sweeps of time, patiently, in manifold ways—by vision, voice, and otherwise—the light increasing from age to age. It is true that the holiest of all was veiled, but his disclosures of Himself led up to and prepared for the hour when the veil should be rent and access into his presence should be free.

The supreme manifestation is made in the only begotten Son. Whosoever would know that Being who is the first Cause and the last End of all things, who fills immensity and eternity with his sovereign presence—let him look to Jesus of Nazareth; for in Him is God manifested. It is not merely that He made, but that He is, the revelation. The whole truth that we need to know, as creatures and as sinners, is contained germinally in his person as He is set forth in the Gospel record.

Yet even the personal attendants of Jesus, eye and ear witnesses though they were of the Divine revelation, understood Him very imperfectly. He might have said to more than Philip: "Have I been so long time with you, and yet hast thou not known Me?" As curtain-folds hung across a window intercept the light that beats against it, so heavy curtain-folds of prejudice, miseducation, carnal liking, hindered the entrance of the truth into their minds. Hence, on the eve of his departure from their midst, He gave them the great promise of the Holy Ghost, the Comforter, to be their teacher. I cannot set forth even in outline all that the promise involved; but I would name one or two things that

STAND OUT MORE PROMINENTLY.

"He shall glorify Me." He would do so, as the sun by his shining glorifies the landscape—not creating, but showing what is there. In other words, the Comforter would make clear to the disciples what they had so dimly perceived, the ineffable glory of the Saviour in his person and work and character and suffering love and saving grace and power. Again: "He shall bring all things to your remembrance." In the light of these words, I see in the four Gospels not a mere specimen of treasured recollections stored in the memory of loving friends, but a statement of facts whose trustworthiness is Divinely guaranteed—if you like to phrase it so, an inspired biography of our Lord. Taking for example the discourses of Jesus recorded in the fourth Gospel, it has been objected that the Evangelist could not possibly have retained them in his memory in such minuteness, vividness, and fulness for so many years. The answer to the objection is here: The Holy Ghost, the Comforter, "when He is come, shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have spoken unto you."

Then there is the great promise: "He shall lead you into all the truth (that is, of course, as the truth is in Jesus) . . . . and will show you things to come." How vast in their sweep and how profound these words are, I cannot set forth, but would only note the pledge they give of a Divine guiding into truth, in its fulness and unity, as a harmonious whole. The Lord had taught his disciples many things when He was with them; but he had still many things to say to them, for which they were not yet prepared, and which they could not yet bear. Did He ever say them? Yes. When and how? After his ascension, by the ministry of the Comforter, according to the word: "He shall not speak of himself, but whatsoever he heareth shall he speak," conveying the things of Christ to the disciples, and explaining the significance both of his life and death. The things are to be sought, not in tradition but in the Acts and Letters of the Apostles and the book of Revelation, where they are preserved as a heritage for all Christian ages.

With this agrees what Paul says: "Ye know the commandments we gave you by the Holy Ghost. . . . He therefore that despiseth, despiseth not man but God, who hath also given us his Holy Spirit." Again: "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love Him. But God hath revealed them to us by his Spirit. . . . that we may know the things that are freely given to us of God, which things we also speak, not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth." Once more, speaking of the mystery of Christ, which in other ages was not made known unto the sons of men, the Apostle declares that it "is now revealed unto his holy apostles and prophets by the Spirit." Any criticism of the New Testament which overlooks this, or makes nothing of it, which pits Christ against Paul, and babbles about "the dimness of Apostolic Christianity"—any such criticism omits the most important data of all, and has to begin again at the beginning.

But the giving of the sacred writings by Divine inspiration does not exhaust our Lord's promise. As the Apostles needed the Holy Spirit's grace to pen those writings, to enter into them and come under their power. Look at the case in this way. A good schoolbook in a boy's hand does not of necessity ensure the acquisition of knowledge: there must be also a learner's spirit. And as much depends on this as on the schoolbook. So with regard to Divine things. On our part there must be childlike humility, which implies a meek and quiet spirit, a circumcised heart, an obedient will, and fearless surrender to God. Pride, self-sufficiency, and insincerity shut out the light. On the other hand, God giveth grace to the humble. He takes them into his intimacies, and shows them his holy covenant. Higher than intellect, higher than learning, higher than the critical faculty, however finely tempered and keenly sharpened, higher even than genius, is childlike humility. It has no prepossessions. It lies open to the light; it lies open to God; and God has pleasure in imparting. And so it comes to pass that many a plain man, with no special mental endowments, and no advantages of education, has an insight into Divine truth, and a comprehension of it, to which scholars and philosophers are strangers. To affirm all this is to affirm the necessity for the knowledge of the things of God, of the renewing and teaching of the Holy Ghost—the Creator of childlikeness. With hearts and minds surrendered to him, the Bible becomes a new book to us; words that perplexed us become plain: dim pages become luminous and radiant with sweet meaning; truths that had stood separate and even in seeming antagonism, become reconciled; the soul's horizon is widened: and fields are illumined that before had lain in obscurity or darkness. This is not matter for logical argument, but for the test of experience.

NOT LESS DO WE NEED HIS GRACE

Accepting Christ's word, I believe in a real personal teaching of the Holy Ghost, mysterious in its mode, but blissful in its results—a teaching whereby we cease from mere notions and opinions, and come to "know"—a teaching which does not supersede patient study, but is its gracious reward—which does not dispense with the Bible but honours it. To some this may appear an opening of the door to the wildest extravagance and fanaticism; in point of fact, it is our true safeguard against error, and our true security for sobermindedness. The subject is one of unspeakable importance to-day. The doctrine of Divine teaching has a place in our creeds: too often it is practically ignored. This ignoring is of this or any age. And it will be one of the most hopeful of signs when we humbly confess our foolishness and ignorance and say from the heart, "I believe in the Holy Ghost."

I have said nothing, and have nothing to say against the severest scientific and critical investigation. The man who would forbid this is no friend to truth, and simply betrays by his fears his own secret doubt or unbelief. To stifle inquiry is to create suspicion that the Bible will not stand examination. I know there is a criticism—from which may God deliver us—which calls forth the rebuke, "Thou savourest not the things that be of God, but those that be of men"—a criticism which mistakes plausible conjecture for proof—a criticism which, for all its learning and intellectual acumen, manifests the sheerest incapacity of spiritual thought—a criticism arrogant and lordly, vainly puffed up in its fleshly mind—a criticism which judges by a standard of its own what is credible and what is incredible, and which has forgotten that Jesus Christ says:—"The Word that I have spoken the same shall judge you in the last day." But all criticism is not of such kind, and need not be so, as the memory of a man like Tregelles reminds us.

The fundamental thing is that all our investigations be prosecuted in the spirit of childlike humility, with reverent faith in God, and a sense of responsibility and willingness to do his will. The words of the Apostle are profoundly significant in this connection: "The natural man"—the man whose intellectual nature is awake, while his spiritual nature is dormant and unquickened—this man "receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God; they are foolishness to him; neither can he know them because they are spiritually discerned." The meaning of words and the rules of grammar are the same, yet we cannot examine sacred Scripture as we should examine any other ancient writing—say a Tragedy of Euripides or the Odes of Horace. The Bible makes appeal to another set of faculties within us, and no man can enter into its thoughts apart from a quickened spiritual nature, a heart-felt consciousness of sin, and what I may call a sense of God. The starting-point of all true criticism (even of the letter) is here: "Ye must be born again."

* Notes of the "Annual Address" at the Evangelical Alliance in Dublin, Tuesday, September 26.

"SOUTH AFRICAN KESWICK."—The programme of this annual fixture, to be held October 25-27, shows that it is hoped that Rev, Andrew Murray will preside over a representative gathering at Wellington. Rev. Walter Searle, secretary of the Cape General Mission, writes:—"This is the third annual gathering of the kind, and I have met with several instances that show how much God has used the Convention for the deepening of spiritual life. Necessarily, the meetings are not so large as in England, because of the distances being so great and the population so sparse in South Africa. The subject chosen for consideration is 'Perfect Love.' In his letter of invitation to Christians of all denominations in South Africa, Mr. Murray reminds us that 'the memory of the very rich blessing enjoyed in the past makes us long that a still larger number may gather to help us with their prayer and faith, and to share with us in what our God waits to give, as his children gather before Him in special expectation of his presence and power.' May I ask all readers of The Christian to join us in prevailing supplication that a powerful revival may start from these coming meetings."

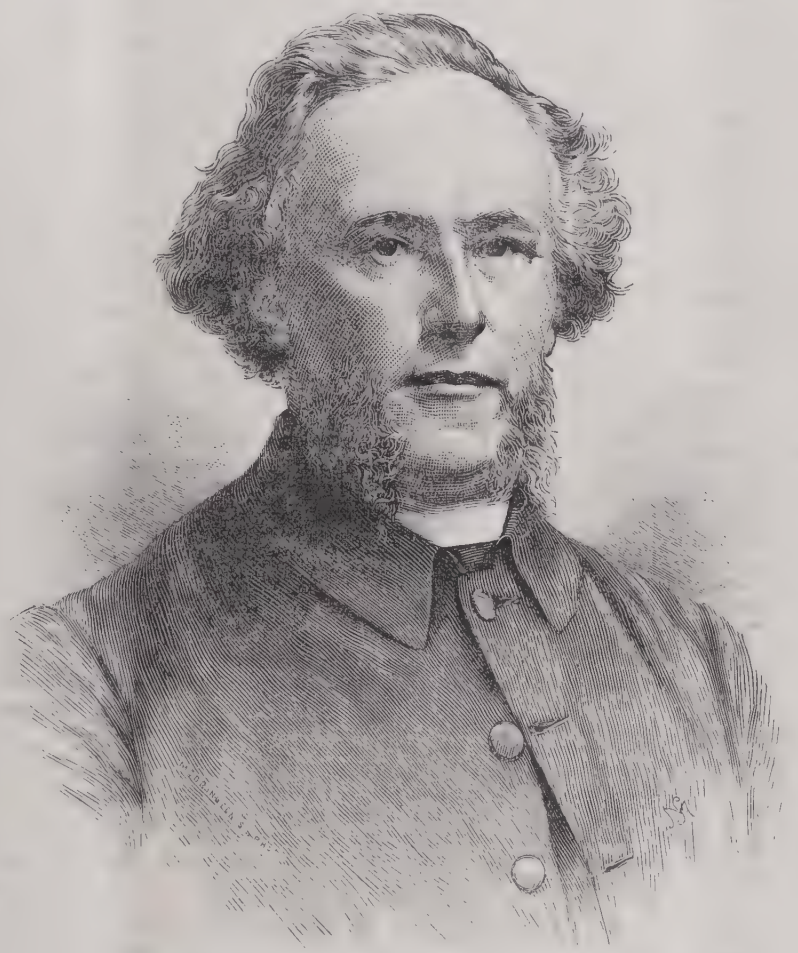
REV. J. B. WADDINGTON,

VICAR OF LOW MOOR, CLITHEROE.

THE subject of this sketch may be regarded as a typical Lancashire man. He was born at Manchester in 1835, and, having been brought to Christ in early life, has been labouring in his Master's vineyard ever since. Like many other God-used men, he received a special training for the work of the ministry in the school of trial; difficulties, both many and great, opposed themselves to his youthful desire to take "orders" in the Church in which he has since been made a vicar. These, however, were overcome. He was ordained to the curacy of Slaidburn in 1863, and there began to preach to others the Gospel, so dear to his own soul, with marvellous tokens of God's favour attending the Word. The characteristics of his early teaching are its characteristics still. With Mr. Waddington, the new birth becomes an absolute necessity to everyone who would enter the kingdom of heaven; and man's salvation is only, and wholly, grounded on the atoning work of the Lord Jesus.

From Slaidburn he went to Burton-on-Trent, to work with Rev. Chas. Guest, the vicar of Christ Church. There he commenced services in a disused factory, down by the waterside; these were, possibly, owned of God more even than the work at Slaidburn. All kinds of characters were converted to God—some, to testify to the power of the grace that had saved them, and then to "go home" to come, to live on and labour for the Lord almost as successfully as the honoured instrument used in bringing them to Christ.

From a human point of view, it appeared a mistake for Mr. Waddington to leave Burton; the success of his ministry had been so marked. But from Burton he was sent to Low Moor, Clitheroe, where he has lived and laboured to the present time, the church and he being thoroughly well known through all that corner of the country. There are less than seventeen hundred souls in the parish; many of these have no connection with the Established Church, yet, while none but believers are encouraged to approach "the Lord's table," there are between three and four hundred communicants on the church roll.



Mr. Waddington was the founder of the Evangelical Protestant Union, the most Protestant, probably, of all the Evangelical societies connected with the Church of England. Representing the Puritan element in the Establishment, the E.P.U. has nailed its colours to the mast, with the determination to surrender nothing of Evangelical doctrine or principle to the ever-growing sacerdotal party. It has become the opinion of some that it would be well if this might absorb the many lesser bodies of Protestants that, scattered up and down through the land, without any cohesion, are only just able to hold their own against their more powerful opponents, and thus present to the Romanising section of the Church a more solid phalanx of men prepared to contend for New Testament truth than its members have yet encountered.

At one time, Mr. Waddington was well-known as a "mission" preacher. Blessed results attended many of his missions, though from a dread of hurrying souls into a false peace, he was ever cautious in his methods. His idea was to let the Word of God do its own work, and to direct his appeals rather to the conscience than to the mere emotions. As a consequence, numbers of his hearers were led to see themselves so utterly lost, apart from the work of the Lord Jesus, that Christ exclusively became and remained their only hope of salvation.

It has been, however, as a tract writer that our friend has most distinguished himself. Nearly eight million copies of his tracts and booklets have been put into circulation. Many of these have been translated into other languages, and striking testimony to their wholesome influence has been received by their writer from nearly all parts of the earth.

Like his sermons, Mr. Waddington's writings are made very clear by illustration, while left singularly free from ornamentation. In them no words are wasted, but in each one there is a definite purpose, which every reader may readily perceive. His style is somewhat rugged, perhaps; but, as a gentleman once remarked, after reading one of the tracts, "it tells."

The Clitheroe Tract Depôt has for years been managed by a lady, who, brought to God through Mr. Waddington's instrumentality in the earlier part of his career, has devoted nearly the whole of her life to this special work. A younger sister in Christ resides with her, and the two find their own time fully occupied in answering demands made on that of their friend and pastor by his many and scattered correspondents the wide world over.

(Messrs. Medrington and Company, Limited, 29, Bold-street, Liverpool.)

If the vicar of Low Moor had not been called to the nobler work of the ministry, he would probably have made his mark as an artist. His leisure time has been but little, for he has never had a curate, but it has ever been his delight, when he has found a spare hour on hand, to use his pencil or brush, the outcome of this fondness for artistic pursuits being a fine collection of pictures and sketches for the adornment of the vicarage rooms.

Mrs. Waddington shares with her husband the love and esteem of a very large circle of Christian acquaintances. Denied for several years, by weakness, the privilege of engaging in more active work, she has accepted, as her part in connection with the church, the duty of praying for the other workers.

Three sons have been given to them, one of whom is already in the Church; and if each of these shall not live to preach the Gospel, so dear to both their parents, when their father's tongue has been stilled by death, it will not be for the lack of many and earnest prayers that have gone up to God from Christian friends.

As it is now a settled idea with many that an ornate service has become almost necessary to secure to a church a congregation of working men and women—were some who are inclined to such an opinion to pay a visit to Low Moor Church, they would probably come away with the changed feeling that a service, Puritanic in its simplicity, when supplemented by the preaching of the pure Gospel, may still be used and enjoyed, even by large congregations.

The Church of Christ wants more pastors of the type of Mr. Waddington, for whose continued usefulness our readers will, we are sure, join us in earnest prayer to God.

IN THE HOP GARDENS.

A LANTERN MISSION.

Increasing attention is being devoted to the thousands of men, women, and children who invade Kent in August and September for the hop-picking, and during the season just concluded many workers have been actively engaged in all directions. At a conference of mission-workers recently held at Hunton, near Maidstone, under the presidency of the Bishop of Dover, various methods of reaching the pickers were discussed, and, among others, the use of the magic lantern was strongly advocated by Rev. W. F. Cobb, of Nettlestead. This comparatively new departure has proved very effective in the districts where it has been made, especially in the parishes of East Malling, Teston, and Wateringbury, where thousands of "pickers" take up their temporary residence in tents, "hopper-houses," or caravans.

During the day intelligence is circulated among the pickers at work in the hop-gardens that a lantern service will be held at a given centre in the evening, and this ensures a large audience. The sheet upon which the slides are exhibited is either suspended between two hop-poles or nailed to one of the adjacent buildings, while the lantern is manipulated by Mr. Colby (one of the pioneers in this form of effort). First a hymn is projected on the sheet, and the singing is generally of a hearty character. A slide is then exhibited showing the words "Let us pray," and a brief earnest petition is offered. By this time the numbers are augmented, perhaps, to 500 or 600.

In addition to the Scriptural subjects, it has been found that stories of a high moral and religious tone are calculated to attract the people, and "A Peep Behind the Scenes," "Alone in London," "Mother's Last Words," "Given in Charge," and others, have been used. The last meeting at Teston, under the presidency of the Rev. C. F. Cobb, was specially impressive. As the story, narrated by one of the workers, was unfolded, and the slides thrown upon the screen, the interest and attention of the crowd were all that could be desired. From time to time the speaker found convenient opportunities for appealing to his audience to accept Christ as their personal Saviour and guide, and down the face of more than one onlooker could be discerned the silent tear.

Who can tell the result of these well-organised and systematic efforts to bless the lives of the London poor? Who knows what memories have been aroused by the stories to which they have listened? It is an indisputable fact that the demeanour of the pickers greatly improves from year to year, and this of itself is sufficient to encourage those who labour thus among their less fortunate brethren. A. W. R.

HEREFORD AND WORCESTER HOP-YARDS.

Under the auspices of Mr. T. S. Heley, we have had the joy of visiting the hop-yards in Hereford and Worcester, singing, preaching, and distributing tracts, and reaching, as far as we can calculate, 10,890 pickers. This has been the eleventh year of the work, and its need is as great as ever, many of the people telling us we were the only ones who brought the good news. We are now so well known that our visits are looked for. "Thought you were dead," said a man we met in the road, who had not happened to see us for two years. An old gipsy couple met year by year, were delighted to see us again. "My husband had a tract of you last year, and we have read it again and again with tears, and have lent it to several others." After a short meeting in the hop-yard, a rough, tall gipsy-looking man stepped up, and with a grip of iron, said, "God bless your mission." In another yard, as we left, they started, "God be with you till we meet again," and to this music we passed from the field.

It was Sunday evening; only one man was visible at the farm. "They're up there enjoying themselves," was his explanation of the whereabouts of his mates. We pushed forward, and he followed to find a shed in which the said enjoyment was going on. As rough a lot of men as we could wish; but they put out what forms they had, sat down and took off their caps, and we had as orderly a service as could be imagined. Later that same Sunday we went to a public-house where hundreds of hop-pickers were gathered. We started a hymn, and were soon surrounded by a crowd who joined in the song, and afterwards listened to the old story.

Our last meeting was with a large company who had just finished their work. They gathered round, sat on the ground, and listened to our addresses with an eagerness that was our best reward. We parted with a song about meeting "in the sweet by and by." As a wagon-load passed us on the way to the station, a lad called out, "Good-bye, sir; see you again next year." William Luff.

AN ANTI-OPIUM WITNESS.

We append some extracts from a letter dated Kiu-Kiang, July 4, 1893, written by Marshall Broomhall to his father, Mr. B. Broomhall, who recently gave evidence before the Opium Commission:—

It is perfectly appalling that anyone should seek to justify the trade, and the most charitable judgment that can be passed on those who do is that they are ignorant of the subject. The Chinaman's conscience needs no education upon the question of opium. I have never yet met a native who has not acknowledged that opium-smoking was a sin. Were any natives asked what constitutes a sin, almost invariably he would answer—profligacy, opium-smoking, wine-drinking, and gambling.

I would that those who speak lightly of these things could have stood in my shoes a few weeks ago. When speaking to a few natives who were around me about the Gospel a gentlemanly Chinaman addressed me. He proved to have been private secretary to one of the Embassy, and had visited England, France, America. Never before have I been made to feel such real shame for my country as on that occasion, as for fully two hours he spoke without reserve of what he had seen and knew. The opium trade and the wars consequent were the chief subjects of his talk, on which subjects he was thoroughly conversant, having also been to India. He said he had noticed that the opium merchants themselves did not smoke, they knew better; but their greed made them willing to get rich by the ruin of other people. In vain did I endeavour to show that many of our people abhorred the trade. "Yes," he said, "I know all about the Anti-opium Guild; but what's the good of always talking? Why don't you do something?"

In concluding, he said: "Now, if the Gospel that you come to preach can accomplish what you profess, then the best thing you can do is to go home and preach it to your own people, for they need it." What could I say but acknowledge—as every honest English missionary must do—that to us belongeth shame and confusion of face. This conversation was heard by and retailed to over a hundred people. One felt it was no wonder as he said that we were hated. These things cannot but be causes of ill-feeling and indignation.

It grieves one deeply to meet hundreds who have been cursed to every one who has been blessed through contact with the foreigner. The awful habit has gained an incredible hold on this people, and is gaining ground everywhere. In place of the ancient custom of assembling at the tea shops to drink tea over the making of a bargain, or the contracting for coolies or boats, it is not at all uncommon to resort to the opium den instead. In places where one can hardly obtain food opium can be bought. Last year, when going westward, I was often astonished to find where it could be obtained. No matter if the boat stopped in the gorges where only rocks were to be seen, and where at first sight no house was discernible, the men would go on shore for their pipe, and one would find on some small plot of land a small hut or similar place where opium and wine were to be had. In other places small boats would come and fasten alongside, which proved to be floating opium dens. In many of these small huts and boats there was nothing for sale save the opium and wine.

In our résumé last week of the evidence given before the Opium Commission, the name of Mr. Fletcher Brown was given as a witness. It should have been Rev. Frederick Brown.

THE McALL MISSION.

It is some time since we sent you any tidings of our work, and the summer is nearly ended before we have given your readers news of "Le Bon Messager." It is often easier to do work than to write about it. The intense heat of this summer has been trying to us all, and those on the boat found it exceedingly so. But, in spite of drawbacks, the work has gone on with manifest blessing.

On May 2 the little vessel left Meaux, where she had been all winter, and Captain and Mrs. Pim found themselves at Epernay once more on the 12th. They received a very warm welcome, for since the visit of the boat last year, Pastor and Mme. Charlier had been able to open a hall in the district of Ay, where they had long desired to begin Gospel work. Thus the fruit of last season's work was manifest. The meetings were thronged nightly, and many were evidently touched by the message. The testimonies given were deeply interesting. "I always believed in God," said a railway employé, "but I could never understand how to serve Him. One evening, on the boat, I heard you speak on the salvation of Jesus Christ from John iii. 16, 17; the following evening I determined to buy a Bible and see for myself. Then I began to understand the Gospel, and how my heart needed to be changed before I could serve God. Now my great desire is that my wife and family should know the Bible, and I read them a portion daily."

M. Laffay says again, "An old man came regularly, who interested us greatly. One evening I asked him how old he was? 'Eighty-two years of age,' said he, 'my course is almost over.' 'Do you know where you are going?' His face brightened, and he pointed heavenward saying, 'Là-haut.' Two days later I met him in the street and asked him how he knew he was going to Heaven? 'I cannot read,' said he, 'but I have a good memory, I can recall to mind what I hear at the meetings, and you told us that Jesus Christ came to seek and to save the lost. I believe that, and now I have peace in my heart and know that Heaven is mine.'"

As the boat commenced to drop down stream she stopped at each place where meetings could be held, and thus places were visited that were passed by last year. The same deep interest was awakened, the meetings being thronged. Many men would hurry to the boat without staying to take their supper. The following will stand for a sample of the scene at each place, with the one exception of Chateau Thierry (the birthplace of La Fontaine), where the meeting was not so well followed.

"At 7.30 the banks are lined with people. Three or four trees that have been felled form a convenient seat for them, and there they patiently sit till Captain Pim gives the signal to enter. They came in families, and as the numbers were so large we tried to persuade the parents to send the children only in the daytime, but they begged so hard to be allowed to come with the elders that we could not refuse them. Those who come late stay on the banks to get all they can. Others get into the small boats and gently pull under the windows, and listen there, and they have the best places, for the heat inside is something terrible. We have been much struck with the number of young people that come, and all so attentive. There is such evident respect for all they hear. An interesting thing is the way the hymns are caught up. We are, as you know, not very good singers, but as soon as we start a hymn they seem able to learn it."

A large number of Bibles and Testaments have been sold and given away; and a great many hymn-books also. The distribution of tracts, kindly provided by the Religious Tract Society, has been also large, and there have been several cases of conversion attributed to the perusal of the tracts. We shall not be able to continue the work, we fear, beyond the middle of next month, as our Boat Fund is already much overdrawn. The expenses are over £25 monthly. There is great need for permanent work to be set on foot along the valley of the Marne, as has been begun at Epernay; but the means are lacking. It is thus true that the open doors are far too many for the labourers. We need to pray "the Lord's prayer," that more be thrust out by the Great Head of the harvest field, and that the funds that are certainly somewhere, be forthcoming also.

Everybody's Question.

"WHAT HAVE I TO DO WITH THEE?"

"All things are naked and opened unto the eyes of Him with whom we have to do."—Hebrews iv. 13.

WHAT have we to do with God? Have we anything to do with Him? Some seem to think we have not; at least, their mode of life would lead one to this conclusion. They live from day to day and from week to week in a state of indifference as to the claims of God upon them. People of this description are to be met with every day, in every place, and under every circumstance. You will find them in fashionable drawing-rooms, merchants' offices, busy markets, poor cottages and alleys, railway-carriages, churches, and chapels. They call themselves and are called Christians. Some of them, it may be, are models of morality, of uprightness in business, and occupying most respectable positions in respectable society. And yet—and yet, they have been getting along all the time without having had much to do, if indeed anything, with Him to whom they owe the very breath that is keeping them alive. Worldly occupations and worldly pleasures have taken up their attention and time to such an extent that the idea of a Saviour crucified for them has become a very secondary consideration, if considered at all.

If any reader thinks this description of the average modern, worldly society of men and women overdrawn, let him boldly introduce the subject of forgiveness of sins, and cleansing through the blood of Christ, to the next gathering of men and women, ladies and gentlemen, that he finds himself one of, and let him note the effect. No, the picture is underdrawn if anything; and the cry of the demoniac, 'What have I to do with Thee?" (Mark v. 7) would perhaps better describe the manner in which the name of Jesus of Nazareth is received, even after nearly 1900 years.

But whether it be welcome or unwelcome news, man has to do with God. Man—proud, lofty, self-sufficient, refined, elegant, educated man—must bow in the dust before One mightier than himself. Fellow-sinner, you may have received the best education that Oxford or Cambridge can afford; you may be a gentleman of the highest social refinement and intellectual culture—the one sought after in London drawing-rooms; you may live in the closest intimacy with the highest in every world—of science, art, literature, and good society; and yet you must, if you have any desire to be a sharer of eternal glory, I say you must humble yourself in the dust before God, and confess yourself a sinner.

"BE RECONCILED TO GOD."

What have we to do with God? Let his own word answer the question. St. Paul's message by the Holy Ghost is, "Be reconciled to God" (2 Cor. v. 20). This was his general message to unconverted people, his universal formula. He calls his work "the ministry of reconciliation" (ver. 18). It applies to all men, and it therefore applies to you. Before you can do anything that will please God, before you can set out on the highway of a holy life or engage in holy service, you must first be reconciled to Him. Do you ask, "What do you mean by this? Why must I be reconciled? I do not feel as if I were an enemy of God"? You may not feel it, but God says, "Whosoever will be a friend of the world, is the enemy of God" (James iv. 4). Are you a friend of the world? Does the world, with its attractions, pleasures, and occupations, occupy the chief place in your thoughts and heart? Answer this question, and you will know whether you are an enemy of God or not.

When two people are at enmity, in order that there may be perfect reconciliation between them, both must be willing to be reconciled, otherwise the reconciliation will be of no practical avail—there will be no friendliness resulting. One is willing, the other remains unwilling, to enter into friendly relations. This is the case with numbers to-day. God has already been reconciled by the death of his Son. He has accepted the ransom of Christ's blood, and He has given us a sure evidence of this acceptance by raising Him from the dead. There can be no question, then, that on God's part reconciliation has taken place. It remains, therefore, with you, my brother, on your part to be reconciled to God. Christ is the Mediator between God and men. He is the Great Peace-maker, He has accomplished the reconciliation of God the Judge. He now turns to you, on the other hand, and both Father and Son beseech you"—just fancy God beseeching man—to be reconciled to God.

The important question for you is, "How am I to become reconciled to God? How is it to be done?" This is a very practical question, and the answer to it will, no doubt, disappoint you. It consists of two words—"by faith." You cannot understand this? Its simplicity, I grant you, staggers for the moment. You must have something more tangible to go upon. But if you pause and think for a moment or two, it is really not so very difficult or doubtful a matter after all. God has said a certain thing relating to you and Himself, and He simply asks you to believe Him. That is all. He does not ask you to spend a whole day, or a month, or a year, doing your best to "get up" something called "faith," like a locomotive getting up steam. He simply asks you to do Him the honour of believing what He says.

TAKING GOD AT HIS WORD.

A little girl was asked one day to explain what was meant by "faith." "Faith," she replied, "is just taking God at his word." No better answer could have been given, even by a theological professor. Very probably the theological explanation would require explaining itself! But faith is really nothing more nor less than this. And if you begin to-day to hunt through your Bible for all the things that God has said about you, and all the promises He has given you, and if you believe them, what a change there will be in your life!

You may say you can enjoy life very well as you are. I tell you you are groping about in Egyptian darkness compared to what you might have for the taking. Do you say you find it hard to believe God, to trust Him, to have faith in Him? Why, you are exercising faith, unconsciously it may be, every day of your life. Scarcely a day passes that you are not placing implicit confidence in some one or more of your sinful fellow-creatures. And yet you are afraid or unable to trust your own Maker in the matter of salvation?

Never say you cannot understand what faith is. It is one of the commonest commodities to be found in human society, but faith in the Faithful One is lamentably rare. Take God's Word and believe it, and act upon your belief, and I promise you that you will begin to think you are the happiest man in all the wide world. Take, for instance, this word from Acts xiii. 38, 39, "Be it known unto you men . . . that through this Man (Jesus Christ) is preached unto you the forgiveness of sins; and by Him all that believe are justified from all things." Do you believe that, or do you not? If you do not now act upon it, acknowledging yourself a lost sinner, and claiming the lost sinner's Saviour, this proves that you do not believe it. And if you do not believe it, you make God a liar!

God says: "All that believe are justified"; and 'justified' simply means that He counts them righteous, though they have been unrighteous. It is just another way of saying that justice has been vindicated. What have you been doing to have missed such priceless privileges? Look at them. First, free pardon for all past sin. Secondly, you have eternal life, begun here and now, as you sit, to be fully consummated in the glory. Thirdly, you have a peace and joy in believing, to which you are a stranger in your unreconciled state. Fourthly, you have power over sin in your daily life by the indwelling of the same Holy Spirit. These and many other blessings are at your disposal, and are to be had for the claiming.

If you do not thus cast yourself upon God, then your decision is for the great deceiver, who is laughing at your weakness, and rejoicing at having gained another victory. You will have claimed him as your master and lord. He is a prompt paymaster, and pays his servants to the full. What are his wages? "The wages of sin is death" (Rom. vi. 23). I charge you to be careful how you decide. What are you doing with God's Son?

SOLDIERS AND SAILORS.—A band of workers among soldiers and sailors has been organised and will be known by the title of the "One by One Working Band." It will be affiliated to the "One by One Band" formed by Mr. Thomas Hogben, of the "Welcome" Mission, Portsmouth. Each member will undertake to engage individually in definite prayer and effort to win souls among his comrades. At Portsmouth a number of Christian soldiers and sailors have already been enrolled. Others desiring to join should apply to Mr. A. E. Sims, Sergeant-Major Staff Clerk, hon. organising secretary, 26, Margate-road, Somers-road, Southsea.

CAPE GENERAL MISSION.

DEAR SIR,—During the last two years, by the blessing of God, we have been able considerably to extend our work amongst the heathen. Our missionaries and native evangelists are now labouring in the Kimberley compounds, Pretoria, Transvaal, Swazieland, Ponzola (Zulu), Basutoland, and Pondoland. We have carefully avoided overlapping any work already existing, and, at the same time, been able to keep and strengthen the hands of God's dear servants already in the thick of the fight.

In Basutoland, where our brethren, the French missionaries, have laboured so successfully, we have three stations occupied and worked by one native pastor and two native evangelists, all under the care of our brethren, while fully recognised as Cape General Mission workers. In Pondoland, too, our four missionaries who have recently commenced work there, are under the superintendence of Rev. J. Househam, a devoted Wesleyan missionary, and hard at work teaching, visiting, and dispensing. When they have learned the language, they will be duly placed in new stations in Central Pondoland, where thousands of Pondos are waiting for the message of life. On their arrival, a few weeks back, the paramount chief, with a retinue of over 100 Pondos, came to meet and welcome them, and told them his country was open to them, and he was only too glad to have them in their midst.

In Pretoria we have five missionaries all hard at work learning Zulu, as well as working in the native school. Next March we hope to draft them off to Swazieland, where we have already three missionaries at our mission station, Bethany.

Mr. Galley, our missionary in the compounds at Kimberley, has recently had some very real conversions to cheer him on, while our Zulu evangelist, Titus, reports manifest blessing on the banks of the Pongola. From Basutoland, too, we hear of precious souls being saved and real encouragement in the work. Our native evangelist, Philip, who is on furlough, has a blessed opening in the Transvaal, and we are hoping to send a missionary up there as well.

Just before leaving South Africa for deputation work in the United Kingdom and America, I was able, during a tour of thirteen weeks, to visit many mission stations, and cheer on the beloved missionaries. In Basutoland especially we had great encouragement, and the results have proved very real. At Moiyaun the large church there is badly needing a lightning conductor, having been struck already once. I am most anxious to send our dear brothers one out; it would only cost a few pounds. Perhaps the hearts of some of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN would be touched and willing to provide one.

I must not forget the 17,000 Malays in Cape Town. Two of our lady missionaries are labouring amongst them, but we need at least six more. Brethren, pray for us. Doors are open, and spheres of labour amongst the heathen are waiting to be filled.—Yours in the Master's service,

W. SPENCER WALTON.

Belfast Prison Gate Mission for Men.

THE report, just issued, states that during the past year 288 discharged prisoners have breakfasted at the Home, of whom many were afterwards admitted as inmates for varying periods, or until suitable employment was obtained for them elsewhere. In addition, seventy-one boys passed through the Home. Of these, nine boys were committed directly to the Home by magistrates' orders without passing through the prison.

The progress of the work being much impeded by the unsuitable size of the Home at 17, Perth-street, the committee decided to move, and secured a larger house in Fairview-street, with a commodious yard and sheds better adapted for carrying on the employments of preparing firewood and cutting up linen, which have hitherto been found both suitable and profitable for the inmates. This change has necessitated some extra expenditure. The Home has been adapted to admit of as many as nineteen beds being occupied, but at present, owing to want of funds, only thirteen are ready for occupation. A number of incidents are given in the report showing that the Home has been the means of reclaiming many men and boys from vice and crime. The secretary is Mr. W. H. H. Lyons, Tudor House, Holywood.

A NEW HALL for the White Ribbon Gospel Temperance Mission is being built at Hotwells.

SCENE AT A FRENCH FAIR.

The Paris correspondent of Evangelical Christendom relates a remarkable incident which occurred on August 12 at Royan, in Charente Inférieure. Two Evangelical colporteurs visited the town to sell New Testaments and distribute tracts; they met with much opposition, one curé in particular trying to turn them out of the place. The colporteurs write: "The beach was covered with priests of Rome, and numbers of them came to see and listen to us. But to our great regret we could not continue there, for in the evening (the best time for the fair) numerous roughs, sent by we know not whom, surrounded us, shouting, and covering us with sand. We therefore left for another place, B——, hoping to return to the fair on Sunday and Thursday; but even this was made impossible for us. The Royanese shouted, 'There is no room here for you'; and the stall-keepers echoed the cry with violent insults: 'Get away; there is no place here for you.' We had scarcely left Royan one hour when the whole fair was one immense sheet of flame, and the vast field of pleasure one scene of destruction!"

Well may the correspondent of our contemporary remark: "God is not mocked! 'In one hour the fair fell, utterly burned with fire.' One hour after the Lord had used the scorning adversaries to send his faithful witnesses to a place of safety! The conflagration began by children playing with lighted shavings in the street. A sawmill was first destroyed; then a bazaar fell a prey, and, with lightning speed, stall after stall, circus after circus, theatre after theatre, caught fire, till the whole fair was enveloped in flame—one concern lost 40,000 francs in bank bills—and the splendid wild-beast show, worth 160,000 francs, was reduced to ashes with all its contents, twelve splendid lions, etc., etc. The whole is a charred wreck, and 150 persons are left in absolute penury, besides the heavy losses to others. No similar disaster to a fair in France is on record."

C.E. MISSION AT MERTHYR.

Under the auspices of the Christian Endeavour Society, Mr. Henry Thorne conducted a ten days' mission at Merthyr Tydvil from Sept. 9 to 18. There were splendid gatherings. Much interest was manifested in the Saturday night meeting when Mr. Thorne gave his special address, "From the Stage to the Cross, or the story of my life." But it was on Sunday that the Endeavourers had their field day. They mustered in strong numbers at 9.30 a.m. for united prayer. Many specific requests were made in prayer, which were signally answered before the day closed. After spending an hour in supplication and praise, a short meeting was held in the open-air, and at 8 p.m. the chapel was crowded with people eager for the Word of God. At the close of the Mission it was found that seventy had entered the inquiry room and professed to have found peace in Christ.

It is believed that the influence of those meetings will be long felt by all who were privileged to attend them. It was a happy sight to see how the young Endeavourers—full of enthusiasm and holy desire for the salvation of souls—rallied round the evangelist night after night. Many interesting incidents occurred. Great has been the joy of praying parents in seeing their children brought to a knowledge of the Saviour. W. A. H.

MR. JOHN G. WOOLLEY has commenced in Illinois what is proposed to be a year's Gospel Temperance campaign.

INDUSTRIAL HOME, VENICE.—We regret to hear that this good work is greatly pressed for funds. These are very low, while the boys in the Home must be supported. God has and is still blessing the work. One of the older boys, converted some time ago, has done so well that he has been appointed superintendent under the director, Mrs. A. R. Hammond, Fondamenta, Cannaregio, Venice.

OPIUM AND BHANG.—The Ceylon Observer had a series of telling articles on the evils of opium and bhang, showing how the use of these drugs is spreading and how disastrous it is proving to the Singhalese. These, with a strong letter from the Misses Leitch, have been published in Ceylon in pamphlet form, in the hope they may arouse concern, and possibly have some effect in bringing about the restriction, or rather prohibition, of the ruinous drugs.

DUNDEE CHRISTIAN CONFERENCE.

The annual conference, extending over three days, has just been held in Dundee. It began on September 19, and the meetings throughout were well attended, the evening gatherings numbering about 2000. The speakers from a distance were, Rev. J. E. Houston, formerly of the Steeple Church, Dundee, and now of Cambuslang; Rev. Henry Montgomery, of Belfast: Rev. Dr. Herdman, of Melrose; Rev. Dr. Grattan Guinness, of London; Rev. W. D. Moffat, Edinburgh; Rev. John Wilson, of Woolwich; Rev. Robert Howie, known as an ecclesiastical statistician, no less than as a devoted and successful Home Mission worker.

Several missionaries were also present, and took part in the Thursday afternoon missionary meeting and evening missionary tea-meeting, viz., Dr. Robertson, of the Free Church Medical Mission at Nagpore; Dr. Sargood Fry, of the Edinburgh Medical Mission; Mr. Geo. Graham Brown and Mr. D. M. Robertson, of the C.I.M.; Rev. Mr. Marwick, from Old Calabar; and Mrs. Osborne, from Gibraltar. A choir of about 150 voices, under the leadership of Mr. Wm. Meek, led the praise. Rev. Gavin Anderson, of the Free High Church, and Mr. Robert Anderson, were joint secretaries, and so careful were their plans and so complete their arrangements that the entire Conference passed off with great success, and throughout all the meetings the good hand of the Lord was present to bless.

To give even an outline of the addresses is manifestly impossible in the space at our disposal, and we must confine ourselves to a few notes.

Rev. J. E. Houston, on the subject, "A Ruined World," based his remarks on Rom. iii. 12, giving a singularly able and searching address. He spoke on the dread evil of sin, an evil that all human means can scarcely minimise, and certainly never eradicate. Education and culture, erudition and refinement, utterly fail to remove the evil. He desiderated a revival of stern preaching, such as was that of Principal Edwards and Chas. Finney in America, and Burns and McCheyne in Scotland.

Rev. Henry Montgomery, speaking on the following day on "God's Remedy for the World's Ruin," commended the study of God's love in Christ to every earnest heart, and spoke of it as the greatest constraining power in the universe—the power that made the true missionaries, and sent them forth to the ends of the earth as heralds of the gladdest story man has ever heard. Speaking in the evening on the infinite value of the human soul, he showed the awful folly of neglecting its stupendous interests. A ship may be wrecked, and another put in its place; a train may be smashed and replaced; human reason may be lost, and again recovered; but the soul, once lost, can never more be restored—the great gulf is fixed, unbridged, and impassable.

Rev. Dr. Herdman, speaking of the triumphs of the Gospel in Apostolic days, gave a comprehensive résumé of the Acts of the Apostles. The secret of the unsurpassed success of these primitive days lay in prayer offered in Jesus' name; in preaching that told of the crimson tide that alone can cleanse; in preachers who were baptized with the revival spirit, and whose love, more than their logic, told upon the hearers; in the preaching not being confined to officials ordained by sacerdotal hands, but partaken in by private Christians, and "this honour have all his saints"; in the power which came from the Holy Ghost dwelling in these believing hearts. Such were the secrets of the marvellous success of the Church in the morning of the New Testament dispensation. And living, as we do, in the late afternoon, or toward the gathering evening of that dispensation, these facts must still be with the Church if she is to live up to the traditions of her hallowed early years.

Dr. Grattan Guinness sketched the onward march of the Gospel chariot from the close of the Apostolic century till the present time. He spoke of the bitter years of Roman persecution, culminating in the terrible onslaughts on the saints of God under Diocletian, and he referred to the catacombs of Rome—to this day fragrant with the name of Jesus, and the memory of a faith that is deathless. He sketched the martyr ages and others down to the present time—the greatly dowered heir of all the ages—and throughout he showed how triumphant and all-conquering is the Gospel of the Crucified One, and how the march of events is steadily tending towards the halcyon day when the last voice of opposition shall be for ever silenced, and there shall arise the song—in a harmony unbroken by discordant note—"Hallelujah, for the Lord God Omnipotent reigneth."

PERTH CONFERENCE.

LADIES' MEETINGS.

At the Perth Conference the meetings for women were this year unusually large and full of interest. At the evangelistic meeting on Monday evening, Mrs. E. W. Moore spoke on Rom. xiii. 11-14, awaking, dressing, and walking. Her simple, earnest words were, we believe, blessed to the awakening and conversion of more than one soul.

HOME WORKERS.

Miss Murray Gartshore presided at the tea-meeting on Tuesday afternoon, and read Ezra vii. 6, 8-28; viii. 16-18, 22-31, and Neh. ii. 8-18, to show what the hand of God did for his servants of old. Even a human hand gives help and courage: how much more does God's hand.

Mrs. E. W. Moore gave a short account of the Y.W.C.A. Summer School, recently held at Eastnor Castle. About sixty workers were present. Different ladies gave instruction in work among young women and conducted prayer meetings. Dr. Flavel Cooke and Mr. Brooke undertook Bible teaching.

Miss K. H. Davidson, deaconess of the Church of Scotland, spoke of the Deaconess Home in Edinburgh as giving training for work in both home and foreign missions. The Women's Guild is also doing good in banding together the workers in a congregation.

Miss Haslam told of the origin of Dr. Barnardo's Young Helpers' League, and pleaded for fresh branches to be started.

Miss Omond said a few words about work among tailors in Perth, which has been begun within the past year. Five shops are now open for reading each week, and nearly sixty copies of "The Tailor's Friend" are taken each month.

Mrs. Blackie concluded with an appeal for total abstinence, and urged all who have municipal votes to exercise their authority on behalf of temperance; she stated that in Scotland there are now a hundred parishes with no drink shops.

FOREIGN MISSIONS.

The tea-meeting on Wednesday was almost entirely devoted to Foreign Missions. Mrs. Blackie presided, and read an extract from a Shanghai newspaper just received, with an account of the recent murder of Swedish missionaries. Mrs. Brown-Douglas read a letter from Miss Fraser, asking for prayer for work among tailors, and also a request for prayer for Miss de Broen's work in Paris.

Mrs. Abraham (Esther), from Oroomiah, pleaded for deeper interest in Christian work in Persia, and specially in her Orphanage, where the children are taught to sing Christian hymns, which often open the way into Mohammedan homes. Mrs. Abraham will be grateful for opportunities of addressing meetings in different parts of the country; arrangements being made through Mr. Henry Tasker, Brookside, Andover, Hants.

Miss Annie R. Taylor described the life of women in Tibet. The married women occupy a place of honour and are often well educated. There are also unmarried women called anni, who tend the sick and offer many prayers to idols, or rather to the devil.

Mrs. Drynan, who has laboured in Rajpootana for twenty-six years, pleaded for ladies to go out to help among the blind and the lepers, as well as in ordinary missionary work.

Mrs. Tod Osborne spoke of work among sailors and soldiers in Gibraltar, and showed what an influence these men may have in heathen lands. Two Christian sailors were instrumental in the conversion of two Japs, who are now preaching the Gospel in their own land. From forty to sixty sailors attend the daily Bible readings in the Home at Gibraltar.

THE PRAISE MEETING,

Mrs. Brown-Douglas presided at the praise-meeting on Friday, in the unavoidable absence of Mrs. Gordon through ill-health. Mrs. Gordon had sent a few thoughts on the three "continuallies," Psa. lxxi. 3, 6, 14. The continual resort, praise, and hope. Several friends took part in prayer and thanksgiving, some mentioned special subjects for praise, amongst others the fellowship and communion of saints, opened lips to witness for Christ, whilst others gave notes of praise from God's Word.

"HOME, SWEET HOME."

BY MISS MACPHERSON.

IT is strange but true that where one's heart-work is, one feels rested and at home. The constant leading of the Spirit in one's daily round of privileged service affords sweet communion with the Lord, which cannot be enjoyed by those whose days are passed without aim or purpose; and when we follow the guidance of his eye every hour is fragrant with his presence.

How glad we are to be back with our East End people again, their faces telling the tale of patient struggle, never a murmur, but gratitude for the least thing one is enabled to do for them, and it is so little one can do but sympathise and point them to the Great Burden-bearer. What is a sixpence weekly to a poor widow, or a bowl of soup to a hungry child, or rescuing one bereft of a parent's care? It all means much if done unto the Lord, who hath borne with us as a nurse beareth (or feedeth) her child (Acts xiii. 18, marg.).

Our poor widows have continued gathering weekly for prayer during our absence in Canada, and precious seasons these have been for those who have joined with them at the throne of grace. They are all temperance women, able to wear the blue ribbon, except one, who is seventy-five years of age, and tells us that she takes three farthings' worth of beer once a week. Poor old women, they live from hand to mouth. It is a joy once weekly to give them a sixpence and their tea, whilst they make up clothing for those who will hive off in the spring to Canada.

The first Sunday after our return, spent in Bird Fair, was worth living for. It was joy to be welcomed by costers, rough working men in fustian jackets—some whispering, others shouting their friendly "Hilloa!" as we crushed through the thousands who thronged the street. The preachers under the two arches were—an ex-pugilist, an old actor, and young men filled with power from the Lord, and able to testify of his wonderful sustaining love. Our own message was simply the experience of the Lord's providential care during our absence, and a fact about the conversion of a Canadian farmer through one of our little children whom he had adopted. Tears and sympathy over this little East-end orphan-girl rewarded me for the past year's toil, and encouraged me to go on trusting for another winter's campaign, so that hundreds should be rescued and go to the land of hope and plenty.

During the past year we have had a thousand applications from farmers in Canada for our children, but the shippers' rates have been higher than usual, and our funds only allowed of our emigrating a hundred and fifty. Our special burden is when death occurs of parents, to prevent the young from going to the workhouse, and to give them a happier future where they are sought after and valued. The winter's training for one child, outfit, railway, and passage, supervision in Canada for years, costs £15. Who will, for Christ's sake, undertake one of the many children already appealing to us, and then come and see our gallery of photos of those doing well on "the other side?"

In all our various branches of work we need additional voluntary workers, ladies with time, and means to pay their board, whose hearts the Lord hath touched with desire to win souls among the sick and dying in these crowded hospitals and workhouses, or the sick and poor in their own homes. "The Lord added to the Church daily, such as were being saved." We need the help of Spirit-taught, educated women, witnesses for Jesus. During the past year, many ladies have boarded with us for longer or shorter periods, of several nationalities. These are now away, far and near, witnessing for the Master. Will ladies send us their representatives for home or foreign service, that they may be trained in practical mission work, and prove to themselves whether they have a call from God, before making application to a Society? Our course is not educational, but ladies staying with us gain valuable experience in all kinds of work, while endeavouring to win precious souls. Several of the China Inland Mission workers, who are now home on furlough, were with us in their earlier years, and through His grace have done good service for the Master in China. Others are shortly leaving for distant lands, and for all we ask your continued prayers, not forgetting the thousands of young men and women out in life in Canada, and for ourselves and faithful band of helpers.

THE WORKERS' WELCOME.

At the monthly workers' meeting, held on Wednesday week in the Home of Industry, Bethnal Green-road, a warm welcome was given by many loving friends to Miss Macpherson and Mr. Merry on their return from the other side. All rejoiced to find that Miss Macpherson had evidently benefited by her voyages and the continual sunshine she so glowingly described, enjoyed at her Stratford home. Our sister made at the gathering a statement very much on the line of her own message to co-workers given above, and adding several delightful incidents as to the little ones placed out in Canada, and the happy homes they have in many cases found.

Surgeon-General PARTRIDGE gave one of his characteristic object-lessons on "The Scales," admirably exemplifying the great value of such talks in winning attention and rivetting on the mind important and much-needed lessons. Well and wisely used, this form of teaching is likely to do good service in evangelisation.

IRISH EVANGELISATION SOCIETY.

KILKEE is a beautiful watering-place on the western coast of county Clare. In the beginning of July the Irish Evangelisation Society, helped by a kind friend in London, sent there a new movable wooden hall, capable of seating 300 persons, with two of their agents, Messrs. Carleton and Robinson, to conduct special meetings. During July and August the meetings were continued nightly; the attendance was good, with increasing power and blessing. Under the influence of the Holy Spirit many have been led to acknowledge the claims of Jesus Christ, and to receive Him as their redeemer and friend.

Large numbers of Roman Catholics came night after night, and listened with profound attention and interest to the story of the Gospel. It is believed that in the case of several the Word has been mixed with faith and that they have passed from death into life, whilst many others have carried away the truth without, as far as we know, declaring it openly.

Children's meetings were held. A special one was arranged on the strand, Mr. G. M. Butler, of the Children's Special Service Mission, offered prizes for the best-written text of Scripture on the sand. About 200 young people gathered, and the competitors wrote their favourite text (John iii. 16, Matt. xi. 28, "God is Love," etc.), some of which were beautifully formed with seaweed, shells, and stones. These were read by crowds of all classes—Catholics and Protestants—who seemed as deeply interested as the children themselves. This was followed up by the singing of some hymns and a short address.

A daily morning prayer-meeting was held in the hall, which proved a time of refreshing to the Lord's people. At the end of August many left this watering-place, and a new set of arrivals were expected. The Christians urged the Society to continue a work so much owned of God, and it therefore continues this month also. Prayer is asked for the evangelists, that power and wisdom may be given them, and that still greater signs and wonders may be wrought in the name and to the honour of the Lord Jesus. J. BARTON.

Dundalk, Sept. 12.

Messrs. Fullerton and Smith.

THESE evangelists conducted a very successful mission at Newport, Mon., from September 2 to 10. A number of churches united in the work, and the meetings were held in the Stow Hill Baptist Church, a convenient and central building. The services were very largely attended, and it is believed that in addition to the results already ascertained, a work has been begun which will bear fruit many days hence.

The incisive preaching of Mr. Fullerton, and the sweet singing of Mr. Smith, made an evident impression on the large congregations, and proofs of the Spirit's powerful working were not wanting. In addition to numerous cases of decision, there is a very gratifying quickening in the spiritual life of some of the churches.

ALGERIA—A MISSION SPHERE.

THERE may possibly be Christians who would like to work for their Master abroad, and yet, for various reasons, do not see their way to go so far as China, India, or Central Africa. They may be quite prepared to work in a more needy field than England, but would like to know of some place within a few days' journey of home.

Allow me to draw the attention of such to Algeria, which is a French colony, divided into three provinces or departments. Constantine, the eastern province, occupies an area about equal to England (excluding Wales). Over this extent of country there is scattered one million and a quarter of people, most of them Arabs, who are all Mohammedans. The chief town of the province bears the same name—Constantine; its population is 50,000, of which the half only are Arabs. The other half—25,000—is made up of about 10,000 Jews (among whom there is practically nothing done), and 15,000 French, Italians, Maltese, etc. There are other smaller towns over the province, with from ten to twenty thousand people, besides numerous villages.

The only missionaries I know of in the whole province, working among the Arabs, are two English ladies who have been stationed in the town of Constantine for about seven years. My wife and I hope to return to the same town next month. Little or no public preaching has been attempted, but classes for the Arab children are held, and the lady missionaries visit the Arab women in their homes. The men missionaries can visit the Arabs in their cafés, invite them to their houses, and speak with them in their shops and by the wayside.

In the town of Constantine, with its large population, there is far more work to do than four missionaries can accomplish, and what is to become of the million and more of Arabs scattered over the province, with not a single missionary among them?

Is it possible that within four or five days of England these multitudes of people are to live and die without having the Gospel of God's grace made known to them? Are there no young men or young women who will volunteer for this work? We appeal especially to young men. Perhaps there are some who have a small private income and are free to go? Apartments in a French house can be had in many towns, or a small Arab house may be rented. A young man could easily live on from £80 to £100 a year, or even less, and have something over to spend in travelling.

If there are any who feel interested and desire further particulars, I shall be pleased to give any information I can. The hon. sec. of our mission is Mr. E. H. Glenny, 21, Linton-road, Barking, Essex, from whom particulars may also be obtained.

I have written about the province of Constantine, as I feel specially interested in it, but this only forms one-third of Algeria, and is the most thinly populated of the three provinces, although it is the largest. JAMES L. LOCHHEAD,

THE NEEDS OF INDIA.

THE Zenana Bible and Medical Mission have received from their hon. secretary at Allahabad, Rev. G. B. Durrant, C.M.S., a letter dated August 30, in which he writes:—"The state of Behar, as regards missionary work, is very sad. The missionaries are very few in number, and the population is enormous. I hope the committee will see their way before long to develop village work in that much-neglected district."

The committee have been most anxious for the last three years to take up work in this needy district. Behar, including Tirhoot, is a province nearly as large as England, with a population of twenty-five millions, for which we understand there are only three missionaries belonging to the Baptist Missionary Society, and three ladies connected with the Zenana Bible and Medical Mission, at Patna on the extreme border, and on the other side one missionary connected with an American missionary society.

There are about nineteen millions of people in the villages of this district for whom no missionary effort is being made. Candidates willing to offer should communicate with Rev. A. R. Cavalier, general secretary, 2, Adelphi-terrace, W.C.

THE ALLEGED CONSPIRACY IN MADAGASCAR.

[From a Correspondent.]

On Monday, August 9, the Central Province of Madagascar was thrown into a great state of consternation and sorrow by a proclamation of the sentence of death upon three Malagasy gentlemen of high rank—Rajoelina, thirteen Honours, a son of the Prime Minister of Madagascar; Dr. Rajaonah, one of the Court physicians and son-in-law of the Prime Minister; and Ralaikizo, an aide-de-camp to the Prime Minister and husband of Princess Ramasindrazana, the Queen's aunt and chief maid of honour. The charge against the above-named gentlemen was one of conspiracy to overthrow the Prime Minister for the purpose of placing Rajoelina, his son, in his stead.

On the evening of the same day, a communication was forwarded by the Malagasy Minister for Foreign Affairs to the Right Rev. Bishop R. K. Kestell-Cornish, D.D., Mr. T. P. Porter, Rev. W. E. Cousins (London Missionary Society), Mr. H. E. Clark (Friends' Foreign Mission), and Mr. A. H. Morton.

This communication from the Foreign Minister was made to representative Englishmen in this way, because the Malagasy Government refuses to recognise the last treaty between England and France with reference to Madagascar, whereby it was agreed that the French Resident-General should be the medium of communication between the British Consuls and the Government of Madagascar.

The communication above referred to charged Mr. Abraham Kingdon with being concerned in the conspiracy, and notice was sent that within twenty-four hours he was to be taken to Tamatave, whence he was to be expelled from Madagascar.

This letter from the Foreign Minister was accompanied by copies of documents on which the above charge was founded. Respecting these documents Mr. Kingdon has made an affidavit stating that they are forgeries. The Prime Minister has for many years past been on friendly terms with Mr. Kingdon, and the business relations of the latter with the Prime Minister would alone appear to have been a sufficient bar to any plot of the kind suggested. Public opinion, both among natives and foreigners, is strongly in favour of the accused men; and, moreover, the alleged treasonable documents themselves are of so loosely expressed and improbable a character that it is very difficult, to say the least of it, to believe that a man of Mr. Kingdon's ability has had any hand in their concoction.

On the other hand, a consideration of the present political state of this country makes it quite possible to suggest motives for the forgery of these documents. For some time past there has been a bitter feud between various members of the Prime Minister's family, and even some of his sons are known to have been at open enmity with each other.

A few months since Mr. Kingdon, it appears, was informed by his native secretary that some members of the Prime Minister's family had endeavoured to bribe him to steal from Mr. Kingdon's office letters bearing the die or seal of Rajoelina thirteen, Honours, a son of the Prime Minister; and as Mr. Kingdon was at the same time informed that there was a plot to forge Rajoelina's die, he at once communicated the facts to the latter, advising him to make blind marks in his die.

From the persons who were plotting to overthrow Rajoelina, Mr. Kingdon states that he received various threatening messages as to what would happen to him unless he broke his friendship with Rajoelina, but that knowing the latter to be a gentleman of high character he did not allow himself to be coerced by threats of this description.

The gentlemen to whom the documents below were addressed at once took a move, and on the following morning a meeting of British subjects was held at the vice-consulate. By this meeting a deputation was appointed to request an interview with the Prime Minister the same afternoon, and to present a memorial respectfully urging His Excellency to use his influence with the Queen to delay the execution of the death sentence on the three accused Malagasy. The deputation consisted of the Right Rev. Bishop R. K. Kestell-Cornish, D.D., Rev. W. E. Cousins, and Rev. J. Richardson, F.R.G.S., of the London Missionary Society; Mr. Henry E. Clark, of the Friends' Foreign Mission Association; and Mr. Lionel V. Bonar.

Before the deputation visited the Prime Minister, however, they had heard that the death sentence had been commuted to one of penal servitude for twenty years. Probably public opinion had moved the Prime Minister.

Previously to the arrival of the deputation, the French Resident-General had had an interview with the Prime Minister, and had pointed out to him that he could not expel a foreigner without a fair trial. The stand for justice made by the Resident was a good stroke of policy on his part, and must have the approval of foreign residents in this country, of whatever nationality.

On meeting the deputation, the Prime Minister informed them that if they came to him in their private capacity he would be willing to see them as friends, but stated clearly that any representation from British subjects through the French Resident would receive no recognition whatever. They then informed him that Mr. Kingdon had made an affidavit to the effect that he was entirely innocent of the charges brought against him, and in view of this they had intended asking him to defer the carrying out of the death sentence on the accused Malagasy.

The Prime Minister stated that he had withdrawn the order for Mr. Kingdon's expulsion, and had communicated with the Acting British Consul in Tamatave, requesting him to try the case.

The Acting British Vice-Consul here has asked to be allowed to take a photograph of the documents implicating Mr. Kingdon, but permission has not been granted. Mr. Kingdon has also applied for the arrest of Raboana, his former secretary, who is suspected of being implicated in the forgery of the documents, but this request also has not been complied with. Raboana for the last three weeks has been detained on the premises of one of Rajoelina's bitterest enemies, and since the expulsion of Rajoelina and his friends, great feasts have taken place on these particular premises.

On Monday, August 14, the wife of Rajoelina and also the wife of Dr. Rajaonah were banished with their husbands. The latter has seven young children, one of whom is only six weeks old.

Dr. Rajaonah is a gentleman of great intelligence and high character. He formerly studied in Edinburgh, and resided in Great Britain for eleven years, having practised in South Shields and Bristol. He is a member of the Board of the Medical Missionary Academy in Antananarivo, and is also employed by the Government as a medical man. It will be seen that no reference is made to him in either of the documents quoted below, and speculation is rife as to how his name comes to be associated in these charges.

[The documents referred to on which the charge against Mr. Kingdon rests, and copies of which we have received, comprise an agreement between him and Rajoelina, in which the former undertakes to use his influence with the English Government to get the latter appointed Prime Minister, in return for which Mr. Kingdon is to be secured certain business "concessions." Mr. Kingdon's affidavit (copy of which is also sent by our correspondent) avers that the documents are forgeries; that he has never dictated, written, or signed any such agreement, and that he has never been aware of any conspiracy or intrigue against the Prime Minister.]

THE GOSPEL IN ITALY.

Throughout Italy September 20 has been celebrated as a festival, in memory of the Italian army entering Rome on that day in 1870. Notwithstanding the protest of the Pope and his allies, there is no hope of the present state of affairs being changed; things are far better as they are. We in the Waldensian Valleys lately had a visit from our King. He went over the Waldensian House, the church, and the hospital, and was charmed. He has never in his life had such an enthusiastic reception as among the Waldenses on September 9.

From September 4 to 8 we had here the gathering of our General Synod, which this year had a peculiar importance. We also have a movement for the revision of the confession of faith, and of the general organisation of the church. Among the delegates we had the pleasure of welcoming Dr. Whyte, of Edinburgh, Dr. Matthews, of London, Dr. Godet, and many other friends.

Looking at the report of our evangelisation, I see that we have 43 pastors, 8 evangelists, 8 teacher evangelists, 64 teachers, 8 colporteurs, 6 Bible-women, altogether 137 workers in the field. 549 new members were admitted during the year, and we have now on the rolls 4871 communicants or members of the church. Moreover, 3153 children are attending the Sunday-school, and 7408 adults the public service every Sunday. Certainly it is a good result, and we must praise God.

The only fact we have to complain of is a deficit of nearly £2000. We are ready to face the difficulty by making sacrifices, and during the session of the General Synod £200 was subscribed. It is a good sign. We ask the prayers and the continued sympathy of our brethren for that great work of evangelisation in Italy carried on by the Waldensian Church, preserved by God in Italy for that purpose.

AN APPEAL TO THE CHURCHES.

Sir,—I shall be much obliged if you can find space in your columns for the subjoined address which I send to you on behalf of the signatories.—Yours faithfully,

Henry S. Lunn.

The Reunion Conference, Lucerne, Sept. 11, 1893.

For many years the Home Reunion Society and the Christian Conference have been preparing the way for a more public discussion of the manifold divisions which impair the efficiency of the Church of Christ in English-speaking lands.

During the summer of 1892 a series of Conferences for this purpose was held at Grindelwald, attended by representatives of the most diverse schools of theological thought and ecclesiastical polity. Similar gatherings have been held during the present summer in Lucerne.

After long and careful consideration it has been decided to draw up a respectful address to all Christian men and women embodying suggestions which have resulted from the discussions of the Reunion Conference, and that this address should be signed by representatives of different Churches.

The propositions are as follows:

I. The representatives of all branches of the Christian Church who were present at Grindelwald or Lucerne being agreed in believing that to preach Christ and Him crucified as the Divine Saviour of the world is the first duty of the Church and the Divinely appointed plan for the salvation of the world, were further convinced that this common end can be best attained by extending as much as possible the united action and the brotherly co-operation which already exist between branches of the Church on all subjects upon which they are agreed.

II. As a means of promoting such united action they would respectfully call the attention of Christian men everywhere to the following suggestions:

1. That the practice be adopted of setting apart one Sunday in the year for special services for the promotion of Christian unity, and that this practice be accompanied by (a) an interchange of pulpits as far as it is practicable; (b) the united attendance of all believers within any given district at Holy Communion; (c) the delivery on the part of Christian ministers of at least one sermon in the year, calling attention to the good works of some other branch of the Church than their own, especially those whose many excellencies are obscured from the observation of their fellow Christians by the prejudice and suspicion engendered by centuries of strife.

2. The representatives of the various branches of the Christian Church in any given locality might unite, as they have united in such cities as Glasgow and Manchester, to form a Social Union for the purpose of taking concerted and collective action for the promotion of those more social, philanthropic, and public objects of Christian endeavour, which can be most effectively dealt with by the co-operation of all Christians within any given area.

3. The examples of the various Missionary Societies in the Mission field might be followed with advantage at home in two respects (a) in the practice of a periodical conference between all Christian ministers in a district for purposes of counsel and encouragement, and (b) in a concerted agreement between the representatives of the various denominations to discourage, in the face of the existing spiritual destitution of many districts, the waste of effort in overlapping of Christian agencies in districts already oversupplied with places of worship, and to promote wherever possible the concentration of Christian effort in strong organisations instead of frittering it away in the creation of weak societies.

SALISBURY CONFERENCE.

THE nineteenth of these cheering annual gatherings was held during last week under the presidency of the convener, Rev. Edgar N. Thwaites. In accordance with the circular letter issued in the spring, urging that at all conventions special prominence should be given to the Lord's return, the morning sessions were occupied with "The Presence of Christ with his Church": (1) Before his return; (2) At his return; and (3) The attitude of his Church till his return. In the evenings the subjects for consideration were "Searching," "Cleansing," and "Filling."

Bishop HILL, of Western Equatorial Africa, preached on the Sunday from John iii. 34: "God giveth not the Spirit by measure." If we are children of God there is no limit to the possibilities on God's part of spiritual life and power. On the eve of our conference, each may well ask, "Is this true of me? What are my possibilities? Are these operative and vigorous in me?" While there is an immeasurable fulness with God, let us not limit Him and say, "Thus far shalt thou go, and no farther." The graces of the Spirit—love, joy, peace, etc.—relate to character, and gifts may be possessed, as at Corinth, with little grace. If we have the gifts, let us diligently seek the graces of the Spirit.

In the evening Rev. J. B. FIGGIS, on "Searching," said that others had been looking at the Godward side of this subject, and he would take the manward aspect of it in connection with the words, "Let us search and try our house, and turn again to the Lord." Dwelling upon the need and importance of spiritual temple cleansing, he asked: "Are the audience chambers (the ears) clean? Are the windows (the eyes) clean? Are the doors (the lips) clean? And the holy place of the Lord's house (the soul), is that clean? Is there faithfulness there, or pride, self-conceit, exaggeration, lying, deceit?"

Rev. C. G. MOORE followed with a deeply impressive address on the peril of cherishing anything that God has shown to be opposed to his holy will. If we do not master sin, sin will master us. Shall God see us rushing into some terrible calamity to-night? The after meeting was exceptionally searching and solemn. Mr. Moore urged the necessity of immediately meeting the Lord on the one point about which He is exercising our conscience. Every step of obedience opens up some new vista of blessing.

Rev. W. H. ETCHES, of Bath, on Wednesday morning spoke helpfully on the three words used in connection with the second advent — presence (usually rendered "coming") ; Epiphany (appearing) and apocalypse (unveiling).

Mr. R. C. MORGAN had been reminded of the lines—

> Soon the whole,
> Like a parched scroll,
> Shall before our amazed sight uproll,
> And without a screen,
> At one burst be seen

The PRESENCE wherein we have ever been.

This indicates the spirit in which we should consider our Lord's return. He had years ago found rest from competing schemes which profess to give the order and character of events prophesied of the second coming of Christ. Minute details had been foretold as to his first coming, but no one without special inspiration could have anticipated the form and order in which these occurred. He believed this applied actually to his return The hope of seeing HIM might itself be obscured by discussions of imaginary fulfilments. The blessed hope of the appearing of the glories of our God and Saviour Jesus Christ, is a true test of current views and expectations as to the improvement and progress of the race.

Rev. J. B. FIGGIS spoke of the Kingdom of God, the reign of God, on the throne of the heart and on the throne of the universe, as the one remedy for all earth's sin and sorrow.

In the evening, Rev. J. HUDSON TAYLOR spoke on the closing verses of Eph. iii. We should know more of the love of Christ if our life were more like his. Is it much of our service a sort of recreation? As we yield more in real sacrifice we shall know more of his love, which passeth knowledge. Would this be written if there were not much more in being filled to all the fulness of God than we know.

Mr. WM. GREENE spoke of the grievous sufferings of Professors Thoumaian and Kayayan, and of the persecuted Armenians still in prison, and asked fervent prayer for them.

The subject of "Cleansing" was opened on Wednesday evening by Rev. T. W. H. JACOB, vicar of Shirley, who noted in Luke xix. 41, 45, 47, that Jesus wept over the city, for He feels tender towards the sinner, though stern to the sin; then He cast out those who bought and sold in the temple, then He taught. He does not teach till He has cleansed thoroughly. We are cleansed by blood; kept clean by the Word, we are to cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit by cutting off or casting out those things which cause us to stumble.

Rev. J. J. LUCE: It is one thing to be a healed leper, another to be a cleansed leper. He sympathised with the little boy who asked, "Is it as bad to want to fight as to do it?" Is there such a thing as not wanting to fight—not hankering after sin? Yes; our great High Priest "is able to save them to the uttermost who come unto God by Him."

Rev. HUDSON TAYLOR followed with a luminous exposition of 1 Jno. i., and Bishop HILL concluded with a most searching and drastic address on sevenfold cleansing by blood; by restitution; by the ministry of a clean person, as typified in Num. xix.; by the washing of water by the Word; by fire; by pruning; and, when all else fails, by being delivered over to Satan for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus.

On Thursday morning Rev. F. PAYNTER, of Guildford, speaking of the Church's attitude before the Lord's return, said the first thing is to be saved. Unless saved we cannot wait. Then the Spirit will guide us into all truth, and show us things to come. Then we shall expect the second coming of our Lord with great desire.

Rev. WM. FRITH, speaking of the relation of the bride to the bridegroom, said we cannot be waiting for the bridegroom unless we are espoused to Him. Not individual Christians, but the Church as a whole, is the bride of the Lamb. When Esther was chosen by the King all needful things were provided by him, but she had to use them. The Spirit ministers every grace; but the bride makes herself ready.

Rev. JOHN WILKINSON said that death is not in any sense the coming of the Lord, nor was the destruction of Jerusalem his coming. He will come in like manner as He went, on the cloud. There are in this country Churchmen and Dissenters, differing widely on many points, but agreeing in the one doctrine that Christ is coming back again. Not one of them is on the down-grade. They believe the Bible more than ever. Of all the men on the down-grade not one holds the pre-millennial advent. If you are really waiting for your Lord some of you will have to reduce your balance at your bankers. A man left £500 to a religious object who would not give a pound to it while he lived. A friend asked another, "Were you not surprised he left it?" "No," was the reply; "I should have been surprised if he had taken it with him."

Rev. J. G. MANTLE said that, twelve years ago, Mr. Wilkinson had opened his eyes to the Lord's coming, and showed him, to his astonishment, the doctrine in Wesley's hymns. He found no incentive to holy living like this hope. He never felt his service such a privilege, and was never so desirous of buying up opportunities as to-day. Calvin, when urged to take his ease in his old days, replied "My Master will soon be here, and I should like Him to find me at work." An American gentleman told his friend, while driving a magnificent pair, "I've got too large a balance at my banker's, and I think these horses would look better in the Congo." He reduced his balance and sent his horses, or their value, to the Congo, and was a happier man.

The five-minute talks after luncheon are always an interesting feature.

Mr. D. J. EVANS spoke of the Scripture Readers' Society of Ireland, with whose useful work and its sometimes romantic incidents our readers are well acquainted. Mr. J. R. MACKENZIE said the Monthly Tract Society had sent 2¼ tons of Christian literature to Chicago.

Mrs. THWAITES gave a cheering account of the Y.W.C.A., insisting that God would choose his own workers, of which she gave vivid proof from their own experience in answered prayer.

Miss CARRUTHERS told of her invaluable schools in Italy, where 500 children of Roman Catholics or infidels are taught in elementary and kindergarten classes. Her story bristled with incidents. She wants a lady-helper.

Miss EYRE spoke of the Female Education Society and its work in Hong-Kong under the advantages and disadvantages of a British colony. The Government inspector is a godly man, but it is sad to think of 890 students in the Government school, where the name of God is scored out of every class-book, and the students say, "We don't believe in anything at all." A much-blessed evangelistic work is carried on, but there are less than twenty missionaries all told.

Captain Moss said that twenty years ago in Indian barracks, a prayer-room was unknown; now every station has one. The superintendent in connection with the Soldiers' Christian Association visits all the stations. Thousands of soldiers go out ignorant of God, numbers of whom come back saved. Present superintendent leaving after thirty to forty years in India; a successor needed.

Mr. THOMPSON showed the advantages of the Variorum Bible, and invited suggestions for aids to students, which might be incorporated in succeeding editions. He told a touching incident of a high critical authority, who had been profoundly influenced by receiving simple Gospel truths, and asked prayer for those engaged in Biblical research.

Mr. THWAITES said the Lord will come when the number of his elect is complete. But He knows when the last is gathered in. The end will come when this Gospel of the Kingdom has been preached in all the world for a testimony unto all the nations, but only He can tell when that has ceen accomplished. We ought from this conference to have twenty to go forth as Christ's witnesses, and we who tarry at home see how we can help to sustain them in their testimony.

Bishop HILL: We not only want young men, but men of experience, of sound practical sense, and wisdom, to give counsel on questions continually arising, to train native evangelists, etc. I want just such a man as Mr. Thwaites. If he were to go out for two years he would be—— [A voice: An archdeacon.] Well, whatever office we are called to in the Church of our God, involves most awful responsibility, and to whatever office He may call our brother, he will need the prayers of God's people to sustain him in. Mr. Thwaites subsequently said he had been led seriously to consider whether he should offer himself for a three months' visit to the Mission field, and asked the prayers of his friends for direction as to this.

A large missionary meeting took place on Thursday afternoon, addressed by Bishop Phillips, of Equatorial Africa, Rev. Hudson Taylor, and Miss Whitchurch, who had offered herself at the Salisbury Conference, and had gone to China in connection with the C.I.M., and had just returned. Her story was as bright as sunshine, and her sunny face might well attract others to the path of service, in which she had evidently found the joy of her heart, amidst many forms of outward discomfort. Sorrowfully, too, she told of a Chinese district where eighty per cent. of the people smoke opium—being morally, and to a large extent physically, slain by England,

In the evening the hall was crowded. Rev. J. HUDSON TAYLOR directed attention to Joel ii. 23, remarking that the passage contains a prophecy, the blessing which will come down upon Israel when the Lord brings them to repentance. It is a full blessing; they have been wayward, but, nevertheless, the full blessing shall be theirs. The outpouring at Pentecost was only a partial filling; but God will give them the former rain and the latter rain, and restore to them what seemed absolutely lost. What an overflowing blessing from the great heart of Him who delights to bless! What is taught elsewhere? Give—why? That it may be given you. Some people seem afraid of God's promises, and say that they must be taken with limitation. But God, so to speak, must use human language, and can only say what it will express and when you have taken in God's biggest promises, remember there is always a something more—something more!

Bishop HILL spoke upon the memorable words of Jesus, "On the last day, that great day of the feast," when He stood and said, "If any man thirst let him come unto me and drink." All God's gifts in blessing are gifts of grace. There may be some seeking this "filling" from a desire to be talked of by others; to hear it said, See what spiritual power he possesses! There can be no fulness if that if so, God's gifts are not for ourselves, but for the glory of his blessed Son. There are some who are excusing the inconsistencies of their Christian lives, on the ground that they have not been filled—attributing even the failure of their lives to the fact that God has not blessed them as He has others. This is altogether untrue. There is nothing that would be more pleasing to God than to fill us to overflowing. But as to the fulness—if some of us were filled to the brim, it would be a poor thing after all, for we are so shallow that we cannot contain much; we are like saucers turned upside down. But far too many are content to be shallow. There is a condition in which to-night you may be filled to overflowing, but to-morrow as dry as a dead stick. Where is the blessing gone to, you sigh! The blessing which the Holy Spirit gives is a continuous blessing, and the condition is faith, trusting Jesus moment by moment, simply trusting all the time. One other thing should not be overlooked: the consciousness of filling is something apart from the fact of being filled. You may be brimful, and yet not conscious of it. You go to be alone with God, and have a blessed time in the early morning; He fills you with a sense of his love. But you come down and go about your business, and presently there is not an atom of the sweetness you were enjoying an hour ago. Ah! but you go by and by into a room where one is sick, or perhaps dying—and then? The blessing you got in the early morning flows out at the very time it is wanted for service.

Rev. J. G. MANTLE said that it behoved them to speak very solemnly on the subject of the Holy Spirit's work. There had been more than one solemn crisis in his life; but one of these certainly was when a friend offered a very fervent petition by his bedside. It was this: "If thou, O Lord, canst get any more out of our lives, get it!" To that petition, continued the speaker, "I said Amen as I had never said it before. I went back over the years in which I felt He had not been getting this; and if I have one desire to-night for myself and my brethren, it is that we may always be our very best for God. What right have I to be living in these Pentecostal days on a low level, and ignorant of Pentecostal power? The light has come, and for us to be devoid of its fulness is to be criminally weak in the service of God. It is impossible for us to reach the maximum of power and blessing apart from Him."

In the after meeting Mr. Mantle enlarged yet further upon these particulars, and sought to come closer and closer to the souls of those he was addressing.

THE PRAISE MEETING.

This gathering at the conclusion of the Salisbury Conference is always one of the most important of all the meetings. Here those who have received special blessing during the week have an opportunity to express their feelings of thankfulness, and give vent to their joy. A large number assembled together on Friday morning, and a remarkable meeting was held. There was no formality. Everyone seemed bent on praising the Lord. Hearts were overflowing with a holy but humble joy. Not a few testified that it was the most blessed Salisbury Conference they had ever attended.

Rev. E. N. Thwaites, in his opening remarks, sought to lead his hearers to praise God. Many Christians, he said, know how to pray, who appear not to know how to praise. The new-born babe cries before he sings. So with many souls; they can cry to God, but there they seem to stop. They do not go on to praise. The heart is converted, but the face needs converting also. At the same time let the Christian beware of any hypocrisy in praise. A veneered piece of furniture may look like mahogany, but the veneer is all on the surface. Let us look beneath the surface. Real praise flows from joy of heart (Isai. lxv. 14).

An opportunity was given for anyone to repeat any text which had proved specially helpful to him or her during the Conference. Text after text was given out in rapid succession for several minutes from various parts of the hall. Then came an opportunity for telling of any special blessing received. One told of greater joy than before, in looking forward to the coming of the Lord. Another had been led to claim a deeper fulness of the Holy Ghost. Some had been led to say with stronger confidence, "Anywhere, with Jesus." One had learnt that Jesus might be trusted for everything. Another, that there need be no failure through Him. Some thanked God for a deeper desire after likeness to Jesus. Others, that they had found Jesus more precious than ever before. One had found special help from the thought that a broken bottle is kept full, not by floating on the top, but by being kept down in the ocean. Many testified more generally to the goodness of the Lord.

The latter part of the meeting was a time of deep solemnity, as praise led up to consecration of self and substance to the Master for his service. Many stood up in response to the question if any were willing, if the Lord should open the way, to go forth into the mission field. Some told the Lord that they would by his grace give more of their means henceforth to his work. Others that they would give up jewellery for Him. Very touchingly did Mr. Thwaites tell how he had been led that morning to offer himself to the Church Missionary Society, as ready to go forth for a few months to any part of the mission field to which they might see fit to send him. He asked if there were any friends who, in case the offer was accepted, would bear the necessary expense. At once three promised gifts of £50 each. Before the meeting closed all joined as they knelt in singing Miss Havergal's Consecration hymn, and then, as the Conference came to an end, and the assembly of the Lord's people dispersed, very many as they left the hall to return to their old labours, went forth in a new power, determined in the strength of that power to render to God the offering of consecrated lives, for all his benefits towards them.

THE SANTA CLAUS HOME, 34, South-grove, Highgate, N., exists chiefly for cases of hip and spinal diseases, and for those children who, though otherwise well enough to go to a convalescent home, still require slight surgical nursing. During last year the Home was full, and had there been room for more than twelve cots they could have been kept occupied. In all forty-five enjoyed the benefits of the Home during the twelve months. The Misses Charles, who manage the institution, write: "We shall be glad when we can take a larger house, and receive more little sufferers. If the Home were better known we should get more help, both for present expenses and future enlargement." Communications to the Misses Charles should be addressed: Stormont, Hampstead-lane, Highgate, N.

Letters to the Editor.

POOR RELIEF.

Sir,—May I ask you to invite correspondence on the subject of giving relief to the poor, that we may know the general opinion of Christian workers?

I was much grieved by the following sentence in a letter received from the hon. sec. of one of the leading societies, in answer to an appeal of mine as to why he had withdrawn his friendly interest from our little mission:—"The plan now so much deprecated by experts as dangerous and pauperising, and which I understand you adopted, of distributing temporal relief to the poor in connection with your mission work."

Indiscriminate relief I utterly disapprove; we give only to the sick or aged in special need, and we supply relief work at much lower wages than is usually given to meet necessitous cases. Yet we are condemned. How is it possible that Christians can neglect the Scripture injunction in James ii. 15, 16? or the example of our blessed Lord, who cared for the bodies and temporal sufferings of the poor, as well as for their souls?

To the unconverted poor the Gospel is not naturally attractive, for "the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God." Bare preaching seldom wins the working classes; they need to be shown the love of Christians in deeds as well as words. The friend who gives food to the baby sinking for want of nourishment, or sends timely help to prevent the home being sold up, is the one whose words will be listened to. May we not save our purses at the expense of souls?—Yours truly,

M. Barclay.

JEWISH INFLUENCE.

Dear Sir,—Your interesting paragraph respecting the influence of Jews for good or for evil is worthy of special note; it cannot be sufficiently emphasised. They do possess a marvellous influence. As unbelievers, they are arrayed against the truth; as believers their whole influence would be on our side. As illustrating and confirming your note, may I mention one or two facts which are also not generally known?

Are Christians aware of the fact that the terrible pest of rationalism which swept over Germany and England, and which may be considered the foster-mother of the destructive criticism, miscalled the higher criticism, of our own day, owes its origin to the Jew, Baruch Spinoza? He may well be called the father of rationalism, for his writings had an influence on the thought of modern Europe far greater than that of most men. This is amply confirmed by Dean Milman in his "History of the Jews." Now one of Spinoza's pupils was Hegel, who in his turn became one of the leading professors in the Berlin University. Again, one of Hegel's pupils was David Strauss, whose famous "Life of Christ," advocating the mythical interpretation of Scripture, took the whole world by storm, leading many faint-hearted people to believe that he had given Christianity a death blow from which it could not recover. And all commenced by a Jew, Spinoza!

But now comes the noteworthy part. The evil of scepticism, initiated by a Jew, continued by one of his pupils, and brought to a climax by Strauss, was nobly attacked and defeated, under God's blessing, by a Jew—but a converted Jew, the great church historian, Dr. Neander. King William IV. of Prussia, dismayed at the evil, which was spreading like wildfire, determined on a very unwise course, namely, that of forbidding the circulation of the book. He, however, first consulted Neander, who urged that as intellectual weapons had been used against Christianity, none but intellectual weapons should be used in her defence. His advice prevailed. He then wrote his "Life of Christ," and it is not too much to say that he shattered Strauss's position. He was not only one of the most profound scholars of his day, but a simple-minded and true servant of God.

Here is an object-lesson taken from history to prove that the unbelieving Jew sides with the enemy, the believing Jew uses his services for Christ.

Nor has this rule changed to-day. It is a fact that many Jews are most ardent followers of the German school of higher critics. They mutilate Moses and the prophets, deny miracles and prophecy—in fact, are ready to go to any length. Englishmen who favour the destructive criticism receive all their inspiration from Germany. German freethought is entirely controlled by the Jewish press, by Jewish professors and teachers; and being Hebrew scholars, their decision has naturally great weight. But God is again using believing Jews to counteract this evil. Something has already been done by the late learned and devout scholar Dr. Edersheim, and his work is now being continued by a young Hebrew Christian, who has already become noted as a distinguished Oriental scholar, Professor Margoliouth, of Oxford. His voice has already been heard in vindication of the truth, and in a manner which drew the attention of the whole learned world.

The Church of Christ needs many more such champions to-day, and here is a most important reason why the order of missionary work should be to the Jew first.—Yours faithfully,

Samuel Schor.

THE ARMY TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

Sir,—I trust you will allow me, as one long associated with temperance work in the army, to express through your columns the real pleasure it gave me to be present at the first business meeting of the council of the Army Temperance Association, where a practical effort to promote three important virtues in the soldier, viz., morality, discipline, and efficiency was most auspiciously inaugurated. What is now wanted, therefore, is a thorough system of organisation throughout the army in Britain and her colonies, and I feel that all interested in the soldiers will aid in this work. No one who has at all studied the subject can have failed to see that numbers of young soldiers lapse into well-nigh confirmed intemperate habits from the absence of only a few men around whom they could rally, men pledged in God's name and strength to resist to the utmost the assaults of King Alcohol as they would resist that which a Royal Prince so truly described as "the only enemy which Britain has to fear." Every good work like this must have a very small beginning, and though it may be so at first, yet, given a few faithful men in every regiment and battery, we all know how they will prove, to many a tempest-tossed comrade, harbours of refuge from the storms of temptation and sin which at times sweep through barracks, generally ending in the canteen, and there completing too often the destruction, morally and physically, of one who, under other possibilities and surroundings, might have become a gallant soldier.—Yours truly,

Robt. Pringle, M.D., Brigade Surgeon.

OPEN-AIR MISSION.

The outer suburbs of London have this year received numerous aggressive visits from bands of preachers appointed by this Mission. A series of forty-five special week-evening meetings was arranged by printed plan. Only the final gathering was prevented by rain—a striking testimony to the character of the passing summer. Places as far distant as Chorley Wood, Harlesden, Kingston on Thames, Leytonstone, Loughton, Sutton, and Walthamstow have thus been invaded by this peaceful and blessed campaign, as well as many others nearer home. Much holy zeal and loving unity have characterised the preachers' efforts, and withal the message has been delivered with a loyalty to its central theme, clearness of expression, and a heavenly power I have not seen surpassed.

The spirit of hearing among the people is most marked. Tokens of blessing have been vouchsafed, and in many instances local workers have been stirred to an emulation of which we cannot see too much. May the Lord be praised!

Frank Cockrem, Secretary.

DEVON AND CORNISH SEAMEN.—Rev. G. Hill and Mrs. Hill, of the Seamen's Christian Friend Society, have concluded a series of special services at the Society's stations on the coasts of Devon and Cornwall. At the different places visited they received a hearty welcome from their many seafaring friends, and their ministrations have been attended with tokens of good. At the closing meeting at the Fowey Sailors' Rest, Lord Robartes expressed his appreciation of the usefulness of the Rest and Home which was provided for the seamen, and Admiral Grant also spoke very sympathetically of the Society's work. The missionaries of the Society, both at Fowey and at Appledore, will be glad to receive gifts of book-bags, Bibles, books, and tracts for distribution.

THE INDIAN AND COLONIAL PROTESTANT MISSION has a two-fold object: (1) To preach the Gospel among Europeans, by conducting services and personal visitation in homes and by-ways; and (2) to frustrate the advance of Romanism, Ritualism and Rationalism, by means of lectures, the distribution of Protestant literature, and visiting of schools. This is not a new society; it does not interfere with any other agency in the mission field. Neither does any other agency carry out the aim and purpose of this mission. Funds are needed for the extension of the work; also a magic lantern with slides referring to Scriptural and Reformation subjects, chiefly intended for the young. The secretary, Mr. Foley, will be leaving shortly for Ceylon. Communications to him may be addressed 18, Paternoster-row.

IRISH NOTES.

According to the thirty-second annual report of the Church of Ireland Young Men's Christian Association just published, there are now 535 names on the roll of membership.

During the past quarter, the agents of the Belfast Branch of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children investigated 218 cases, and prosecuted in thirty-one cases, in all of which they got convictions.

The first social reunion of the Belfast Societies of Christian Endeavour was held in the hall of the Belfast Y.M.C.A. on Tuesday evening week. Representatives were present from seven societies, and Rev. William Park presided.

Mr. T. R. Warner, of Dublin, has been elected president for the current year of the Irish Baptist Association, which held its annual meetings last week in Belfast. In his opening address the new president gave a vigorous exposition of Baptist views and principles.

The Grampian Training Ship and Fox Lodge School, which are the only Protestant Industrial Schools in Ulster, are doing an excellent work, as was evidenced by the report presented to the annual meeting held on board the Grampian in Belfast Lough on Wednesday week.

A meeting to bid farewell to Messrs. Oliver and McAfee, who are going to Canada, and who for the past three or four years have been active agents of the Irish Mission in Dublin, was held in Brunswick-street Presbyterian Mission Hall on the 18th inst. Rev. Samuel Prenter presided, and several interesting addresses were delivered.

A meeting to say farewell to Miss Denison, who is being sent by the united branches of the Y.W.C.A. of County Antrim as a missionary to the women of Morocco, was held on Tuesday night week in Belfast. Rev. Charles Scott presided, and Miss Stovely, of Surat, Miss Ewart, and others took part. Miss Denison was presented with an Arabic Bible and Dictionary, and said she had been led to devote herself to foreign mission work through her connection with the Bangor Christian Workers' Society.

SCOTTISH NOTES.

Lord Overtoun has not given up his evangelistic work because of his elevation to the House of Peers. He is still prominent on the platform, where this is being forwarded, and recently he occupied, with much acceptance, the pulpit of the Free Church, Bowling. He has also been elected president of the Glasgow United Y.M.C.A.

Dr. Whyte, of Free St. George's, Edinburgh, has been very successful in his treatment of Bunyan's characters in "The Pilgrim's Progress," and it is rumoured that he anticipates delineating, in the same way, some of the chief characters in "The Holy War," under the title, "Bunyan's Military and Municipal Characters." His knowledge of and sympathy with Puritan theology will qualify him for this task.

At the last meeting of the National Bible Society, held in Glasgow, it was reported that there are now 110 colporteurs actively employed in Japan distributing the Scripture, and that an evangelist, who uses a tricycle, had in three months sold 1300 Bibles and Testaments in Normandy, in France, and that one gentleman in Glasgow had given £1000 for the support of native colporteurs in China. These are surely cheering facts.

A most interesting meeting was held on Friday in the Christian Institute, Glasgow, at which the ninth annual report of the Boys' Brigade was read. It appeared that this movement has now assumed a world-wide character, branches of the brigade existing in the United States and most of the British Colonies. The number of companies in the British Brigade has increased last year from 490 to 594, and these are connected with churches and Sunday-schools belonging to nearly all branches of the Christian Church. The officers have increased from 1,618 to 2,025, and the boys from 21,002 to 26,033. The number of boys attending the church or other Christian organisation with which the company is connected, in addition to the meetings or Bible classes of the companies, is 17,140.

SOHO.—The earnest band labouring in the Wardour-street Sunday-schools have issued a bright little report showing 400 children in attendance, among whom a valuable work is doing. During the season great attention is given to sending sickly children to the country. In the winter much is done in the way of relieving distress. Though working in fullest sympathy with the West London Mission, this committee is quite distinct, and is wholly responsible for the maintenance of the schools. The secretary is Mr. H. C. Allder, 9, Parolles-road, St. John's Ville, Highgate Hill, N.

THE Y.M.C.A.

The Bath Y.M.C.A. has just held a very pleasant and successful reunion of members and friends in the grounds of Mr. S. Fox Andrews, of Elmsleigh, Oldfield Park.

Mr. S. W. Gentle-Cackett, who leaves in November to reinforce the Central Soudan College, hoping to ascend the Benué branch of the river Niger, is addressing during October many Y.M.C.A. meetings in and around London.

A six days' mission is to be held at the West Branch (Savile-row, W.) from the 1st to the 6th prox. Among those who will conduct the services are Mr. Lewis W. Drake, Mr. A. Beresford Pite, Revs. H. L. de Candole, Marcus Rainsford, jun., and C. Silvester Horne.

Mr. Edward Trickett, the great sculler, an account of whose recent conversion is contained in the Sydney Y.M.C.A. Magazine, has been taking part in the work of the Sydney Association, and has given testimony that has exerted a wonderful influence on many persons.

The quarterly Conference of the Liverpool and North Wales District Union of Y.M.C.A.'s has just been held at Birkenhead. The proceedings, which passed off very successfully, were under the chairmanship of Mr. C. J. Procter, president of the Birkenhead Y.M.C.A.

The committee of the Central Young Men's Christian Association, Exeter Hall, have arranged for each Wednesday, commencing October 4, "A Half-hour's Talk with Business Men," by Mr. E. J. Kennedy. The meeting will commence at 1.30, and close punctually at 2.0.

The lectures which were given at Exeter Hall last week by Rev. Alex. Harrison, B.D., on "Christianity v. Scepticism" were largely attended and very much appreciated. Their matter, which was most valuable, was put in very instructive and convincing form, and the series will, without doubt, have effected much good amongst the audiences that assembled nightly.

The opening conversazione to inaugurate the winter's work at the Oxford Y.M.C.A. was held on September 22. There was a large attendance of the members. One interesting part of the evening's programme was the delivery of eighteen speeches of one minute each by the leaders of different sections of the work. There is an earnest evangelistic spirit among the active members of the Association.

The semi-jubilee of the Grangemouth Y.M.C.A. was celebrated on the 15th inst. at the annual social meeting, presided over by Ex-Provost Macpherson, who, for the whole twenty-five years, has taken a lively interest in all the work of the Association. The present membership is 107 (including forty junior members). It is computed that about 600 young men have passed through the Association since it was formed in 1868, many of whom are now filling honourable positions as pastors, missionaries, etc., in different parts of the world.

After considerable structural alterations, the addition of heating apparatus, and thorough renovation, the premises of the Walsall Y.M.C.A. were re-opened, and the winter session inaugurated, by special meetings on the 21st and 22nd inst. At the first meeting the Mayor, who was supported by many ministers and gentlemen of influence in the town, presided, and an address was given by Mr. W. Hind Smith, of the National Council. On the second evening the president, Mr. E. J. Shannon, to whose energy and liberality these improvements are chiefly due, occupied the chair. There was again a large gathering of friends of the Association, chiefly young men, and addresses were delivered by Messrs. H. M. Tyrer, F. C. Bennett, and R. D. Pringle.

The calendar for the forty-ninth session of the educational classes held in connection with the City of London Association, 186, Aldersgate-street, has just been issued. The session commences on Oct. 2, and will include forty-nine evening classes for young men. The list includes languages (ancient and modern), all the ordinary subjects of a commercial education (amongst which a course of lectures by a barrister on mercantile law holds a prominent place), Civil Service classes, St. John's ambulance, and gymnastics. Encouraged by the success achieved last year, the committee have again arranged for a series of lectures to be delivered in connection with the London Society for the Extension of University Teaching, the subject chosen being "The Chemistry of Air and Water," Mr. W. Popplewell Bloxam, of the Royal Naval College, Greenwich, being the lecturer. In addition to the certificates which are given on the result of examination at the close of the session, a large number of valuable prizes are also offered for competition.

REV. ALEX. BROWN, of Pollokshields, in a review of his ministerial life and work from his pulpit, declared that five-sixths of all his worries and troubles were due to the scourge of drink.

THE Y.W.C.A.

In connection with the St. John's Wood Y.W.C.A. Institute there is a Guild of working associates, each of the forty-two members undertaking some definite work for the benefit of women and girls. There is, however, need for a young lady of culture and ability, an earnest Christian, to undertake the secretaryship (honorary). This, writes the president, would be a service of much usefulness to any who would accept it as for the Lord. Information may be had of Miss A. N. Price, 46, Wellington-road, St. John's Wood.

A prospectus that should be in the hands of all young women living in London has recently been issued by the Council of the Association. The addresses are given of more than forty Institutes and Homes, and about one hundred other branches in all parts of the metropolis. The arrangements for the autumn include lectures, evening educational classes, gymnastic exercises, civil service classes, employment agencies, etc. Young women not acquainted with the Y.W.C.A. will do well to obtain a prospectus, which will be sent post free by the secretary, 16A, Old Cavendish-street, W.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOUR NOTES.

In Australia, Victoria leads the way in Christian Endeavour Societies:—Victoria, 310; South Australia, 204; New South Wales, unknown; New Zealand, 45; Tasmania, 17; Queensland, 16; West Australia, 3—595.

Rev. J. D. Lamont, of Belfast, Ireland, believes in the Christian Endeavour Society because it is simple, because it is scriptural, and because when tried it has been successful. The attendance at his week-night service has been doubled through the efforts of the members of one society.

"I have never asked any Endeavourer to do anything that he refused to do," said one pastor at the recent Halifax convention. "I have asked them to call on strangers, and they have done it; to sit up with the dying, and they have done it; to call on the sick, and they have made over a thousand calls on sick people in hospitals and out."

The Calder Vale and District Christian Endeavour Union held its first quarterly conference in Hanover Chapel, Halifax. In the afternoon the service consisted of a free parliament. The attendance was large, thirteen societies being represented. Addresses were given by Revs. H. Webb and E. R. Hasse. In the evening a consecration meeting was held, presided over by Rev. J. W. Sims. Rev. J. P. Treloar gave an address on "Endeavour," Rev. B. Datton (Halifax) on "Consecration," and Mr. Lewis Gaunt on "Conscience Education."

The second anniversary of the Wellhouse (Moravian) Y.P.S.C.E., Mirfield, has just been celebrated, large and enthusiastic meetings being held under the presidency of Rev. E. R. Hassé. Eight reports, read by the secretaries, told of the work of the different committees, and, whilst not ignoring difficulties encountered, they gave evidences of the Divine blessing. "Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings Thou hast perfected praise." Addresses were given by Revs. H. Webb and J. Connor, also by Mr. H. Toothill. The society has conducted cottage meetings and open-air services, ministered material and spiritual comforts to the poor and aged, and contributed to the Foreign Missions.

THE PROTESTANT REFORMATION SOCIETY held its monthly prayer-meeting on Friday last, at 20, Berners-street, W. Rev. Dr. Waller, Principal of St. John's Hall, Highbury, presided, and opened the meeting with a few encouraging words. Rev. W. R. Mowll, M.A., then delivered an address referring to 1 Peter iv. 17, and speaking of the importance of always keeping before us the fact that our Lord is about to appear again. If we, he said, always kept that before our minds there will be a greater desire to do God's will. Several prayers having been offered on behalf of the missionaries of the society, the meeting was brought to a close.

MANCHESTER MEDICAL MISSION.—The thirty-second annual report of the Medical Mission and Dispensary, 31, Red Bank, Manchester, states that during the year ending March 31, 510 new cases were admitted, and an aggregate of 9860 consultations given. The work is conducted on sound Gospel lines, and the people are very properly warned against indulging in alcoholic liquors. Dr. Meacham writes:—"If any disinterested person would just come down to Red Bank and walk a few hundred yards, such scenes and miserable bits of humanity could be shown as to prove that the powers of darkness are there, and that a real need does yet exist for the presence of all sorts of missions as well as this medical mission. All the powers that act for good are needed, but are rendered in many instances abortive by the dreadful drinking-shops."

The Book World.

Excellent Things, edited by J. H. Burridge, is properly designated "a prophetical and practical magazine." The monthly issues are replete with instruction on many themes. (1d. monthly. Holness.)

A Handbook for Mothers, by Jane H. Walker, M.D., physician to the New Hospital for Women, is a volume of simple hints on the management of health in anxious periods of life. The care of infants also receives attention. (2s. 6d. Longmans, Green & Co.)

Some of our East-Coast Towns, by J. Ewing Ritchie (Christopher Crayon). (Chelmsford: E. Durrant & Co.) These are chatty and interesting sketches, dealing with Norwich, Ipswich, Bury St. Edmunds, Chelmsford, Colchester, Lynn, Hadleigh, Maldon, and other places in Essex.

The Autocrat of the Nursery, by L. T. Meade. (3s. 6d. Hodder & Stoughton.) A new edition has been issued of this capital book. There are forty illustrations by T. Pym, and they add to the fun and animation of the story. The bright binding marks the book out as well suited for presenting to little folks.

Tell Me the Story of Jesus, penned by Mrs. Elizabeth Day, and pictured by T. Noyes Lewis, is a life of Christ written for the young. We regret to observe that the illustrations, which are numerous, exhibit some of the excesses and unrealities of mediæval delineations of sacred themes. (Day & Sons, 2A, Berners-street, W.)

The Happy Reader, part III., is "a short cut to the long-vowel sounds." It has been compiled by E. L. Young, and there are pictures for painting by B. D. Clephane. The series have been planned on a rational system, and will materially assist the young in surmounting orthographic and orthoëpic difficulties. (Simpkin, Marshall, & Co.)

The Story of Keswick, 1893. (1s. Keswick House, Paternoster-row.) Into this neat volume are gathered the principal addresses given at the Conference last July; in most cases the addresses have been revised by the speakers. They constitute an admirable repertory of the practical teaching given at these annual assemblies. There are some good engravings.

In Memoriam: Rev. W. Baker, B.D. Three sermons with short memoir and portrait are given in this chaste booklet. For nineteen years Mr. Baker was the devoted pastor of Ram's Episcopal Chapel, Homerton. Those who knew him will be glad to possess even the slight reminiscences that are here collected. (2s. Hunn & Berridge, 46, Queen Victoria-street, E.C.)

Tools for Teachers is the title of a collection, extending over nearly 500 pages, of anecdotes, illustrations, legends, etc., for Sunday-school teachers and other workers among the young, compiled and arranged by William Moodie. The book has evidently had much care bestowed upon it. The contents have been derived from very varied sources, and there are useful indices. (Elliot Stock.)

Memories of Keswick. A set of six choice views in sepia, by B. D. Sigmund, with Scripture texts, suitable for framing, have been produced by Mr. Walter B. Wheeler, 51, Paternoster-row. Their artistic finish, as well as the familiar scenes which they recall, will find favour with many friends to whom Keswick has become dear by spiritual and natural associations. (1s. each, or 4s. 6d. the set).

Experience. The new quarterly part of this magazine, the object of which is to enforce and illustrate Scriptural holiness, opens with a biographical sketch of the late Rev. John S. Workman. Rev. G. Armstrong Bennetts writes on "The New Testament and Teetotalism," and Mrs. Hannah W. Smith contributes aids to Bible readings and experience meetings, under the title of "Household Religion." (4d. C. H. Kelly.)

The Anti-Infidel Library, edited by H. L. Hastings, Boston, Mass., has recently been enlarged by the addition of a valuable treatise on Witchcraft: is it a Reality or a Delusion? This is part 9 of a series on Spiritualism, largely from the pen of Mr. Hastings himself. Remarks on the Mistakes of Moses, and Was Moses Mistaken? or Creation and Evolution, are other vigorous polemical pamphlets (3d. each; also penny issues. Marshall Brothers.)

The Problem of Human Suffering in the Light of Christianity is the latest "Present Day Tract." (4d. Religious Tract Society.) The author, Rev. Dr. T. Sterling Berry, shows that suffering is a consequence of sin, and that the evil is, in God's providence, overruled for good, suffering being (1) a preventive and corrective, (2) punitive, and (3) educational and disciplinary. Very properly he also points out that the future is bright with hope of the removal of suffering, through the incarnation and atoning work of the Son of God.

Joshua and the Land of Promise. By Rev. F. B. Meyer. (2s. 6d.; gilt edges, 3s. 6d. Morgan & Scott.) It is not needful for us to do more than announce the publication in book form of the practical chapters on Joshua's character and career which Mr. Meyer recently contributed to our columns. We think the volume will be found to be as acceptable and helpful to the working, warring Christian as any of the Scripture monographs that Mr. Meyer has produced. The special qualities of his writing, simplicity in interpretation, sympathy in feeling, and picturesqueness in style, are fully shown in his latest work, which has, we trust, a blessed mission to accomplish in this permanent form.

The Herald of Mercy is a halfpenny monthly specially prepared to meet the requirements of Gospel workers. Every page is an Evangelistic messenger, and the matter is so arranged that any issue may be cut up for distribution as illustrated tracts. Far and near this arrangement has met with the high appreciation of city missionaries and district visitors. The annual volume (1s.) is a bright book in which old and young will find entertainment and instruction. One purpose pervades the whole, and that is to justify the title by presenting Gospel appeals with urgent emphasis. Biographical sketches and striking incidents, as well as poetical selections, are all employed as feathers for these arrows, and for the illustration of Christian life and duty. The book will, therefore, be welcome in the homes of the people, and as an addition to parochial and school libraries. (Morgan & Scott.)

Mary Smith: Schoolmistress and Nonconformist. Vol. 1, Autobiography; Vol. 2, Poems. (G. & T. Coward, Carlisle. 3s. 6d. each.) These are deeply interesting memorials of a noteworthy character. Without any adventitious aids to advancement, and in the face of many difficulties, this sturdy self-reliant woman carved her own way in life, and accomplished much good in her day and generation. Coupled with an observant and practical mind, she could wield a ready pen, and the story she tells in these pages is full of good cheer to all who have a stiff battle to fight in society. The poems show good imaginative faculty, a wide range of knowledge, and a burning sympathy with truth and justice. Not the least interesting thing in the biographical volume is the correspondence with Mrs. Carlyle, who evidently recognised in the humble, plodding schoolmistress marks of that true genius which has been described as "an infinite capacity for taking pains."

The Evangelisation of the World—Mr. B. Broomhall's well-known record of consecration to God's work and appeal for Gospel missions, has, we rejoice to say, reached its twentieth thousand. It is designed to show that "in the whole compass of human benevolence there is nothing so grand, so noble, so Christian, so truly God-like as the work of evangelising the heathen," and is very properly dedicated to English-speaking young men everywhere. In the past it has influenced many to a life of devotion; we trust its mission in the future will be still more signally blessed. In view of the revived interest in missions, this book should be earnestly and prayerfully studied. By diagrams and figures the pages emphasise the world's deep need, and by portraits and other illustrations they excite interest in workers who occupy front places in the great missionary host. Mr. Broomhall's work is, in fact, a mine of information, and those who peruse it will lay a good foundation for a sound acquaintance with the great and pressing question of world-wide evangelisation. (Cloth, 2s. 6d.; presentation edition, 3s. 6d. Morgan & Scott.)

Messrs. Raphael Tuck & Sons (72, 73, Coleman-street) announce some interesting literary and painting prize competitions, open to amateurs and children, in connection with their publications for the present season. In order to compete, it is necessary to buy one of the books or booklets in the list, many of which are valuable volumes, illustrated by well known artists. In the literary division, the competitions include both original compositions and selections; and in that for painting, the copying of illustrations, and, for children, the filling in of outline pictures. Some 3000 prizes are offered, £1000 in money, and others to the value of £1500. Mr. Marcus Stone, R.A., and Mr. Grant Allen are presidents of the judging committees; and the competitions will undoubtedly be of great educational value. "Tennyson's Heroes and Heroines" (15s.) is a beautiful volume for adults, whilst "Told by the Sunbeams and Me" (5s.) is a children's book, with charming pictures. "Pleasures and Treasures" (1s.) is an amusing picture-book for the little ones. "In the Service of the Lord" (1s. 6d.) a booklet, giving a text of Scripture and a poetical stanza for every day in the month, by Helen Marion Burnside, is made very attractive by artistic illustrations.

Mr. Ernest Rickman, Newtown, Handcroft-road, West Croydon, publishes a useful temperance reciter, entitled The Gospel Arrow (2s. 6d. per 100).

Stockwell Orphanage Tracts.—Passmore & Alabaster. 3s. per 100.) A series of admirable letter leaflets, setting forth the claims of the institution, and illustrating in varied incident form the Gospel message.

In Memoriam: Sir Michael Connal; A Sermon by Rev. F. H. Georgeson. (Mackinlay, Glasgow.) To many this sermon will be of interest as outlining the lessons of the long and useful career of one who faithfully served his day and generation.

Prebendary Webb-Peploe's closing address at the last Keswick Convention is published as a penny booklet, under the title of The Grace of God. (Marshall Brothers.) It was a strong utterance, and those who help in circulating it may be assured of good results.

Pope or Queen? The Allegiance of Roman Catholic State Officials. Mr. Edward Littleton, hon. secretary of the North Sussex Protestant Parliamentary Council, gives in this pamphlet his correspondence with the Lord Mayor, and practical comments thereon. An appendix presents correspondence with Mr. Chamberlain. (1d. W. Wileman, Bouverie-street, E.C.)

The Illustrated Handbook of Western Australia (P. Callaghan, jun., 134, Swanston-street, Melbourne) contains a great variety of information concerning the resources of that colony, mineral, pastoral, and agricultural, also interesting particulars of the pearl-fishing and jarrah-timber industries. An attractive feature is a series of views of the chief cities of Australia and illustrated reminiscences of early Melbourne.

POST CARDS.

GREAT MALVERN.

Solemn and sweet were the echoes of the farewell hymns on these ancient hills last Sunday, at the conclusion of the Y.M.C.A. open-air services. Rev. Walter Bradbury assisted, whilst preaching in a neighbouring parish church, and concluded with an address on the first open-air service mentioned in the Old Testament, Nehemiah viii —"Go your way, eat the fat, and drink the sweet, and send portions for them for whom nothing is prepared; for the joy of the Lord is your strength."

TENT WORK.

A good work has been accomplished at Cubitt Town in a large tent erected by the North-East London Gospel Mission. The meetings were continued twice daily for four weeks, and were principally taken by Mr. R. Spragg. The Lord has graciously owned the Word, and about one hundred have professed conversion. All ages have been blessed, from the children to the hoary head. The Mission is being continued nightly in the Assembly Hall, Glengall-road. A large number sat down to "thanksgiving tea" last week, and cheering accounts were rendered and powerful addresses given.

MANITOBA.

I regret that I have not had time to write to the kind friends who have sent to my address parcels of Christian literature. I trust they will accept this intimation that it has all been carefully distributed. Some of it has gone to our hospital, where it is gladly received by the matron, who gives it to those of the patients who can read. Some has been found helpful in Gospel temperance work, and the rest I have sent to country missions and to a devoted worker, who gratefully used it in his gaol visits. Every card, text, book, or paper is thoughtfully used. All such messages are much needed in this country, where waifs and strays from the "Old Land" abound. Annie Davidson.

ST. LAURENCE'S CHURCH, BIRMINGHAM.

A successful fifteen days' mission has just been conducted in the above church by Rev. Dr. Morris, of the Church Parochial Mission Society, which has resulted in the conversion of many, and the consecration of many more. It was indeed a blessed sight when the believers, who were able to attend an afternoon consecration meeting, "lifted their hand unto the Lord," in token that they were willing to be henceforth fully consecrated to Jesus, and that they there yielded themselves unto Him. The population of the parish is formed of the lower social strata, and it is exceedingly difficult to get them inside a place of worship, but a band of earnest workers went out night by night, with the result that many were prevailed upon to attend the services, some of whom found peace and joy in trusting Jesus. To God be all the glory. Mrs. Morris's labours among the women were much blessed at the afternoon meetings. W. H.

Notes and Comments.

NEXT week we purpose giving portrait and sketch of Rev. James Stalker, D.D., of Free St. Matthew's, Glasgow.

Death has, during the week, removed two Christians who will be widely mourned in the circles of earnest evangelistic endeavour. Mr. Robert Paton was a man of noble purpose and vigorous action. Sir S. A. Blackwood, in a position of high official responsibility, witnessed for Christ with noble consistency. Both these devoted men have frequently been introduced to our readers as "helpers in the war" of God. To many minds the serious question is, who is to follow these leaders, to fill their places and emulate their zeal?

At the Baptist missionary meetings, held this week at Reading, Mr. W. Payne, of Upper Clapton, opened an important subject of conference by a paper on "The Duty and Privilege of the Young in Relation to our Foreign Missions." It is an encouraging sign of the times that so much attention is being paid in Christian circles to the young. The Divine power lying latent in believing children ("for of such is the kingdom of heaven") is an unknown quantity of measureless extent, which, if no longer neglected, discouraged, repressed, may revolutionise missionary enterprise no less than electricity is revolutionising our social and commercial life.

He who has set his glory above the heavens has, out of the mouths of babes and sucklings, ordained strength, that He may still the enemy and the avenger. In that millennial day when "the wolf shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard lie down with the kid, a little child shall lead them; . . . and the sucking child shall play on the hole of the asp, and the weaned child shall put his hand on the cockatrice den." When the duty and privilege of the young in relation to foreign missions becomes a primary subject in the education of Christian children, so that they grow up with a burning love to the souls of the millions of heathen children, the stilling of the enemy will be near at hand.

A correspondent wisely says:—"I don't think any matter is more important at this crisis of the Church's history, than to get people off the lines of depending upon ministers and special services to win souls. If the unused thousands of Christians were awakened to their personal responsibility, a glorious harvest would be gathered this winter. So far as I can find, people are longing to live and work for God, and the salvation of the unsaved; but the Quietist spirit has got hold of so many good people, and there needs to be a great awakening."

We commend the following five passages from the Gospel of John, the Seer of the visions in the Apocalypse, to the consideration of our readers:—

ii. 22.—When therefore He was risen from the dead his disciples remembered that He had said this unto them; and they believed the scripture, and the word which Jesus had said.

xii. 16.—These things understood not his disciples at the first; but when Jesus was glorified, then remembered they that these things were written of Him, and that they had done these things unto Him.

xiii. 19.—Now I tell you before it come, that, when it is come to pass, ye may believe that I am He.

xiv. 29.—And now I have told you before it come to pass, that when it is come to pass ye might believe.

xvi. 4.—These things have I told you, that when the time [their hour] shall come ye may remember that I told you of them.

In each of these cases the Lord Jesus spoke of events then future. The object of the prediction was not to lead his disciples to inquire how or when it should be fulfilled; but that when it came to pass they might remember, believe, be prepared, forewarned, forearmed. Is there no lesson in this for us as to the purpose of prophecies yet unfulfilled?

Many hostile criticisms of the Bible arise from imperfect knowledge of the Book and its story. Therefore, we welcome such a ministry of instruction as is now being exercised by Rev. James Neil, formerly incumbent of Christ Church, Jerusalem, in his "Talks about Palestine," with dioramic illustrations. After a long stay in Brighton, Mr. Neil has come to London, and from Monday to Friday next week, will describe Eastern life and manners in the Bickersteth Memorial Hall, Hampstead. One who has attended Mr. Neil's lectures says they are at once "a strong and original defence of Scripture inspiration, of a kind interesting enough to draw even outsiders to hear, and a course of very thorough Scriptural teaching on true Evangelical and Protestant lines." Other localities will be visited during the winter months, of which announcements will be made.

In the October issue of The Wesleyan Methodist Magazine, the editor, Rev. W. L. Watkinson, examines "the Labour Church" on its own profession, and finds it sadly wanting in the light of the New Testament standard. He exposes the essential narrowness of the conception, and shows that the religious element is a minus quantity in the organisation. In the hymnal of this church "the name of Christ is not once mentioned; neither is there any expression of the sorrow and strife of the soul, no contrition for sin, no longings for goodness. The book is full of martial lyrics chiefly directed against tyrannical capitalists and kings!" Mr. Watkinson concludes, and, we think, with ample reason—"The Labour Church will, in all probability, follow the Chartist Churches into the limbo of extinct organisations; but the Church of Christ speaking words of spirit and life into the hearts of the people, abideth for ever."

In the journal of that holy man of God, John Woolman, occur a few sentences which are of permanent beauty and worth, which we will quote. The Journal is all precious, but we take only a few scattered words:—

"Feeling the spring of Divine love opened, and a concern to speak, I said a few words in a meeting, in which I found peace." "We were taught by renewed experience to labour for an inward stillness; at no time to seek for words, but to live in the Spirit of truth, and utter that to the people which truth opened in us." "Through the goodness of the Lord we oftentimes experienced his heart-tendering presence among us."

Among his last words were the following, which he spoke to a friend who was weeping for him:—

I would rather thou wouldst guard against weeping for me, my sister; I sorrow not, though I have had some painful conflicts, but now they seem over, and matters well settled; and I look at the face of my dear Redeemer, for sweet is his voice, and his countenance is comely.

Mr. J. Vernon Bartlet, of Mansfield College, Oxford, contributes to The Expository Times an article on "Alexander Vinet, a Pioneer of the Nineteenth Century," which is characterised by much of philosophic insight and great sympathy with Evangelical truth. He regards Vinet as a leader in harmonising the contending theories of various schools of thinkers, as a voice to the cultured despisers of religion, as a writer who "restored religion afresh to the language of literature, and as a Biblical or exegetical theologian before his age."

The Vinet whose breadth of view and large humanity made his criticisms welcome to the littérateurs and thinkers of his day, was an eminently sane Christian, and no fanciful enthusiast. At a time, then, when the exact type of Christianity to be approved is often a matter of some doubt to even pious souls, the spirit of Alexander Vinet may well be recommended to thoughtful Christians everywhere.

Brunswick Chapel, Upper Berkeley-street, W., which has of late, under the care of Dr. Bullinger, become an Evangelical rallying point and a centre of Protestant testimony, is about to pass into the hands of the Church Army. This is a cause of surprise to many, and among them the incumbent and trustees, whose hopes that the expiring lease would be renewed have been utterly disappointed. In a letter to his congregation, Dr. Bullinger remarks of this passing away of an Evangelical church in the West End, that "it would be a public loss at any time, but in the present crisis in ecclesiastical affairs it is nothing less than a calamity, far outweighing and overshadowing our own personal loss and inconvenience."

The census report continues to yield to readers some strange and admonitory facts; thus, it appears that we have 28,000 wives who are only fifteen years of age, and 169 widows of that tender age. These youthful marriages are contracted by the poorest of the people. Wisdom would say, "Wait until the constitution is fairly fixed and until you have at least enough to live upon decently." On the other hand, the selfishness of young women in the middle classes, who will have a husband with a good income, or else live amid the comforts of their father's home, is deserving of severe blame.

The census shows that we have 97,000 lunatics in England and Wales, of whom 51,000 are women. How far the cause of this excess of women over men is due to influences which touch women alone does not appear. That the pressure of poverty tells most hardly on them it is easy to believe. The monotony of a woman's life also has a bad influence, for whatever the husband's hardships may be, he has the companionship of his fellow-workmen, the stimulus of labour, and the advantage of change between home and the workshop. We believe that the instances of lunacy among women in the thinly-populated districts of Canada are very numerous, owing, it is supposed, to the women's lonely life. The dreadful influence of drink is never to be overlooked when insanity is concerned.

Mr. William Tallack, of the Howard Association, writes to The Times one of his thoughtful and interesting letters on English prison administration, in which he acknowledges, to the credit of the chief prison authorities, and especially of General Sir E. du Cane, that our "English local gaols (as distinguished from the convict prisons on the associated system) are, mainly through their general retention of the separation of prisoners from corrupting intercourse with one another, unsurpassed in the world for their management and discipline." Mr. Tallack is of opinion, however, that even in these prisons, there are certain important points in which they may be greatly improved. He pleads for a larger staff of warders, and also for a more generous retiring allowance to them, one somewhat more in harmony with the allowance to policemen.

Mr. Tallack's observations on prison labour and on its competition with the labour market are very valuable. "Even prisoners," he says, "have their own rights of labour and even competition up to a certain point. They had those rights before they entered gaol, and they are inalienable." He thinks it is especially important to remember that, with any moderate variety of work, prison labour can only compete with free labour to an almost infinitesimal extent. There is only one prisoner in English gaols to about every 2300 of the outside population. So there can never be any serious danger of injuring the outside worker by local gaol occupation for short-term prisoners.

The visits in several prisons of one or two lady visitors, who instruct the female inmates, are said to be very useful; but the system needs encouragement and extension. The case of persons sent to gaol for "contempt of court" needs more attention; some discrimination is required in passing sentence on men whose wives have run them into debt without their knowledge and also destroyed the County Court summonses. There was no contempt of court, as the men knew nothing of the debt nor of the summonses till they were arrested. It is in dealing with points like these that volunteer inspectors like Mr. Tallack, men of experience and wide information, can do so much to remove anomalies, to correct injustice, and to hold open before men the door of hope. Our magistrates and judges may be just, and our prison officials, from governor to warder, humane, but all are the better for the friendly visits of the representative of the Howard Association to the prisoners in gaol.

Professor Jowett, whose name has figured so prominently during the past generation in theological and academical controversies, has now passed "within the veil." The Master of Balliol combined with great mental endowment much strength of purpose, and these were not the least admired by those who most decidedly disapproved of the causes which brought them into exercise.

Shaky Preaching.

BY DR. THEODORE L. CUYLER.

I have heard of a Scottish congregation who presented their minister with a sum of money and sent him off to the Continent for a holiday. A gentleman just back from the Continent met a prominent member of the church and said to him, "Oh, by the bye, I met your minister in Germany. He was looking very well; he didn't look as if he needed a rest." "No," said the church member very calmly, "it was na him, it was the congregation that was needin' a rest."

Against what particular style of minister this sharp shot was aimed I do not know, but there is a certain type of preaching from which any intelligent congregation might well seek to have a long vacation. It is what may, in homely phrase, be described as shaky preaching. The minister, if he belongs to any Apostolical succession, is a successor of Thomas the Doubter. He spends his week in a sort of twilight atmosphere, groping about in the company of writers who are a compound of speculation and scepticism, and who claim to be the representatives of "advanced thought." The poor man may be afflicted with a natural tendency to doubts and indecision in spiritual matters, and instead of selecting books that would confirm his weak faith, he chooses those that unsettle him all the more. He dives into some of the latest issues of "conjectural criticism," and pores over them until he not only rejects the traditional authorship of many of the books in his Bible, but he is doubtful if his Bible is really the supremely infallible Word of God after all. He looks at it as "through a glass darkly." Instead of grasping its grand vital truths firmly, and building his pulpit-work on them, he gropes about among the mysterious things which "belong unto God," and he puzzles his brains with that which is too deep for any mortal man to fathom.

That glorious tonic preacher, Dr. Maclaren, of Manchester, says that every minister "ought to burn his own smoke"; but the shaky minister prefers to live in the smoke of his own doubts, and envelopes himself in the superadded mists of other men's unsettling speculations. Instead of keeping his feet firmly planted on the everlasting Rock, and attempting to draw everybody else up on to that Rock, he is constantly venturing off upon the shoals and sand-bars. "I suppose that you know all the reefs and shoals and sunken rocks on this coast?" said a passenger to the captain of a coasting steamer. "No," replied the sagacious captain, "I do not pretend to that, but I do know where the deep water is." It is a thousand pities that every minister of the Lord Jesus Christ has not sense enough to imitate that wise shipmaster.

When the minister who has spent his week in the unwholesome atmosphere of human speculations and reckless Biblical criticisms, and "oppositions of science falsely so called," enters his pulpit on the Sabbath, he is completely hamstrung. He comes before his congregation, who have had their own share of difficulties and doubts and temptations and trials. They need to be fed, and with the veritable bread of heaven, and not to be put off with the hard "stone" of human quarrying. They have troubles enough of their own without listening to their minister's troubles about "inspiration," or about "evolution," or about "the existence of sin in God's world," or any other abstruse questions. Instead of being unsettled, they want to be confirmed and strengthened, and helped to fight the battles of daily life with a more vigorous faith and a brighter hope.

The man who has not spiritual backbone enough to stand up straight and deliver the mighty message which the Holy Spirit has given him, and to deliver it without any trembling of his knees or stammering of his lips—such a man had better doubt whether God Almighty has ever called him into the pulpit at all. "The prophet that hath a dream, let him tell a dream, and he that hath my Word, let him speak my Word faithfully."

The ministers of the Lord Jesus Christ, who not only draw their fellow men around their pulpits, but draw souls to the Saviour, are men who, like Spurgeon and Simpson, and Maclaren and Newman Hall, and Phillips Brooks and Moody and McNeill, have a clear conviction of vital spiritual truth and a firm courage in proclaiming it. The theological seminaries—in all our Evangelical denominations—who turn out well-rooted, well-grounded, spiritually-minded preachers of the everlasting Gospel, will preserve the confidence of the churches. Strong winds that blow down ill-rooted trees may be expected in the religious as well as in the natural world; but the men who are stoutly enough vertebrated to stand up against a cyclone, are the men whom God wants in his pulpits in these days. As for the whole tribe of shaky preachers, let them be granted leave to enjoy a perpetual vacation.

FROM DR. PARROTT, HANKOW.

Writing from Hankow on August 7, Dr. Parrott says that the Chinese authorities have treated the recent murder of Swedish missionaries at Sungpu as a matter of little moment. "They are only Swedes, and Sweden cannot come to China without warships!"

He proceeds: "The foreign residents here, in Shanghai, and other ports, are very indignant at the behaviour of the local and provincial officials, and are urging the Western authorities at Pekin to take the matter up. What will be the outcome of it, who can say? The Shanghai authorities take a strong view of the case, and think the time has come to teach the rulers of China a severe lesson. They issue proclamations in our favour, promise to protect foreigners, and profess to be sincere in it all, but practically they treat us as they did thirty or forty years ago.

"To-day is a day of special prayer amongst the missionaries all over China, that God may be pleased to turn the hearts of the rulers of China from this continued persecution. It is feared that the whole question of foreign residence in China is approaching a crisis. Our trust is in God.

"Early in October, we are hoping to continue our journey up the Han to Shensi. Since the recent disturbances in this province, the hospital attendances have somewhat fallen off. It is generally known that the official class hate us, and many of the common people are afraid to have much to do with us, lest their oppressors should come down upon them for it. One poor fellow who carried water for the two murdered brethren at Sungpu, has been seized by the officials and punished, simply for giving assistance to the foreigners, notwithstanding the clause in the treaty that natives are allowed to enter into the service of foreigners, and to become Christians. The poor fellow has had a long iron rod passed through his chest (just beneath the clavicle) and is fixed to a post or wall. The actual men who committed the murders, and those who urged them on, are still at large. The people on the streets are saying: 'Oh, it does not matter about killing foreigners: the Viceroy only laughs at it.'

"Our little Reggie has had a bad attack of malarial fever, which has left him very weak. Mrs. Parrott has kept fairly well, but the boys are not like the same we brought from England. I too have had occasional attacks of fever; but we thank the Lord for a joyful spirit."

Life in Christ.

By Rev. DAVID MacEWAN, D.D.*

The most effective method of promoting united action and brotherly affection among different denominations, and one which the Evangelical Alliance has kept ever in view, is by strengthening the force and elevating the tone of their common spiritual life. Death means disintegration; life means cohesion and unity. A living body has many members and organs, which differ widely in their structure and functions, yet by the cohesive and unifying energy of a common life they are made one in action and sympathy.

Living things have no doubt the faculty of fighting, but the fighting arises from diversity and antagonism in the objects for which they live. Life in Christ, however, is so essentially a unity, both in its nature and aspirations, that it makes all who possess it, truly, and in the deepest sense, one in Him. The profession of a common creed may give union among Christians like that of soldiers marching under one flag, or the members of a family dwelling under one roof; but this gives union of a higher kind, the union of heart with heart, and spirit with spirit, linking all together in one chain of love, and by the life-throb of a common sympathy. And as "the life is more than meat, and the body than raiment," so this life in Christ is more than the intellectual food of Christian dogma, and its testimony before the world for Christ greater and better far than the mere outward robe of denominational zeal.

No one can read the words of our Lord without being impressed with the frequency with which He alludes to the giving of life to his people as the grand object of his mission on earth, and with the remarkable language in which the life is described by Him. He had come, He tells us, that we "might have life, and might have it more abundantly." He describes it as "eternal life." He speaks of himself as "The Life," and again as "The Resurrection and the Life." And He declares that they who believe in Him "shall never see death," and that "whosoever believeth in Him, though he were dead, yet shall he live, and whosoever liveth and believeth in Him shall never die." The language of the Apostles, too, is not less remarkable and expressive. For they speak of it as "newness of life," the life of those who are "risen with Christ," who are "quickened together" with Christ, who "live in Him," and who are so raised up together with the risen Saviour, that they "sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus."

Who can grasp all the fulness of meaning and greatness of privilege that such language conveys? It is sometimes asked, "Is life worth living?" and in the loneliness, and weariness, and hard toil of this earthly life, one is not surprised at the question; while much has been said about it neither wisely nor well. But here is life surely that is worth living, worth aspiring after with our whole hearts, life in blessed union with the living Christ, the only life worthy of the name, life that satisfies all the longings of the human soul, that lifts above all the aches and griefs of the human heart, that removes all sense of loneliness and isolation from the human spirit, that illumines the obscure, transfigures the earthly, binds together in one blessed unity the past, present, and future, the distant and the near, and that opens up to man the only perfect consecration and development of his whole nature.

There are three words I would associate with life in Christ; and all I have to say may be comprised in explaining the sense in which they apply.

NEWNESS OF LIFE.

The first word is newness. It is a new life. No doubt it is so in a sense, we all understand, in giving rise to new experiences, new hopes, new desires, new joys. The man feels as if walking in a new world. "Old things pass away, all things become new." Everything wears a new aspect, but the change is not in the things but in himself, not in the world without but in the life within. And his case may be compared to that of a captive prince, who, though a prisoner, is for the time the occupant of a palace, through whose halls and gardens he can walk freely, its servants waiting upon him, and its adornments delighting his eye, but with the consciousness of being still a prisoner liable at any moment to be called forth to die. But suddenly the dynasty is changed: the captive prince becomes the rightful king. And though servants, halls, and gardens remain the same, they wear entirely a new aspect, and what spoke to him before of degradation, captivity, and peril, speaks to him now of liberty, safety, and kingly joy.

So is it with the man who lives anew in Christ. He is delivered from condemnation; in Him he is restored to God's favour, adopted into God's family, emancipated from the old life of sin, with its captivity and wretchedness, and lives anew in holy alliance with truth and righteousness, and in blessed union with God Himself.

This, however, is not the most important phase of the newness that belongs to life in Christ. The important fact is that it is resurrection life. It is neither the prolongation nor even the purification of a life we already possess; nor is it the mere resuscitation or revival of an old life such as we had in Adam before the fall. It is new in the sense of being a direct participation with Christ in his risen life. When Christ said "I am the resurrection and the life" He did not refer to what He shall be to his people at the last day, when He shall raise them from the dead, but what He is to them now; and when the Apostle speaks of our being "raised up together with Christ" and of being "partakers with him in his resurrection," he means that we are united with Christ in the very life which He secured for Himself through his resurrection from the dead.

It is a new life which has come into conflict with death and has triumphed over it, life which springs out of death, which the iron teeth of death could not crush, and which rises all the more into strength and vitality—that its joy is that of conquest and victory over death's power. We die with Christ on the cross, die in the spirit of our old nature; we see in Him the doom which our sins deserved, and accept it as it falls on our divine Substitute and yet through this very death we attain to newness of life, for Christ is also our resurrection. He lives and we live also, partakers with Him in his death and partakers with Him also in his resurrection from the dead.

LIFE IN CONTINUITY.

The second word I would associate with life in Christ is continuity. It is a continuous life; passing through different stages and transitions, but in all its essential elements of experience without interruption or end.

Although we as Christians are not exempted from physical death, two things must be obvious. It is impossible, first, that a believer can die precisely in the same sense in which the impenitent die. They die under the curse, under the penalty of unpardoned sin, but in the case of believers sin is abolished and the sting of death taken away. It is equally impossible that a believer can die precisely in the same sense in which Christ died. Though not a sinner He died in the room of sinners. He endured the penalty of our guilt, was made a curse for us that we might be delivered from the curse, his whole life on earth being a combat with death that He might make his people victorious over death's power. But the combat is past; the curse is abolished, and, therefore, in the experience of believers, dying can be no more in its old sense death. There is life in Christ which cannot die, whatever may become of the mortality of the body. Meanwhile, our life is hid with Christ in God, realised only by faith, and perhaps through many a hard struggle; but from its beginning in conversion till its consummation in glory it is one continuous life. Changes may come, times of special blessing or special trial, seasons of revival and of partial decline; there may be battling with care and difficulty, and experience of sorrow and joy, but our life in Christ in all its essential elements of security and blessedness remains the same. What men call death is not an arrest of progress, but only another step in the march of a life that can never die. It is a sweet transition. It is "to depart and to be with Christ, which is far better." It is to lose nothing of the life of the soul that is worth retaining, but only what encumbers its activity, hinders its purity, retards its progress, and mars its joy. It is not death, but life.

FELLOWSHIP OF LIFE IN CHRIST.

The third word I would associate with life in Christ is fellowship. It takes all lonesomeness out of life, by bringing us into precious spiritual fellowship with Christ and all that are truly his. We know how this fellowship of life in Christ was powerfully shown in the conduct of the Apostles as soon as they were assured of his resurrection from the dead. From that hour He lived in their sympathies with a Divine force they had never felt previous to his dying. There was a communion of spirit with Him, a companionship of life, that raised them superior to all fear and danger, and made them regardless of the world's frown in witnessing for Him as their Lord and Saviour.

The transition of our Lord into the heavenly world is not only the best of all proofs of the reality of that world, but it tells also of a Friend there in whose resurrection life you may find solace and companionship amidst the most desolating bereavements, since it proclaims that in being gathered from you, the friends you most love are not lost to you, but continue to live in Him in that world of glory into which He has passed, yours and theirs, the resurrection and the life to both, and a bond of living fellowship betwixt them and you. You may speak of them as "departed," yet nothing is betwixt them and you but a thin veil which a little illness or accident may at any moment rend asunder. They live the same new and continuous life in Christ as yourselves.

WANTED, LIFE MORE ABUNDANTLY.

And now, if you desire more unity in our churches, more brotherly love, more earnest effort, more faithful witnessing for Christ, more thirst for saving souls, more power to do their proper work, what above all things should you seek and pray for? Is it not that they may have more of the life that is in Christ? And if the churches of our day were only to go forth, permeated with the life that is in Christ, and true to that spiritual mission which the living Christ has committed to them, we should soon behold denominational differences forgotten, the whole world conquered for Christ, and all tribes and nations made one in Him.

* Notes of an address at the Evangelical Alliance Conference at Dublin.

"IF THOU HADST KNOWN!"

"When He beheld the city He wept over it, saying, If thou hadst known . . ."—Luke xix. 41, 42.

"If thou hadst known!" so spake the Saviour Lord
To those who spurnèd his life-giving Word,
As o'er Jerusalem his tears were poured—
"If thou hadst known!"

"If thou hadst known!" heaven-chosen, favoured race,
What meant the lifting on thee of his face,
Thou could'st not have despised such wondrous grace,
"If thou hadst known."

Lord, make us know, "while it is called to-day,"
The things that to our peace belong, and may
We never hear Thee, sorrowing o'er us, say,
"If thou hadst known."

Salvation seeking only in thy cross,
May those eternal things our hearts engross,
For which we surely must count all things loss,
Did we but know.

Though now at best we know Thee but in part,
Yet all we can receive of what Thou art
Do Thou reveal to each believing heart,
That we may know.

And suffer not that in dark hours of pain
We doubt that Thou wilt turn all grief to gain,
And move Thee, Friend so faithful, to complain—
"If thou hadst known!"

For when we reach the presence of the King,
"The half hath not been told," our hearts shall sing,
Such joy had borne us as on eagle wing,
If we had known.

THE SECOND COMING OF CHRIST.—A conference on this theme will be held in Morley Hall, Y.W.C.A., Regent-street, W., on Thursday and Friday, October 12 and 13, when various important aspects of the subject will be treated by Rev. John Wilkinson, Dr. Neatby, Revs. A. Wilkes and F. B. Meyer, Mr. T. Shuldham Henry, Dr. McKilliam, and Mr. J. H. Burridge.

MISSIONARY PENCE ASSOCIATION.—Readers of our "Donation List" will have noticed that this useful aid to missions continues its good work. Its success is only limited by the number of its members and subscribers. The Association assists the funds of a dozen or more societies monthly. As its aim is to secure contributions of one penny weekly to foreign missions, it affords the means whereby those who cannot give largely may still help forward the great work of preaching the Gospel to every creature. Contributions received, or full particulars supplied by, the hon. sec., Mr. J. Jackson, 186, Aldersgate-street, London, E.C.

Canon Bell on the Bible.*

My subject is "The adaptation of the Bible to the moral necessities of fallen man." Assuming that God is a God of mercy and grace, there is an antecedent probability that He would give to man a revelation of his character, and of the feelings with which He regards his creatures.

Apart from revelation, I am able to discover that God is. There are everywhere evidences of a designing mind, not only in suns and systems that garnish the heavens, but in the humblest daisy that blooms on the sod, and in the tiniest insect that dances in the sunbeam.

The conceptions of the Almighty which reason, even at her best, is capable of forming, are indefinite and unsatisfactory. God allowed man to try to discover his attributes and perfections; gave him time and opportunity enough to prove what he was able to attain to without a revelation. And it was proved that "man by wisdom knew not God."

Then as regards civilisation, and the arts that wait upon her steps, Greece and Rome attained an excellence still held up as the unrivalled model of perfection. But philosophy, with all the splendour of her discoveries, was never able to banish polytheism from the earth; and amidst all the beauty and genius of the Pagan world there remained the terrible spectacle of gross idolatry, accompanied by moral degradation. Plato and Cicero—men so greatly in advance of their age—were themselves forced to acknowledge that the light they possessed was utterly powerless to control the evil passions and the corrupt practices by which they were surrounded. This is

HUMAN NATURE AT ITS BEST ESTATE.

Without a revelation we could not worship the Lord God He demands to be worshipped; we couldnot approach Him with confidence, or be certain that He would accept the homage we offer. It was absolutely necessary that there should be some communication from God to fallen man, to meet our ignorance and supply our needs.

Such a communication our Father, mindful of their wants, compassionating their ignorance, has given to his children. "God, who, at sundry times and in divers manners, spake in time past unto the fathers by the prophets, hath in these last days spoken unto us by his Son." God used men as instruments to convey his truth to men. He might, had He so pleased, have given his communication direct from heaven, as when He gave the Ten Commandments. Employing no mortal pen whatever, He might have been his own historian, his own prophet, his own evangelist, and completed without human intervention the whole Bible from Genesis to Revelation, and then set his own seal on the Sacred Canon. But it pleased his infinite wisdom to reveal his counsels in another manner. He made inspiration

THE COUNTERPART OF THE INCARNATION.

As in "the Word made flesh" we have, without encroachment of the one nature on the other, without confusion of the persons, very God and very man, so in the inspired Scriptures we have a book, every passage of which is truly human, and yet every sentence of which is truly Divine. Holy men spake it, but they spake and wrote it as they were moved by the Holy Ghost. And just as when God sent the Word Incarnate into the world, He sent Him, not in the likeness of an angel, nor clad in the robes of glory, but in the likeness of sinful flesh; so when He sent the written word into the world, He did not use an angel's hand to indite it on leaves gathered from the tree of life in the Paradise above; but men were his scribes, and they wrote the Spirit's inbreathed words with a reed from the Jordan on papyrus from the Nile.

Now, if, as we find, the Bible is a revelation from God to man, then it is only natural to conclude that it provides for all his moral necessities. And it does so—for first, it is adapted to his mental faculties. It abounds in the information which he needs. It contains a history of the world from the beginning; throws light on the creation and the genesis of man, on his temptation and fall, on the peopling of the earth, the progress of nations, and the rise and destruction of the mighty empires of the world. As a book of history alone, the Bible is invaluable, and reveals God as the God of nations, by whom kings reign and princes decree justice.

Again, the Bible is adapted to man's imagination. Where is the imagination as in the Bible? What sublimity in the Book of Job, what grandeur in the Prophets, what beauty in the Psalms, what glory in the visions of the Apocalypse! The sacred writers have the profoundest sympathy with nature; they not only transfuse their own life into the landscape, but they discern how much of the living God is there—that "his tender mercies are over all his works," and in manifold wisdom He has made them all. We hear God's voice in the thunder, and the sea. We see his tenderness in the lilies of the field, his love in the fowls of the air. The great masters of painting have found their noblest subjects in the Bible; and the great masters of music have there discovered subjects suited to their loftiest strains. Here the artist, whether he be one who appeals to the eye or ear, has found themes more sublime than any in any other book, and he has accounted them worthy of the highest efforts of his pencil and of the sublimest conception of his muse.

SO STIMULATED AND SATISFIED

The Bible is adapted to man as a reasonable being. It exhorts us to discern things that differ; to prove all things; to be men in understanding; and tells us that it speaks to us as wise men, and that we are to judge what it says. It has no dread of criticism. It challenges inquiry. It fears no test. It shrinks back from no ordeal. It employs argument, logic, comparison, inductive inference. It invites man to make use of the highest exercise of his reasoning powers. In the statements of this Book there is much to test his faculties of reasoning and research, his ability for argument and comparison; and it is a fact that the very noblest minds have found congenial work in expounding its meaning and elucidating its truth.

The Bible is adapted to man in his consciousness of guilt, and his craving after some remedy to soothe the stings of conscience. Man, as a moral creature, cannot stifle his sense of sin. He knows himself to be a sinner, and there is a conviction in his heart that the punishment of sin is righteous. There are, indeed, some who, to use the graphic words of the Apostle, are "past feeling." There are those who have sinned so long and persistently, who have resisted light, struggled against conviction, that their conscience is seared as with a hot iron. But these are exceptions to the rule; and it remains a great truth that man, as a moral creature, cannot wholly stifle his sense of guilt. The heathen, who had no revelation of God's righteous law, felt this, and their heart craved after a remedy. Hence they cried: "Wherewith shall I come before the Lord, and bow myself before the high God? Shall I come before Him with burnt-offerings, with calves of a year old? Will He be pleased with thousands of rams, or with ten thousands of rivers of oil? Shall I give my firstborn for my transgression, the fruit of my body for the sin of my soul?" This was and hence the altars that were raised, and the victims that were slain. The cry arose from a blind and unconscious feeling that sin must be atoned for, and an offended God must be appeased. The Bible alone can meet our fears, pacify conscience, and silence its still, small, but very powerful voice, because it solves the question, "How can man be just with God?" It reveals to us the Son of God leaving the bosom of the Father, and coming forth in our nature to fulfil the requirements of a broken law, to satisfy its penalties, and by his obedience unto death, even the death of the cross, to reconcile us unto God. Let us receive, on the authority of its undoubted testimony, the great facts of the incarnation, the obedience, the sufferings, the death, the resurrection of Christ; and the great work of Atonement becomes a matter of reasonable belief. The law of God is honoured, the Lawgiver and Judge can consistently act as the Father and the Friend.

But the Bible, while it deals mercifully deals terribly and justly with sin, not glossing over the evil of it. Other teachers deal gently with sin, because they have no real remedy for its wounds. They can heal but slightly, and therefore they are careful to wound but slightly. But the Bible probes the sore to the quick, because it possesses an adequate remedy. It does not fear to magnify the holiness of God, and to paint in the darkest colours the depravity of man, because it reveals a Mediator who has reconciled us unto God, a Daysman who can lay his hand on both, and a Holy Spirit who can sound the heart.

These and other similar truths are taught us, not as theories or speculations, not as matters for controversy, but as tremendous verities, the issues of which are life or death everlasting.

Again, the Bible meets man's necessities in his aspirations and hopes. Man feels that his moral and social condition is not what it ought to be. His life is vanity. He is ever promising happiness; but, like the child who would fain grasp the rainbow, or lay hold on the moon, he is doomed to disappointment; he never finds the object of his search. His desire is for progress; and he is always looking forward to a better time coming, when ignorance shall give place to knowledge, and poverty disappear, unrighteousness be a thing of the past, and disease be eradicated from the frame. And how is all this to be brought about? How is this reign of righteousness to be introduced? Through better government, we are told; through more equal laws; through sanitary reforms; by the spread of education; or through an equal distribution of property among all. Social reforms that banish poverty, and wrong, and oppression; sanitary reforms that will put an end to sickness—these are the aspirations of men; but these, despite the progress of science and the advance of civilisation, are perpetually baffled and disappointed. There remains which no reforms can remove. It is not poverty, or disease, or over-population, or imperfect legislation, that is always baffling man's hopes of a perfect world. These are but symptoms, and for symptoms only do human philanthropists and politicians and philosophers prescribe. The real disease is sin. For this neither philosopher nor politician can prescribe. This lies at the root of all moral and social disorders. All attempts to make the world happy without making it holy are fruitless and abortive. So long as man labours to ameliorate the world, without any reference to God and his revealed will, he is making bricks without straw; he is doomed to disappointment. The Bible alone explains the groaning and the travail of creation, the reason of a world out of course, telling us how the creature became subject to vanity, and pointing us onward to "that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God, and our Saviour Jesus Christ."

A BARRIER AGAINST HUMAN HOPES

Surely the Bible is adapted to man as a being a part of whose nature is hope, and opening to his gaze "bright scenes surpassing fable," the very prospect of which refreshes his soul with foretastes of the glory to be revealed. I would ask only

ONE QUESTION OF THE SCEPTIC.

Take this Book away from us, and what will you give us instead? Can you give us anything better? Let us have this new Bible. You are bound if you rob us of the old to give us a better. Remember that you who deny its inspiration, question its facts, throw contempt on its doctrines, owe everything you are and have to it. In it you have nobler morals, a purer creed, a clearer light, a higher life, and loftier faith, than was ever known in lands, however civilised or cultured, where the Word of God was unknown. You owe to it your spiritual and secular, your mental, and religious, and political freedom. If you forget this debt of gratitude; if you pour scorn on the Book that has done all this for you, then I cry shame upon you. You are like an unnatural son who raises his hand to strike the mother's bosom from which his nourishment was drawn.

We may fearlessly accept the Bible as the record of imperishable truth. It challenges examination from philosophy, from science, from historical criticism. Every assault from the enemies of Christianity has but served to strengthen the bulwarks of belief; and we may calmly abide the issue with a confidence "strong as faith, and patient as time."

TARSUS IN CILICIA.—Rev. Krikor Behesnilian, of the Tarsus Bible Teaching Mission, in a recent letter, says:—"Besides assisting the churches at Marash, I have been holding meetings in connection with the Christian Associations. I have made the members of the Y.M.C.A. acquainted with the prosperous work carried on in England, and have addressed them on Bible study. The work of the Y.W.C.A. has been wonderfully blessed through the instrumentality of the young married ladies who are at Marash Girls' College. It has about a hundred members, who come together once a fortnight and study the Scriptures, or discuss important subjects. On Sabbath days they have prayer-meetings, which are well attended." A day-school is held under the auspices of the Association, which meets in hired premises that are no longer adequate to the needs of the work.

Apocalyptic Scenes.

By Sir S. Arthur Blackwood, K.C.B.

XXIX.

THE SECOND SIGN.

Before proceeding to trace in history the fulfilment of the prophecy as given to the Apostle by means of the imagery of the Second Sign, it is necessary to examine the different forms under which the great red dragon appears, and the divine explanation of the symbol which is vouchsafed.

We have seen that, in the first place, the fearful portent witnessed by the Seer, represented none other than that old Serpent, called the Devil or Satan (ch. xii. 9). And we gathered from the Scriptures that he is exhibited as working in a sphere, described as geographical, political, and ecclesiastical. The wild beast, to which the devil gives "his power, and his throne, and great authority," is the symbol of the fourth great world-empire of Dan. vii.—the Roman; that power controls the course of this world (of course within the limits permitted by the Almighty), and the main scene of its operation is the professing Church of God.

The variations in the appearances of the wild beast reveal phases of this Satanic working, differing according to the periods which the vision was intended to prefigure, and great light is thereby thrown upon the meaning of the sign, which may perhaps be said to be the most important (as it certainly occupies the most space) in the Apocalypse.

One of the principal differences is that in ch. xii. 3, the seven heads of the dragon are exhibited as crowned, while in ch. xiii. 1, the crowns are not upon the heads, but upon the ten horns of the beast.

Now, we are told in ch. xvii. 10 that the seven heads had a twofold meaning. They signified, first, seven mountains, or hills; and secondly, seven kings. It is the latter signification with which we have to do, for it is kings, not mountains, that wear crowns; and of these kings it was said that five had passed away before the time of the vision, the sixth was then existing, and the seventh had not yet arisen. We are also told (v. 12) that the ten horns signified ten kings or kingdoms (for we learn from Dan. ii., vii., and viii., that "kings" and "kingdoms" are synonymous expressions), which at the time of the vision had not come into existence.

The meaning of the difference in the symbol is therefore clear; namely, that at the date of the Apocalypse, power (represented by the crowns) resided in the heads, or rather in the head, then existing, whereas at a subsequent period it would be vested in the ten horns.

In order to discover the actual signification of the seven kings, symbolised by the seven crowned heads, we have only to ask which was the supreme power, or form of administration, existing in the Roman Empire in St. John's day. It was the Emperorship. Domitian reigned. Concerning the five preceding forms of government we are in as little doubt. The greatest and most trustworthy of Roman historians, Livy and Tacitus, specify them as follows:—Kings, Consuls, Dictators, Decemvirs, and Military Tribunes, to whom the Cæsars or Emperors succeeded.

But the Apostle says, "I saw one of his heads as it were wounded to death, and his deadly wound was healed." And it is not merely one of the heads of the beast, but the beast itself that was wounded. For it is stated in v. 12 that it is "the beast, whose deadly wound was healed"; and again in v. 14, "The beast, which had the wound by a sword, and did live." This is a most important statement, declaring, as it does, the identity of the ruling head of the beast with the beast itself, and, since the beast symbolises the fourth empire, thereby entirely precluding the idea that the seven-eighth head represents an individual man. It is this wounding to death with a sword that enables us to understand the force of the explanation of the symbol given in ch. xvii., where it is twice said in v. 8 that "the beast was, and is not." The meaning evidently is that at a certain period of its history it did not appear in its bestial character.

This brings us to the question, What was the seventh head? What was the wounding of that head to death by a sword? and what was the eighth head which goeth into perdition? (It should be noticed that this fate of the eighth head is predicated of the beast itself. Whereby another proof of the identity of the two is furnished, cf. ch. xiii. 3 with ch. xvii. 8, 11.)

What form of government succeeded the Emperorship of the Apostle's day, which was "not yet come" at the date of the vision, and when it came, was to "continue a short space" (ch. xvii. 10)? This is answered partly by a remarkable feature in the symbol itself, partly by the record of history. That feature is the change in the badge of imperial power from the stephanos, or chaplet, worn by the Emperors up to a certain period, and exhibited in the imagery of the first seal (ch. vi. 2) to the diadema, or jewelled crown, the ensign of Oriental despotism, or absolute Asiatic sovereignty, seen in ch. xii. 2. And, on turning to history, we find that at the time prefigured in the vision by the change just mentioned, a new form of government was introduced as distinct from the Emperorship of the Apostle's day as any of the other six kinds of administration had been from each other. Most strikingly does Gibbon, the author of the "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire," whom we have already so often adduced as the unconscious and involuntary expositor of the Apocalypse, describe the transition. For in the index of contents relating to the era immediately preceding that of the establishment of Christianity in the Empire, he refers to it thus: "Diocletian assumes the diadem, and introduces the Persian ceremonial. New form of administration." In the work itself he writes that "Diocletian may be considered as the founder of a new empire"; and he proceeds to describe the nature of the change, as affecting the official dignity of the prince governing, and the constitution and administration of the empire governed. This transition took place about A.D. 303, the date of Diocletian's triumph, "soon after which," says Gibbon, "the Emperors ceased to vanquish, and Rome ceased to be the capital of the Empire."

Of this seventh headship of the beast it was explained by the interpreting angel that "when He cometh He must continue a short space" (ch. xvii. 10). And it was evidently this seventh head that was to be wounded to death by a sword, the plain meaning being that this form of government was to be brought to an end by military force. And so it came to pass. In ten years from Diocletian's triumph, namely in 313 A.D.—"a short space" indeed—the last Pagan head of the Roman Empire was wounded and struck down by the sword of the Christian conqueror, Constantine, in the four great battles against Maxentius, Maximin, and Licinius, an extinction completed within the century, when, as Gibbon writes, "The last edict of Theodosius inflicted a deadly wound on the superstition of the Pagans." Then it was that the beast in its draconic form ceased to be the apt representation of the power that was opposing Christianity. The time had arrived when, in the words of the prophecy, it could be said, "the beast is not." The seven Pagan heads had all passed away.

It is held by some, and there is much to be said in favour of the view, that the deadly wound by the sword should be interpreted as describing the destruction of the Imperial power of Rome by the Gothic invasions. There is, of course, room for some difference of opinion as to the exact signification of one or other of the mysterious symbols of this most mysterious book. The fact remains indisputably recorded in history that the Roman Empire, that wonderful embodiment of irresistible earthly power, "dreadful and terrible and strong exceedingly," fell, and fell irretrievably.

But another head, the eighth, was to arise. And this is the one which is also called the "beast," whose character and acting are described in ch. xiii., and of which it is predicated that "he goeth into perdition" (ch. xvii. 8-11) even into the "lake of fire" (ch. xix. 20 and xx. 10). There was to be a revival of the power of Rome. The deadly wound was to be healed.

And how does the historian record this revival? "Like Thebes, or Babylon, or Carthage," writes Gibbon, "the name of Rome must have been erased from the earth, if the city had not been animated by a vital principle, which again restored her to honour and dominion." And then he mentions (I quote from Elliott's condensed extract), as this vital principle, the tradition that two Jewish teachers, a tentmaker and a fisherman, had formerly been executed at Rome in the circus of Nero; that after five hundred years their genuine or fictitious relics were adored as the Palladium of Christian Rome, and their holy shrines, guarded by miracles and invisible terrors, resorted to by pilgrims from the East and West; that about this time the Bishopric of Rome was filled by one of living energy, the first and greatest of the Gregorys, well fitted to make use of the miraculous sanctity and superstition of the spot; that his temporary exercise of the sovereignty of Rome, and extension of his episcopal influence and authority into Greece, Gaul, and Spain, as well as Italy, might countenance the lofty preteneions of succeeding popes; in short, that thus the bishops of Rome began to be a new head of empire to it, and in the rise of papal superstition to supremacy that its deadly wound was healed.

Pontifical writers of the middle ages corroborate this view. Augustin Steuchus writes: "The Empire having been overthrown, unless God had raised up the Pontificate, Rome, resuscitated and restored by none, would have become uninhabitable, and a most foul habitation of cattle. But in the Pontificate it received its second birth; its empire in magnitude not indeed equal to the old empire, but its form not very dissimilar, because all nations from east and from west, venerate the Pope, not otherwise than they before obeyed the Emperor." And Blondus says with equal truth: "The princes of the world now adore and worship as perpetual dictator the successor, not of Cæsar, but of the fisherman Peter, that is the Supreme Pontiff, the substitute of the afore-mentioned Emperor."

Thus, by historians both religious and profane, is the fact attested—a fact which stands out with greater clearness than almost any occurrence in the affairs of men, inasmuch as its results have affected the whole of Christendom for a long series of centuries—that the fourth world-empire of Daniel, prefigured in the Revelation by the same symbol of a wild beast with seven heads and ten horns, was wounded to death by the sword, that its deadly wound was healed in a manner the most improbable, and that in the place of its last pagan head, or form of government, there arose an eighth, which, for the predicted period of forty and two months (or twelve hundred and sixty years) has exercised "power over all kindreds, and tongues, and nations," and has been worshipped by all that dwelt upon the earth.

The universal sway of the Papacy over the nations of Christendom, and the adoration accorded to the so-called Vicar of Christ—or Antichrist—its blasphemies, tyrannies, and persecutions, are facts of which all men are cognisant. Its history, as prefigured in the thirteenth chapter, will be the subject of succeeding papers.

JEWS MOVING CHRIST-WARD.

Dr. James Wells, convener of the Jewish Missions Committee, writes in The Free Church of Scotland Monthly:—"Mr. Edward, of Breslau, has been very much encouraged by a visit from a Jewish patriarch who resides in a large town in Poland. By the study of his Bible in private, he has been moving Christward during the last twenty years, and has completely broken with Judaism. He is now the leader of a like-minded band of about twenty, most of whom are his own relatives. For some time they have been receiving instruction from one who is well known to Mr. Edward. The whole company wish now to go to Breslau that they may be received into the Christian Church by baptism. They are all supporting themselves by their own industry, but, as they are poor, Mr. Edward hopes that some friends of Israel will supply a few pounds to pay their travelling expenses to and from their home. He regards them as the first-fruits of a movement which, he is persuaded, is influencing whole communities of Jews on the Continent, and which should kindle a hopeful and prayerful interest among all Christians.

"Mr. Christie, of Safed, writes about the young Jew whose declared preference for Christianity caused such a commotion among the Jews in Galilee. He has not yielded to the storm that burst upon him. He is now a successful student at the Protestant College of Beyrout. His family will not pay a farthing of his fees at a Protestant school, though he provides his food. A friend in Beyrout paid his fees last year, and Mr. Christie hopes that some generous friend in Scotland may supply £5 for his fees this year."

OUR SUNDAYS.—On Thursday evening Mr. Thomas Wheatley delivered a lecture, "Shall we give up our Sundays?" at St. Winifred's Hall, Lower-road, Rotherhithe, in connection with the Southwark and Camberwell Anti-Sunday Travelling Society. The lecture was illustrated with dissolving views.

THE C.M.S. "FAREWELL."

It is seldom indeed that farewell is said to over a hundred missionaries on one occasion; yet such was the case on Tuesday week, when at the C.M.S. valedictory meeting in Exeter Hall no less than 105 missionaries were commended to God on the eve of leaving for the foreign field. Of these fifty-eight were fresh labourers, going out for the first time. Such meetings may be regarded as a testimony to the personal interest felt in those who are going abroad. But they are both cause and effect. They give to Christian people at home an interest in those who are doing their work abroad which they could not have had they never seen, on the one hand, white-haired veterans, and, on the other, the fresh young faces of those going out for the first time. Representative men are put forward, and those who were present at the recent meeting are not likely to forget the fervid appeals made. Medical missionaries always command attention, and, as a rule, the young medical men who give themselves up to the mission field are profoundly in earnest. There is another side of the subject which deserves to be considered. These farewell meetings are a most efficient means for keeping the duty of the Church to the heathen before men's minds. Probably many of those who offer themselves for mission work received their first impulse toward it at some such gatherings.

In the evening, the great hall was densely-crowded, and indeed an overflow meeting had to be held in the Lower Hall, which also was quickly crowded out.

Sir John Kennaway, M.P., who presided, said: We are gathered together to bid farewell to our brethren and sisters who are going forth to the foreign field. We are glad of the opportunity of meeting them face to face. They have made their choice, they have counted the cost, they have faced the difficulties, they have obeyed the missionary call, and we come here this evening to do what we can to encourage them and help them forward with our sympathy and prayers.

Speaking to those going out for the first time in fresh ardour, and full of this great work, he said:—May your first love burn bright in its flame, and may you be helped forward by God who sends you. Others are going out for the second time, showing by their return to the mission-field that they have realised the difficulties that beset them in their work; to them also we say God-speed. To those who stay at home the work is different, and yet the same; it is different, in that we remain here while others went abroad; it is the same, because on both rests a greater responsibility. Turning to the list of those going out, he found that India has first place. He rejoiced that thirty-seven were going out there. Indeed, our responsibility was greatest there. It has been for one hundred years under British dominion, and yet out of 289 millions only two and a-half millions have embraced the faith of Christ. China has 400 millions, and we are sending ten men. Japan has forty millions, and twelve are going out to work in that field. The sphere, however, which is being watched with the greatest interest at the present time is Africa, where we are sending twenty-seven, with five who have previously sailed. When we think of the remarkable growth of the native Church in Africa, we ought to be filled with thankfulness.

Rev. F. E. Wigram then read the roll-call of the missionaries, and as each name was announced the missionary stood up. Of these going out ten are Islington students. Thirty ladies are going out for the first time. Three of the men are graduates from Cambridge, but not yet ordained. Eight clergymen are from the home ministry, five being from Cambridge, two from Oxford, and one from Dublin. Forty-seven are returning, and fifty-eight are going out for the first time, making a total of 105.

Short addresses followed by some missionaries. They were limited to four minutes, but most of them took longer. The first was Rev. H. Tugwell, secretary of the Yoruba Mission, who spoke for West Africa. He appealed most earnestly for more helpers. Rev. H. K. Binns represented Eastern Equatorial Africa. Dr. F. J. Harpur pleaded for Egypt. Rev. G. Lichfield told of work in North India and Bengal. Rev. Ruttonji Nowroji spoke for Western India, and told the story of his conversion, and how he was first led to mission work. Rev. F. W. N. Alexander, of the South India Mission, was announced as the "veteran" missionary, having served the C.M.S. for thirty-two years. As he looked around he said he could not recognise a single face present at his first "dismissal." Rev. H. D. Buswell, another old missionary, appealed for the Ceylon Mission. Rev. J. B. Brandram, speaking for Japan, pointed to two words upon the wall of the hall, "Way out." We should all, he said, presently want to find the way out. The Japanese, he added, in saying good-bye, came half-way with them. That was what he wanted those present to do. If they could not come to Japan with him, "come part of the way."

Bishop Oluwole asked prayer for the Mission, for Bishop Hill and Bishop Phillips and himself, that God might guide them, and also for the missionaries who were going out with them. He appealed very earnestly on behalf of Fourah Bay College, and mentioned that Rev. W. J. Humphrey had been in this country for twelve months seeking for a Vice-Principal for that College, and up to that time he had not been able to find one willing. Prayer having been offered by Bishop Phillips, other missionaries spoke. Rev. W. H. Dixon, from Oxford, appealed to Oxford men to come forward and offer themselves for the mission-field. Rev. Cecil E. Barton, son of Rev. John Barton, of Cambridge, thought he heard some saying it was strange that a son of a missionary should offer himself for service; but he should think it strange if he did not offer himself. Rev. L. H. Starr represented the University of Dublin. Dr. J. O. Summerhayes, representing the medical profession, said he should be writing home in a year or two, he had no doubt, to say that the work was too much for him, and asking the Committee to send someone out to help him; he hoped his appeal would be answered. Rev. J. E. Hampshire, of the C.M.S. College, Islington, paid a tribute to the Principal and his staff for the training he had received there. Mr. E. G. Clowes also spoke of the merits of the College, and Rev. R. H. Consterdine, who was the last missionary speaker, spoke as a clergyman going out to the mission field.

Major-General Brownlow, R.E., concluded with a stirring address to the missionaries, and the proceedings were closed with prayer.

GREAT ASSEMBLY HALL.

"They seem a happy lot," was the remark of a working man, who had evidently strolled into Mr. Charrington's Great Assembly Hall for the first time. There is certainly nothing of a sensational character to draw the people; the simple plain evangelistic service is the only attraction. Mr. W. R. Lane has just concluded another four weeks' mission. On the Lord's Day of the series he spoke to the thousands of up-turned faces with great earnestness, saying, "As years roll by, and I am privileged to come among you, I feel the responsibility more and more. Eternity will soon dawn upon us—who knows that I shall ever return to you? Let us to-night pause and think. My theme is an intensely solemn and awful one—'The Great White Throne.' There is a spot where God can meet us now, where He can meet and pardon. The Great White Throne will be set for an entirely different purpose. This is the period of God's long-suffering, but men heed it not. They see not the impending judgment."

On his last night the area of the hall was filled with over 1000 persons, numbers standing. Mr. Lane gave the deeply interesting story of his conversion to God, and pleaded with the backslider and the sinner, and especially to those who had recently been brought to Christ to join themselves to some body of Christians. "It is distinctly laid down in his word," said Mr. Lane, "that we not only join ourselves to the Lord, but to his people. It is not through the Church you get to heaven; you can get there without joining the Church, but it is a sacred command, 'not forgetting the assembling of yourselves together,' etc. Now, if you have got stirred up in your soul, and you are not in fellowship with God's people, let me urge you to join some church. Do not go drifting about. You want a home; you cannot do without it for your temporal life, neither can you do without one for your spiritual life." At the close he had some difficulty in shaking hands with the numerous company that came forward to bid him good-bye and wish him "God-speed" in his next mission.

Mr. Scroggie, the Scottish evangelist, who has just returned from Chicago, occupies the platform this month. K.

WESLEYAN MISSION IN MYSORE.

The Wesleyan Mission in the Mysore Province of India has many excellent agencies, evangelistic and educational. The fifty-fourth report says:—

"Our chief attention has been given to the more public proclamation of the one great message. In the city street, in the remote village, to the crowded audience or to the solitary wayfarer, in the early morning and in the calm of evening, we and our helpers have gone about teaching and preaching—sometimes as heralds sounding forth the great facts of the new kingdom, sometimes as ambassadors reasoning with rebels and persuading men to be reconciled to God. The Word has been confirmed with signs following—one of the signs being the public baptism of thirty-nine adults and their families.

"Such a story as the following might well cause some Indian Ambrose to pour out from his full soul a new Te Deum:—'Two families have been received by baptism into the Church of Christ. Of these one is that of a Brahmin. There is nothing remarkable to record of this man, but it gives us joy to say that ever since their baptism both he and his wife have never, either by word or conduct, caused us a moment's sorrow, or given us cause to regret that we had received them into the church. As knowledge and light increase, we believe that they will be an undoubted source of strength to us. The case of the other family is somewhat more remarkable. The head of it, a Woddar (stone-cutter), had been an inquirer for some time before his baptism. He one day had a dream in which a being of exceeding brightness and glory appeared to him and his companions, offering them a small loaf of bread, which, he said would appease the hunger of all. In surprise they took it. They had never tasted bread of such sweetness before, and found that the tiny loaf was enough for all. He told this dream to the evangelist, who said that there could be no doubt that the dream spoke of Christ and his grace. Whereupon Timma Boyi resolved to follow the Christ. He was a great drinker at the time, but determined to give it up, and actually did so. His people, who are a proverbially a drunken lot, tempted him again and again, until at last he said he would drink once more, but he prayed to Christ that he might become so ill that they would be compelled to leave him alone. He then drank, and for three days lay at the point of death. On his recovery, feeling that he could no longer bear with their drunkenness and idolatry, he left his village, and erected a shed in a field, where I found him when I went to make arrangements for his baptism. His little shed was all ready for my reception. No one knew that I was coming to the neighbourhood, but he said Christ Himself had told him that I should be there that evening. That night he and his family came into Tumkur for baptism. A more simple, earnest, trustful soul it has never been our lot to receive into the church. It is early yet to say much about him, but we have every reason to believe that he will continue to be a most devoted and earnest Christian."

The general superintendent of the Mission is Rev. J. Hudson, B.A., Bangalore.

Scripture Readers' Society for Ireland.

On Monday morning, last week, at the residence of Capt. Kearney White, Dublin, there was an interesting breakfast party of Scripture readers and visitors. Amongst those present were Mr. A. J. Arnold, Rev. E. N. Thwaites, Rev. J. Dryden Smylie, General Hatt Noble, and the staff of the Dublin Readers. After cheering words by Mr. A. J. Arnold and General Hatt Noble, Rev. J. Dryden Smylie remarked upon the encouraging prospect of Christian work in Dublin.

Captain Kearney White said he could not shut his eyes to the remarkable manner in which the Lord is opening the way for world-wide evangelisation. As to Ireland, from his own knowledge, and the testimony of the Scripture readers, there was never a greater readiness to receive the Gospel, provided it was presented in a loving spirit, untarnished by controversy. Several of the Scripture readers testified to Divine blessing attending their labours.

FATE OF AN ARMENIAN PASTOR.

A correspondent labouring in an important centre in Asia Minor writes :—"The Christian has shown such an interest in the affairs of this land at this time that I feel encouraged to write a little to you and through you to many Christians in England, in regard to the case of one of our preachers in Angora still in prison. You have alluded to him, though not by name. His name is Marderos Kalosdyan. He has been for a number of years one of our best and most faithful preachers, one on whom we have relied, one who has done a noble work in the village of Gemerek. In a place noted for its bad character, he has built up a congregation. By great effort he has secured help for building a church for his people, and though £100 are required to complete the building the walls are partly up.

"All this was suddenly stopped last winter, when he was arrested in the middle of the night with great violence, and carried off to Sivas, two days' journey distant. A few days later the officers came to his house again, using the worst language to his wife (also a Christian), and carried off all his books and papers, to examine them for the sake of finding incriminating matter. In Sivas he was urged again and again to sign a paper that could be used against Professors Thoumaian and Kayayan, and could probably have gained his liberty by doing so.

"From Sivas he was taken ten days' journey to Angora, chained by the hands and feet and neck. On this journey he passed again through his home town of Gemerek. When his wife heard that he was being taken thus, she locked the five little children in a room and kept them there till the father had gone on, in order that these little ones might never have the memory of seeing their father in chains. At last in Angora the trial was held, and this preacher was condemned to fifteen years' imprisonment in a fortress. The letter which he wrote to us on receiving this sentence would have moved the hardest heart. Until a few days before the close of the trial everything looked hopeful for acquittal. Then there came a sudden change in the behaviour of the court, and it appeared as if orders had come from Constantinople for a conviction, no matter what the evidence was.

"Kalosdyan bequeathed his family to us as a dying man, for who could expect him to survive fifteen years in a Turkish fortress? Especially did he plead that we might remove his children from the evil influences of the village, and educate them in our schools. His one thought was not as to what would become of himself, but of them.

"Such a bequest, who could refuse? We felt morally bound to accept the trust thus committed to us, and we wrote to him, promising that we would care for them. We have waited, hoping that a pardon would be granted, and the family be once more united. The sentence has been commuted to six years, but no pardon is intended, and who can be sure that he will ever be allowed to live out even this sentence? The voice of England and Europe has compelled the pardon of the two Professors. Will it accomplish no more?

"We are now, however, compelled to face the problem of the care of this family. We are not able to carry the burden ourselves. Are there not friends in England who will be glad to aid in this? £25 or £30 a year will enable the family to live."

[We think it wise that the writer of this letter should remain anonymous. He is an estimable agent of a well-known mission, and we shall be glad to forward to him any communications that may be addressed to our care for "Friend of Gemerek Pastor."—Ed.]

Death of Sir S. A. Blackwood.

We regret to announce the death of Sir Stevenson Arthur Blackwood, K.C.B., secretary to the General Post Office, who passed away peacefully on Monday night at Parkeston, Harwich, whither he was brought recently in a prostrate condition from Ems. Sir Arthur had for some time been in a weak state of health; but almost until the end his recovery was confidently expected. His expositions of the Apocalypse now appearing in our columns have, we believe, given him a warm place in the hearts of many new friends. These, with hosts of others, will mourn his decease.

Sir Arthur was a son of Mr. Arthur Johnstone Blackwood, and numbered Sir Francis Blackwood and the Marquis of Dufferin among his near relatives. Born in 1832, at the age of 26 he married Harriet Sydney Dobbs, the daughter of Mr. Conway Richard Dobbs, of Castle Dobbs, Antrim, and widow of the sixth Duke of Manchester. During the Crimean War he served as Deputy Assistant Commissary-General of the Guards, and in 1874 he was appointed financial secretary to the Post Office, which post he held until 1880, when he was made secretary.

(From a Photograph by Messrs. Elliott & Fry, 55, Baker-street, London, W.)

The influence of Sir Arthur at St. Martin's-le-Grand, and, indeed, throughout the Postal Service, can scarcely be over-estimated. Religious work among the employés under his charge was with him a matter of supreme interest and constant exertion. He also helped many missions of a general character, and was the treasurer of the East London Institute for Home and Foreign Missions, directed by Dr. Grattan Guinness. Of Mildmay and its institutions Sir Arthur was a veritable foster parent. He will be greatly missed in the sphere of Protestant witness, and in many departments of evangelistic endeavour. Great and small philanthropic institutions suffer from his death, and a large circle of private friends and correspondents will mourn his removal, because he was to them a true man of God, mighty in the Scriptures, and a Christian of large experience and sound judgment.

PROGRESS IN BELLARY.

There are very cheering passages in the report of the London Mission, Bellary, for 1892. The year began with encouraging signs, more persons having been baptized in 1891 than in any previous year; in 1892, however, a still larger number of converts were received into membership. The report says :—

"In years gone by when one man after another came forward to profess his faith, the wife, with rare exceptions, refused to join her husband; one most satisfactory feature of the recent ingatherings has been that whole families have come together; wives have joined their husbands and shown as much earnestness as the men. . . .

"For many years adult baptisms in the midst of our town congregation were few, not numbering more than five or six in a year. The number of baptisms in the Mission during 1892 was forty adults and thirty-four children. They belonged to various castes of Hindus. With one or two exceptions, all the men were able to read and think for themselves; some were exceptionally well acquainted with Hindu books, and able to compare Hinduism and Christianity in an unusually intelligent manner. It has been no little satisfaction to us to see them with Bible and hymn book reading and studying for themselves, and telling us their own impressions of what they read. Some young women who were unable to read, soon learned, and in a short time had committed to memory several Christian lyrics and passages from the New Testament.

"This is the beginning of what promises to be a much more extensive movement towards Christianity in villages where we have long been hoping to see results of work done. We have had repeated requests from men who are not yet Christians, but who have been influenced by the example and conversation of their friends, that we would send three of our recent adherents to the villages round about to preach; and the remark has been made, 'They will draw many people; we cannot stand against them.' Groups of men numbering from six to ten have come to Bellary every now and then from near villages to talk about these things; we have gone with them, talked to them in their own homes and fields, and found them in all but name 'our own people.' We have never yet known an instance of a caste-man or woman becoming a Christian who had not to endure persecution. We hoped when so large a number came from the same neighbourhood, there would be less likelihood of opposition; for a time there was but little; after a while persecution commenced and is still going on, but without, so far as we can see, shaking the faith or affecting the constancy of any. Our people certainly are soon taught that it is with much tribulation they must enter into the kingdom of God."

Communications regarding the work may be addressed to Rev. E. Lewis, L.M.S., Bellary.

THE GOSPEL GONE TO THE NORTH POLE.—In a letter published in The Quarterly Record of the Trinitarian Bible Society, Mr. William Hall, referring to the distribution of Norwegian Gospels in Scandinavia, says :—"Upon reaching Christiania we paid a visit to the Fram, the vessel built for Dr. Nansen's expedition to the North Pole. We had just sufficient Gospels left to give one to each of the officers and crew. The chief officer most kindly showed us over this most curiously-built vessel. There were stores enough on board to last for five years. Upon giving the Word of God to the men we told them not to look to the strength of the vessel, but to Him who alone could preserve them during their long and dangerous voyage. The vessel left the next day, June 24."

DOROTHY'S KEY.

"I want that book. Give me that book, Jack," exclaimed Dorothy.

"Well, so do I want it, too," responded her brother. "You've got to wait till I've finished with it."

Dorothy's face wrinkled up as if she was about to cry, but just then she saw her aunt coming down stairs in her out-door costume, and a new thought diverted her mind.

"Oh, I'm going down the street, too, Aunt Gracie. You've got to take me, too, so you have. Now you just wait till I get ready."

"No, I can't," answered Aunt Grace, opening the street door and passing out.

Dorothy threw herself down on the stairs in a perfect passion of tears.

"Oh, dear, everybody is ugly and cross to me," she fretted. "They never will do as I want them to, and I think it's mean."

Nobody noticed her tears, so after a little while she dried her eyes and went down into the kitchen to see what she could find to amuse her there.

Cook was making a pie for dessert, and rolling out the crust in delicate layers.

"Oh, I want to make me a little pie," exclaimed Dorothy. "Bridget, give me a little piece of dough to roll out with my little rolling-pin."

"I can't just now," replied Bridget. "The oven's hot and I must make haste. Wait till I'm done and I'll save ye a bit."

"No, I won't wait. I've got to have it right away this minute," fretted Dorothy. "Give it to me now; Bridget, I want it."

"Well, you shan't have it at all if you can't have a little patience," answered Bridget, and as Dorothy began to snatch at the dough in an effort to break off a piece for herself, cook picked her up in her strong hands and carried her out into the hall, where she put her down, returning into the kitchen quickly and locking the door behind her.

"Let me in, let me in," screamed Dorothy, pounding at the door, but Bridget began to sing, and did not pay attention to the little girl.

"Dorothy! Come up-stairs!" called her mother. "I have something nice to tell you."

Dorothy ran eagerly upstairs to hear what her mother had to tell her, and when she heard what it was, she was so glad that all the frowns on her face vanished as suddenly as if a fairy flat-iron had been smoothed over it, and she began to clap her hands and jump up and down in delight,

Dorothy was an only daughter, and she had always longed for a little sister, so she was very happy when she heard that her cousin May was coming the next morning to pass the month with her.

Little May had not been there many days before Dorothy noticed that it was very seldom that her cousin was refused anything; and she wondered why even Bridget was always willing to stop, no matter how busy she might be, to give May anything she asked for.

"May, what makes people so good to you?" she asked abruptly one day. "When I want anything, everybody is always too busy to give it to me, yet they will do anything for you."

"I suppose it's because I've got a little key," May answered.

"A little key?" Dorothy asked in surprise.

"Yes," answered May, smiling at her bewildered cousin's face. "Mamma told me a little key to use whenever I want a favour, and it almost always makes people do it for me."

"How funny!" exclaimed Dorothy. "Won't you lend me your little key, May?"

"Always say 'please,' and that is the key to win favours," May answered.

"Is that all it is?" said Dorothy, rather scornfully; but she tried it, nevertheless, and she found that it was just as May had said.

A little girl who says "please" politely when she wants a favour is far more apt to be gratified than a child who cries fretfully, "I want that; give me this."

Won't some of my little readers try May's key?

TERRESTRIAL BEAUTY.

By Rev. W. A. Essery.

God robes the earth with beauty
Through all the circling year;
His hand outfits the seasons
As slowly they appear.

The Winter in pure raiment
Of snowy white is clad;
His crystal morsels sparkle
When sunshine makes them glad.

The Spring by vernal colour
Betrays his living hand;
His pink and pearly blossoms
Shed gladness o'er the land.

The Summer, decked with flowers
Of ruby, sapphire, gold,
He pours on hill and valley
With riches manifold.

He autumn dyes with splendour,
On wheatlands, copse, and wood
Sets flame-tint glory, crowning
The drooping year with good.

Who thus the grass arrayeth,
The moor, the waste unseen,
Himself must drink sweet pleasure
From beauty's varied scene.

If thus He makes so lovely
Our earth, grown old in sin,
Whose days to end are numbered,
What splendours shall begin

When He the new creation
Prepares for man redeemed!
What wealth of fadeless beauty
No human heart has dreamed!

Canadian Child Emigration.

There has been for some time past (says The Daily Chronicle) more or less active opposition in Canada to the emigration of destitute children from the United Kingdom by philanthropic and other institutions. The official returns have proved that the percentage of failures is certainly not in excess of five per cent., but it has been felt that even this small percentage might be reduced; and the Dominion Minister of the Interior has therefore drawn up fresh regulations, which have been submitted through the High Commissioner to those concerned in England.

It is now required that a distinction shall be clearly drawn between workhouse children and children sent out through the agency of philanthropic societies. In the case of child inmates of workhouses, a sworn declaration is required stating that they are taken to Canada under the authority of the Local Government Board for the purpose of settling there, and that they have passed a "satisfactory medical inspection" at the port of departure. In the case of children sent out through philanthropic societies, a sworn declaration must affirm that they have not been inmates of workhouses, and that they have undergone a satisfactory medical inspection. In all cases it is required that the children be destined, in the first place, for a distributing home in Canada, and each child shall pass an inspection by the Canadian Government agent at the port of departure in this country before a certificate is issued ensuring admission at Canadian ports. By these new regulations it is hoped to prevent the introduction into Canada of children not likely to become good citizens.

A FARMER AND HIS CORN.

BY REV. T. DIXON.

On the eastern shore of Virginia there stands to-day one of the few beautiful old homesteads of the past. Its fences are in repair. Its beautiful lawn, shaded by magnificent trees, is in perfect order. It bears still the name given by its founder. Its broad acres remain intact in the hands of the same family to-day that held it in the past century. The neighbours are proud of its name and beauty, and they love to tell the story of its founder. They say he was a man of noted character in his day. In a certain year there was a great famine in the whole country. Corn sold at 3 dols. and 4 dols. a bushel, and was difficult to get at that price. The great barns of this farm groaned beneath the burden of an unusually large crop from the previous year.

What did the owner of these great barns and broad acres do in this crisis of the people? Did he put his men to work, dig vaults, hide his grain, and then stand at the gate with a sad smile and swear by heaven and earth that he didn't have a nubbin? No! He placed his men at the doors of his barns with this instruction: "If a rich man comes to buy my corn with money, do not sell him a grain, no matter what price he may offer. When a poor man comes who has no money, let him have as much as he needs at last year's price, and take promise to pay!"

Merchants offered him fabulous prices for his store that they might speculate in the necessities of their fellows. He would not sell them a peck. He sold to the poor for their promise to pay, and his children's children are not done reaping the golden harvest. As the old inhabitant passes the gate that leads to the great clump of trees that mark this garden spot of humanity, it is no wonder that he tells you the story with moist eyes and adds with evident satisfaction, "It's still the handsomest place in the county." Such places will always be garden spots. Such men have always been and ever will be the salt of the earth.

AMERICAN MARATHI MISSION.

In the report for 1892, we read:—"Several missionary workers have come out, either on return or for the first time, to their fields of labour. The native churches have maintained a vigorous Christian life, steadily tending in the direction of self-support, and the 194 conversions afford a gratifying proof of the unimpaired progress of the cause. New churches have been organised, new schools have been established, our theological seminary has added a new class for advanced English study, and a class has been formed in Ahmednagar for the special instruction of our Bible-women. But the feature of the year has, perhaps, been the opening of a Mission station at Wai. When we consider the pre-eminence which Wai enjoys among the sacred Hindu centres of Maharashtra, the unprecedented difficulties, discouragements, and delays which presented themselves in our path, and the way in which at one time even Death seemed to be contending against us, we may well say, with devoutly grateful hearts, 'Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but unto thy name give glory, for thy mercy and thy truth's sake.' We trust that this new station may be a centre of Gospel light and influence in that city which is now 'wholly given to idolatry.'

"We are reminded that eighty years have passed since our Mission was commenced in Bombay. It is difficult for us to comprehend the strides that have been made since 1813, in civilisation, in education, and in religious thought. Scarcely a beginning had then been made in vernacular education, and female education was unknown. Moreover, there was not a Christian book or tract in any vernacular of Western India. One of the early missionaries said, 'Everything was to be done. The wilderness was before them, and not a tree in this forest had yet been felled.' A long series of reports from the various Missions of Western India would present a striking contrast with the state of things which existed in 1813. No candid observer could look upon that picture and upon this, without acknowledging that marvellous results have accrued to missionary labour in these eighty years."

Communications regarding the work may be addressed to Rev, S. B. Fairbank, D.D., Byculla, Bombay.

NOTES ON DAILY READINGS.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 8.—PSALM LIX.

1 Sam. xix. 2 will give the key to this psalm. When our enemies are without we will be strong and thankful if we have God within, especially when we have the consciousness of innocence at the heart (3, 4). It is only by faith that our heart can be kept quiet in the midst of danger, and able to sing psalms when surrounded by foes.

The most noticeable thing in the psalm is the twice-repeated refrain (9 and 17). In each the Psalmist speaks of God as "my strength." In the first he says, "I will wait upon Thee"; in the second, "I will sing praises." In each he speaks of God as his "high tower," and the source of mercy to his soul. And it is upon his confidence in that mercy that he builds his assured hope of deliverance. Take to heart, O child of God, the thought that God, with his mercy, will prevent—that is, go in front of you; and this will make you strong against them that lie in wait along the path of daily life (10 R.V., marg.).

It is a striking contrast with which the Psalmist closes (14-16). At night his foes return like a pack of snarling, rapacious dogs, seeking their prey, and making the hours of darkness hideous with their noise, whilst within the Psalmist is singing aloud of God's mercy as it visits him upon the wings of morning light. Whatever be thy distress, thou wilt find a refuge for thyself in God (16).

MONDAY, OCTOBER 9.—PSALM LX.

The approach of danger (1-4).—It was a great crisis in Israel when this lily psalm was composed. The occasion is recorded in 2 Sam. x. Concurrently with the war against Syria, Joal and Abishai were engaged against Edom (2 Chron. xviii. 12-25). And it may be that the Psalmist's fears were inclined to master him, as he dreaded the worst. It is much when we are able to plead as David did, that we may be delivered in order to maintain the banner of God's truth.

The assured promise of Divine help (5-8).—They were beloved for their fathers' sake, and we for Christ's sake. All pleas for salvation and help must speed when presented in his name. When God has given an assurance to our soul we may begin to exult as though the thing promised were already in our grasp. Standing on some vantage point, the Psalmist sees the land outspread before him. It is the Land of Promise, made over by covenant to his people and himself. Shechem and Succoth, lying east and west, include the entire land, and all is his by an inalienable and indestructible right, so that all surrounding peoples, Moab, Edom, Philistia, must be subject. Philistia, indeed, is bidden to shout aloud (8, R.V.) in recognition of his supremacy.

Prayer for further help (9-12).—A great many strong cities arise in every life which we cannot penetrate until God gives us help. The best human help must fail, only to throw God's helpfulness into stronger relief. It is He that treads down our foes, and we have but to pass over their prostrate forms to victory.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 10.—PSALM LXI.

The psalm suits the time of Absalom's rebellion, when David was a fugitive from the tabernacle that he loved. First stanza, Prayer (1-4). He was across the Jordan, and yet it seemed like the end of the earth, but there is no place so remote that the soul cannot cry to God. Overwhelmed ones, if you can do nothing else, cry! Above him, in the waste, there towered a rock too high for him to scale, but when once scaled how secure! And it made him think of God whose nature towered up into the infinite above himself, and offered to him a cleft of sure defence. Thither he asked to be led. Then, looking back on all his past, and remembering how often God had delivered him, he vowed that he would abide in his tabernacle for ever, and trust under his wings.

Second stanza, Confidence (2-8). The heritage of the true Israelite was inalienable. And the promise which God had made to him could not be annulled by the hatred of his foes (2 Sam vii. 12). As joint heirs with Christ of all that God is and has, let us dismiss our fear. God's gift is for ever. He will not withdraw it even for our sins. Before us are the unbroken years of eternal blessedness, during which we shall abide before God for ever.

When we have made vows that God has heard (5), let us daily perform them (8). And we shall perform them best when our hearts are full of praise. And this will be the case with us when we avail ourselves most largely of, and consider most carefully, God's mercy and truth.

WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 11.—PSALM LXII.

This psalm naturally falls into three stanzas. It may be called the "only" psalm. "My soul waiteth only upon God" (1, R.V.).

First stanza (1-4).—Those that wait for God cannot wait in vain, they will find that God is waiting to be gracious, until the moment strikes when He can help them best. Salvation is always coming out from Him. The loving soul piles epithets on God, for no single one is able to tell all the truth. Ringed about by men who bless with their mouth, but curse inwardly, and who, beneath the specious words, are hiding malicious hate, the soul can but stay itself upon God.

Second stanza (5-8).—Talk sometimes with your soul, and cheer it by your words. Assure it that God is all, and that He cannot disappoint. Dare to speak of God, not only as salvation, but as glory. Do not be afraid of telling God over and over again how much He is to you. Grasp his hand tighter, always tighter, as you say my. Rally the failing courage of others, bid them trust in times of darkness as in those of light. Urge them to the outpoured heart. Assure them that God will be their refuge as well as yours.

Third stanza (9-12).—In God's balances men go up (R.V.) when weighed against his truth. Let us not fear them, therefore; they are lighter than a breath. There is as much mercy as power in God. His heart is as large as his hand.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 12.—PSALM LXIII.

We stand in the inner chamber, and hear a saint in converse with God. Draw near, and listen. Alone, hunted, with the fabric of his life tumbling to his feet, this man turns to God, of whom nothing could deprive him. Dare to say it, troubled heart, again and again, "O God, Thou art my God." God sometimes weans us from all beside that we may thirst for Him. Where no water is, we thirst. Memories of bygone days make us long for their repetition, "so as I have seen."

And then he rises higher. Sweet as life is, God's love is sweeter. Rough as the desert food is, the soul banquets on marrow and fatness if it has God. And the night watches, as they pass away beneath the canopy of heaven, do not seem long, because filled with meditation of God. The soul dreams that it is nestling under the wing of the mother, and it secretly sings to itself, for the darkness is the shadow of the wing of God, and now, the heart that loves and bursts cannot endure that any distance should intercept between itself and Him, and therefore it follows hard after Him, sure that if in its eager rush it encounters perils that might hurl it to destruction, it shall be upheld by his right hand.

The jackals that roam the desert waste are emblems of the hatred of the foe, but he shall not prevail.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 13.—PSALM LXIV.

The persecutor (1-6). How ingenious is malice! Its secret council; its rushes of sudden tumult; its bitter words; its secret missiles; its unexpected attacks; its privy snares. It requires more than ordinary care to walk through this world without giving some handle to those who hate us. How few of us could come out as unscathed as Daniel did! Let us remember that even if men do not hate us thus, Satan does. He is always considering the saints, and suggesting, as in the case of Job, selfish reasons that actuate our goodness.

The vindicator (7-10). God comes down into the fight. His arrow is contrasted with theirs. Their curses come back to roost in their own breast, their allies fail them, whilst good men are glad in God's righteous vindication of his own. Trust springs upward in the heart, and links itself with his eternal faithfulness, and those whose heart looks radiantly heavenward (upright) break forth into exulting boast, as Hannah did in that old song, in which she answers the proud vauntings of her adversary.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 14.—PSALM LXV.

1. The silence of the heart often generates the sweetest praise. Prayer and praise pass up together to God (R.V.). 2. It is only a little time, and the love of God shall draw all men to Himself. All creation shall converge to his footstool. 3. Let the thought of your sin be instantly followed by the thought of the cleansing blood. 4. Let us ask God to cause us to approach and to dwell. He whom God chooses is satisfied with God's goodness, but God's goodness dwells in his Holy Place. 5. The ends of the earth and the far-off places of the sea shall be the home of faith. 6. Can He set fast mountains, and can He not keep thy feet? 7. Can He hush waves, and can He not subdue the hate of your adversaries? 8. Do outsiders fear before Him, and can He not make each morning and evening, as they come out from Him, bring thee blessing and cause thee joy? 9. Be content to be a flower of the tree nourished by the brimming water of his river. Trust Him to provide thee corn. 10. Remark the present tenses that attest God's unwearying providence. It is a parable of his perennial culture of thy heart. 11. Keep in his paths, so shalt thou be satisfied, and though thou hast been as the wilderness thou shalt become green with pasture-lands, girded with joy as hills with vineyards. 13. The pure heart detects the music of nature, and breaks out into sympathetic praise.

INTERNATIONAL S. S. LESSONS.

OCTOBER 15.

Justification by Faith.—Rom. v. 1-11.

Golden Text, Ver. 8.

Thus far the Apostle has proved the guilt of all men, Jews and Gentiles alike, and that the way of justification is the same for all. In chapter iv. the example of Abraham is introduced as illustrating this truth. This lesson begins with men as justified, and describes the blessings which follow their justification.

1. All begins with our being "justified by faith" (1). Very many blessings are introduced to us of an unspeakably valuable character, but not one is ours until this first Gospel blessing is possessed. Like links in a chain, the first brings the rest after it. Don't put justification into the future; it is a present possession "being justified." Faith in Christ changes altogether the standing of man before God. While in unbelief he is condemned: but when he believes he is not only acquitted, but accounted and accepted as righteous.

2. Note the number of these blessings. One feature of these verses is the frequent repetition of such words as "also" (2); "not only so" (3, 11); "much more then" (9). We need not fear exhausting either the number or the full value of spiritual blessings. The very first, though ours completely as soon as we believe, yet grows to our apprehension; and each one only introduces us to more.

3. What are these blessings? Mention them in detail. Peace with God (1), not so much a feeling of peace as a changed attitude towards God. Man unforgiven is afraid of God, and, like Adam in the garden, dreads to meet Him. A justified man is reconciled to God; the enmity (10) has ceased. God is no longer an object of dread to him. Access (2). The grace into which we have access is that of nearness to God (Eph. ii. 18). The Holy of Holies, where the grace and glory of God appeared, was closed against all save the High Priest, and He entered only once a year (Lev. xvi.); but we "stand" in this grace. Through Jesus Christ the barrier of sin has been removed (see Psa. xci. 1). Hope (2), the value of which lies in four things—first, its object, "the glory of God"; next, its influence upon us—"we rejoice in hope"; next, its certainty—"maketh not ashamed" (5); and last, its ground—"the love of God shed abroad" (5). The possession of such a hope distinguishes us from what we were before justification. The glory of God to be revealed at the coming of Christ was an object of dread to us. How dare we meet Him? We anticipate it with delight now, for we shall share his glory, and shall be in some way the medium through whom his glory shall be revealed (Jno. xvii. 24; 2 Thess. i. 10). No one can hope for this in whose heart the love of God has not been shed abroad. This is the work of the Holy Ghost; but He is "given to us." Has he wrought this work in us? Joy in tribulations (3-4). "Glory" is the same word as "rejoice" in v. 3. Paul was writing from his own experience (see 2 Cor. xii. 9, 10). See the result of Abraham's trial (Gen. xxii. 12—"Now I know"). The same thought is expressed in Jas. i. 12; 1 Pet. i. 7. And "hope" is strengthened thus. Miss Fanny Crosby, the blind authoress of the hymn, "Safe in the Arms of Jesus," speaking for herself, and for two others afflicted in the same way, said, "Do we regret our lack of sight? No, for when we enter the pearly gate the face of our Lord will be the first on which we shall ever have gazed."

The other blessings are Salvation from wrath (9). To the Apostle the wrath to be outpoured on the ungodly at the appearing of Jesus Christ was awfully real (ii. 8-9). Present keeping (10). This verse contains threefold argument as it is read with three different accents. If He would do so much for enemies, what will He do for friends? If He could reconcile us, change us from enemies into friends, can He not save us now? If the death of his Son availed for the more difficult work, will not the glorious life of his Son avail for our constant keeping? Put the fullest possible meaning into the word "saved," then remember that He lives, triumphant over every difficulty that can meet us. Expect a salvation worthy of Him. Joy in God (11). This seems like the summit of blessing. It is something to joy in what He gives, much more to find our delight in Him. What an unfailing source of joy must He be! "What can we wish for in a heritage that is not found in Him? Would we have large possessions? He is immensity itself. Would we have a term of long continuance? He is eternity."

All this belongs to one who formerly trembled under a sense of condemnation, and who dreaded the thought of meeting with God. What has made the change? The work of Christ for him, and the appropriation of Christ by faith. "He that believeth on Him is not condemned; but he that believeth not is condemned already" (Jno. iii. 18). Which are you?

COUNCIL OF CREEDS AT CHICAGO.

Notwithstanding the novelty of a religious congress, before which representatives of creeds the most opposed to one another should have an opportunity of expounding the theory and practice of their beliefs in the most rosy style, without the possibility of contradiction, few were prepared for the crowded halls which have greeted the majority of the speakers hitherto. Naturally the most interesting feature was the presence of exponents of creeds almost entirely confined to Asia, of which but the most erroneous and confused ideas prevail throughout the remaining continents. Even now, however, little more has been brought before us here than idealistic presentations and unchallenged theories.

So long as the listeners are the same throughout a number of lectures—and the local Press has already drawn attention to the number of familiar faces returning—the harm done cannot be great, even in the absence of the reverse of the pictures drawn, but there is great danger of minds unaccustomed to reason and weigh evidence for themselves, of whatsoever persuasion, becoming upset in their faith by these plausible discourses.

SEVERE REBUKES.

Among the most noteworthy speakers was an eloquent English-speaking Buddhist preacher from Ceylon, H. Dharmapala, editor and secretary of the Maha-Bodhi Society of Calcutta, who preached on Sunday morning in Unity Church in his flowing Indian robes of office—truly a strange and regrettable spectacle in a building dedicated to the Christian faith. But there was awful truth in many of the words he spoke, and we may less regret their utterance if only they serve to arouse us to their force. In ringing tones, after a brief exposition of the Buddhist creed, summed up in the idea that man may of himself, by diligent, assiduous care, achieve a condition of pure life, pure thoughts, and pure contemplation—the speaker approached his peroration.

"I come from far-away India to tell you of the teachings of Christ which you have read, but do not practice. Chicago, your marvellous city, lives neither the life of Christ nor of Buddha. There is too much of the ceremonialism, sensuality, gossip, criticism, in the life of to-day's world. The entire twenty-four hours of the day are given up to frivolity. The teachings of neither Christ nor Buddha are realised."

Then followed a statement which, though it will at once be questioned by readers of The Christian, is well worth pondering as an expression of modern Buddhist opinion, and further, in part as a forcible reminder of our undischarged responsibility towards both India's and China's millions. "The Aryan tendency of Christ will not be realised so long as that race is dominated by Judaic tendencies. In India and Ceylon there is a turning toward the Christ, the Buddhist, the gentle teacher of purity. Eighteen centuries of the Christ teaching have been weighed in the balance and found wanting. Now I will ask you all to lead the life of purity in this life, and you will gain that peace that passeth all human understanding."

A SERMON IN SEASON.

Another earnest address in English, delivered by Protap Chunder Mazoondar, of the Brahmo-somaj faith, had the remarkable sequel of his immense audience rising to its feet and singing "Nearer, my God, to Thee," as he was recalled at its close to receive the hearers' thanks. Yet he had given utterance as fearlessly as the Buddhist to the feeling shared by every thoughtful member of the religions among whom our missions work, when they come to Europe or America, and see how far Western nations are from Christianity. "Your activities are so manifold that you have little time to consider that the sanctification of your own souls is the question of all importance. . . What is religion without morality? . . . Moral attainments do not mean holiness: living and moving in God is the secret of personal holiness."

Could words be more true or better timed than these? Surely the very stones are crying out against the selfish counterfeit of Christianity in which so many of us live to-day. These words were from a speaker who claimed, like so many others, that his religion embodied the best of all religions, and that in its services the best was culled from all of the so-called sacred writings. He has indeed learned much truth somewhere, and the view he presented of his teachings undoubtedly owes great things to Christianity, and leads one to suspect it to be an attempted compromise between a tottering heathendom and conquering Christ. This Indian declaimed against caste, and foretold its abolition, related gleefully the crusade against widow burning, and urged an increase of public sentiment against child marriage, and in favour of other moral reforms. Were these ever heard of before the Christian missionary entered India? Oh, for such a man as this to be India's Paul! Was not Luther such a one, and were not many of the brightest pioneers of Christianity? Should not all Christendom join in prayer that men like this, so near the light, should taste of it fully and bear it forth?

A NEW RELIGION.

No speaker, or rather reader, produced a greater impression upon his immense audience than did Dr. Adolph Brodbeck, of Hanover, who appeared unannounced on the programme to fill up a short morning. He preached "Idealism: the New Religion," the definition of which was chiefly confined to negative statements, summed up in this quotation:—"We do not know where we come from or where we go; we only know that we are here on this planet and that we must take things as they are, and that we must do our best in everything; and in doing this we are happy, as far as happiness reasonably can be expected to be attained by man. We do not expect too much from this life and world, so we are not disappointed at the end. Prayer we admit only as a reverent immersion in the great mystery of this life and world."

It is well indeed to know how hollow beyond description are some of the substitutes which the enemy puts forward for the truth, even when they come to us with all the fascination of the sunny East, or clad in oratory such as this was—sounding brass and tinkling cymbals after all. This from a man who would have us set up impossible ideals, every man his fancy, "the striving for the ideal, the perfection in everything, for the ideal of mankind, especially for each individual, for the ideal of science and art, for the ideal of civilisation, for the ideal of all virtues, for the ideal of the family, community, society, and humanity in all forms."

Is not this what every heathen does as he knows best? What is life but following ideal? What is Christian life but following the Perfect Man? But Dr. Brodbeck had a word for us to ponder, too. It is an open secret that millions of people in our civilised countries have practically given up Christianity, and with it religion. Millions of others cling to the old belief only because there is nothing better there. Again, millions are believers in Christianity or other religions because they have been educated in those lines and do not know better. Does not the incontrovertible truth of this statement impress upon us the necessity of a more extended teaching of our grounds of faith, the reason for the hope that is in us, and that our young people especially should be taught wherewith to meet the assaults of to-day?

If this alone were the outcome of this Congress it would have done much. In the words of Dr. Macpherson, of this city, "It is a general demonstration of spiritual life as against materialism. It discriminates humanity as higher than nature, and soul as above matter. Christianity has nothing to fear from the light. If our faith has not the inherent power to conquer the world, we can't save it, for the power that made it great was not that of men. The danger I apprehend in such a parliament is the lack of candour that there may be in the explanation of necessarily conflicting opinions."

Reviewing the Council now it is past, one feels the sublime force of the position taken by the Archbishop of Canterbury. When invited to be representative of Christianity at the Congress, he replied that the Christian faith was beyond argument, that it was supreme, and was not to be ranked as one among many.

J. E. Budgett Meakin.

Chicago.

LADY HENRY SOMERSET, speaking at a conference held at Bristol on Wednesday, said that there was stern necessity for Christian women facing women's wrongs, and temperance associations could be made training grounds on which they could learn how best to deal with evils with which they would fain cope. They talked of societies for rescuing drunkards, but it was a society for influencing Christians that they were more in need of, for if they made disreputable that which they now made respectable, they would be able to rescue drunkards.

MR. AITKEN IN THE CITY.

During the past week Rev. W. H. M. H. Aitken has continued his City Mission, and so attractive have the addresses to business men proved that these mid-day talks are being carried on this week, although the Mission proper concluded with a praise meeting on Monday evening.

Last week's series on Intemperance, Gambling, Social Purity, and Honest Doubt awakened remarkable interest, and it was delightful to see the church crowded day by day by keen business men fresh from the great houses and offices of the City.

His analysis on Wednesday of the sin of gambling, and exposure of the fallacies of its excuses, showed particular penetration. The sin of gambling was, in its essence, a breach of the Tenth Commandment; the danger of it lay in its contributing to a debased and sordid selfishness; the attraction was that men sought in it a little spice in the deadly-dull draught of their worldly lives. The difference between gambling and Stock Exchange transactions, however indefensible the latter might be, was that the latter professed to be trade affairs, in which there was supposed to be a "quid" for every "quo," and that speculation was a necessary element in commerce. The argument that it was not gambling to play for very small sums, and therefore not for larger sums either, was controverted by an ingenious dilemma. The plea that it was done by mutual consent was shown to excuse gambling no more than duelling.

Dealing with "Honest Doubt," on Thursday, the mission preacher took as his starting point the hesitation shown by Thomas in accepting the truth that Christ had risen from the dead. For his own part he saw no reason to shrink from admitting the honesty of many doubters. Some seem to feel themselves forced to question. On the other hand doubt frequently had its root in cherished sin. It is not always so, but undoubtedly this is often found to be the case. Replying to those who asked, Why should not God, if He be God, have revealed Himself in such a way that it would be impossible to doubt or deny? Mr. Aitken urged that the moral responsibility of man would be destroyed if God had acted so as to compel an automatic belief. For himself he regarded the arguments in favour of the credentials of Christianity as simply unanswerable, but at the same time he was perfectly willing to admit that others, through some subtle force acting in the mind, or some peculiarity of temperament, might be inclined to question and doubt. He asked his young hearers to make sure that doubt was not caused by any moral evil in their own lives; but even if it were, the preacher urged that they should give a fair and impartial consideration to the whole bearings of the case, and this being so, he felt satisfied they would be compelled to the conclusion that God is, and that He has revealed Himself in Christ and in his Word. He would have them look to the personal Saviour rather than to any theory or system. Let them come to Christ, cast themselves upon Him, learn the secret of his might, and soon they would say with Thomas "my Lord and my God."

The subjects during the present week form a curious sequence:—

Monday.—The Aversion of the Soul.
Tuesday.—The Perversion of the Soul.
Wednesday.—The Conversion of the Soul.
Thursday.—The Reversion of the Soul.

The address on Monday dealt with "The Way of Cain," the straightest road to hell, the way in which souls, sinning against God, turn their backs on Him, go out from the presence of God, and learn to hate and dread Him. In graphic and startling terms the speaker portrayed the manner in which the breach seems ever widening until God is forgotten, and it may be said that He is not in all their thoughts.

On Tuesday the perversion of a soul was dealt with as illustrated by the crooked road to hell, the tortuous way of Balaam, who knew God and yet wandered, for the sake of gain, far from Him and at the last perished miserably.

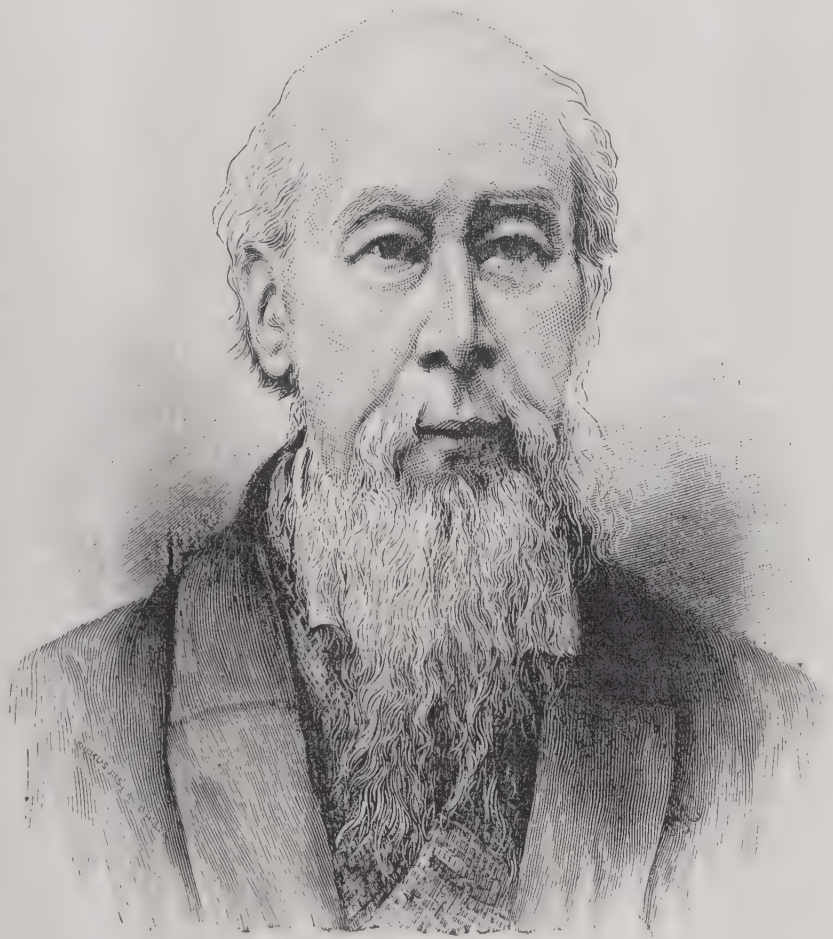
We believe that genuine blessing has rested on the mission just concluded, and that in especial these addresses to business men and City clerks have proved singularly helpful to many.

THE MORE HOME there is in the home, the more readily and completely does it fulfil its offices as a child-church.

REV. MATSUNA OKUNO,

CHRISTIAN WORKER IN JAPAN.

REV. MATSUNA OKUNO was born in the city of Yedo (now called Tokio) in 1822. His father belonged to the military class, and was a retainer of the Shogun, who then ruled in Japan. When he arrived at the age of five, his mother died, and on account of his unyielding spirit, he was much disliked by his stepmother, and left his home to live at one of the Buddhist temples in Uyeno.



While living with the priests he studied Buddhism, and became familiar with its sacred books, but he did not have any faith in their Buddhist doctrines. He also studied Chinese classics, and became master of their teachings. He was very fond of music, and played on the flute with such skill that his services were in frequent demand at the theatre and other places of entertainment. In everything which he undertook he was among the most proficient, and it was his pride and ambition to excel all others in whatever he attempted to do. At the early age of eighteen he passed a successful examination in military science, and was given a special reward by his master.

Such was his fondness for study, and his desire to surpass all others, that at the age of twenty-four he was prostrated on account of excessive study, and his father took all his books from him. But he managed to get hold of them secretly, and would spend hours together in reading them.

On account of his proficiency, and his bold and chivalrous spirit, he was early promoted to a position of much responsibility and importance. This brought him among wicked and dissipated companions, and he soon fell into the evil ways of those around him, and even became a leader in sinful indulgences. In the spring of 1867 he joined the forces of the Shogun against the army of the Western clans. He was in several battles, and did valiant service for his party. But the troops of the Shogun were defeated, and he took refuge on board of a man-of-war ship.

Soon after this the whole squadron was dispersed by a furious storm, and most of the vessels were never seen again. The one on which he had embarked had barely escaped destruction by the waves, when the fugitives suddenly found themselves between two of the Imperial warships. Death seemed then to be inevitable, and they prepared to meet it as brave men. But, to their astonishment, the other vessels suddenly withdrew, and left them unharmed. Seeing no further hope at sea, he fled to Shizuoka, and while there became a messenger of the Shogun, who was then a fugitive at that place.

When the revolution was ended, and the Imperial power established, he was in utter despair. In his nobility of heart, and with true loyalty to his prince, he sent a petition to the victorious leaders, saying: "It was not the will of our master, the Prince, to fight against the army of his Imperial Majesty, but he was persuaded to do so by our advice, and we are the ones who should bear the blame and receive the punishment. Therefore, let us endure the penalty, and let our master go free." But he was not molested; and although allowed his liberty, he was reduced to extreme distress for want of any means of support.

There was one important lesson for him yet to learn, and that was the utter fallacy of heathenism. As a loyal subject of his prince he was constantly occupied with the thought of how he could restore his master to his former wealth and power. To accomplish this end he was ready to sacrifice his life, if need be, and he felt that death in such a cause was even better than to live with his master in poverty and disgrace.

As he was meditating upon this subject, he met with a hermit who was a kind of priest, and in want of money. So the priest persuaded him to make special gifts to secure the assistance of one of the false deities. Then Mr. Okuno wrote a petition for the restoration of his master, which he offered to the idol with the expectation of help. The priest also prayed for some time, and at length said, "It is the command of the god that you must fast for a week." After that was ended he was directed to bathe in ice-cold water every morning for a long time. Sometimes he rose in the middle of the night to take these baths; and when they were ended he sat for hours upon a coarse straw mat, and recited prayers from the sacred books. He was also enjoined to eat no rice, but only potatoes and buckwheat.

But all these services were of no avail, and the condition of his master continued the same as before. Then he complained to the priest, who simply told him that he must try some other way, and if he would visit a great number of temples, and make offerings at each to the god of rice, his petition would yet be granted. So he went as a pilgrim to one thousand temples, and sent proxies to other places, who reported having visited fifteen thousand more on his behalf. Now he thought his prayer would certainly be answered, but the result was the same as before.

In anger and disgust at being thus deceived, he trampled on the sacred image, and, reproaching the priest for his greed and deception, went back to his former habits of dissipation. He now gave up all belief in any God or future life, and lived as one who had no thought of eternity. He had spent all he possessed or could borrow, in his pilgrimages, and with health impaired by fasting and fatigue, he was in utter destitution and misery. But his necessity was God's opportunity. In the spring of 1871, he was introduced to Dr. Hepburn, who was seeking for just such a helper in the preparation of his dictionary. Thus he was brought under Christian influences, and in contact with Christian truth.

By the instruction received from Dr. Hepburn, and the earnest preaching of Rev. Mr. Ballagh, he was at length led to feel that he was a sinner, and in need of the cleansing blood of Christ. Then, at the risk of his life, he made a public profession of his faith, and was baptized in July, 1872, by Rev. Dr. S. R. Brown. In September of the same year he began to assist Dr. Hepburn in the translation of the New Testament. As a superior penman, in preparing the first editions to be printed on blocks, and as a thorough and critical scholar, his services were invaluable. It was for some time impossible to find anyone who would undertake the printing of the "Book of Jesus," as it was then contrary to the law to publish any work of that kind. But Mr. Okuno at length persuaded some one to cut the blocks and print them in secret, and if detected he was ready for either prison or death.

During the absence of Dr. Hepburn in the United States he became my teacher, and well do I remember saying to him one day, "Are you not afraid of being arrested and punished for being a Christian and doing Christian work?" Drawing his finger across his neck in a significant way, he replied, "They may cut off my head, but they cannot destroy my soul." One day he brought with him a long roll of paper and held it up, saying, "I have here the meaning of that hymn that we have been singing so long, and which we all liked so much, but which I have never before understood." It was a literal translation of "Jesus loves me," which had become a general favourite on account of the tune.

As he held it up, the thought struck me. "Why not put it into rhyme and metre, so that the Japanese will understand it when they sing?" I suggested this to him, and as he was pleased with the idea we went to work upon it. I think it was several days before we got it into suitable form; and as far as I know this was the beginning of Japanese hymnology. Some attempts had been made at it before, but I think that no complete hymn had been written or given to the public. Encouraged by this effort, we went on and made translations of about fifteen more of the most familiar hymns, and they were published with the title "Oshie no Uta," or religious hymns. Continuing in the same line, a new and enlarged hymnal was issued in the spring of 1876, in which there were more than fifty hymns. This Mr. Okuno assisted to prepare. Several of the pieces were not translations, but original compositions of his own. About three years ago, a very complete and excellent hymn book was published, and is now used by the larger part of the Christians in Japan. As in former editions, much of the work was done by Mr. Okuno.

From the first conviction of the truth of the Christian religion there grew up in his heart an ever-increasing desire to preach the Gospel to his people. Almost at once he began to tell others of Christ and his great love for those who were lost in sin. It was no formal message which he had to give; but every word came from his warm and loyal heart, and, like Paul, he besought men night and day, with tears, to become reconciled to God. When he came to my study from day to day as a teacher of the Japanese language, he would always have in his bosom a sheet of paper on which he would note down anything that would help him in his preparation of sermons. While giving instruction in the acquirement of the native language, it was evident that his heart was in the more important work of giving to his people a knowledge of the true God, and what they must do to be saved. Often would he say to me, "I have used up all my thoughts in my last sermon. Won't you please give me some more seed?" When I told him the meaning of some appropriate text, or suggested some telling illustration, his face would light up with surprise, just like that of a child in the possession of a new treasure. To preach Christ was his highest ambition and his greatest delight.

When the committee for the translation of the New Testament was appointed, he was chosen as one of the three native assistants. This was also to him a work of love, and in it he laboured with great diligence and success. On the completion of the translation of the New Testament, he removed to Tokyo, and became the pastor of one of the principal churches in that city. He has since filled various pastorates in Yokosuka, Mishima, and Osaka, and has left everywhere evidence of his faithfulness and zeal. Now he is in charge of a new and important mission in Yokohama. As a speaker on special public occasions his services are in frequent demand, and at such times he is strikingly happy and eloquent. Although more than seventy years of age, he is full of energy, and rejoices in every opportunity to speak for his Lord and Master. His mental powers are still vigorous, and it has been said of him that the older he grows the more active he becomes.

Some years ago it was the fervent desire of his heart to go all over Japan and tell the whole of the people about Christ before he might be called to rest. But the way was not opened for him to do so, and he gave up the scheme with great reluctance. About two years ago it was estimated that he had preached four thousand times, and no one can tell how many have been brought to a knowledge of Christ through his instrumentality. Everyone who has met or known him must have felt that he is a man of superior abilities, and at the same time possessed of a noble, generous heart that goes out in deepest love and sympathy for all.

As he faithfully served his earthly master, so he has given his whole soul to the work which God has called him to do. As a helper in the important work of translating the Scriptures, as the most successful writer of Christian hymns, and as a preacher of rare and Christ-like devotion to his calling, he will ever be acknowledged as one of the true and faithful leaders in the evangelisation of Japan.

EARLY AUTUMN.

Poor withered leaves! your time is come
To fade, to droop, and pass away.
Ye opened early to the sun;
Early ye fade—ye've had your day.

The aspen trembles in the breeze;
Its stalk, so frail, alas! too soon
Forbears to hold the tender leaf
Which bravely bore the heats of noon.

So many days, no more, no less,
Were counted to the ardent blaze;
How like to those they offered shade,
Whose work is meted, too, by days.

Apt emblem of so much we see
'Mong men, who are of time possessed;
There are "set times" for all on earth
To blessèd be, and then to bless.

Times to catch echoes sweet from heaven,
Times to observe what none can see,
Times—yea, small moments—which conceal
The germs of an Eternity.

"Set times" for nature and for man
To fade, to droop, and pass away;
"Set times," though oft we know them not;
Therefore we're told to watch and pray.

TO PARENTS AND TEACHERS.

To know how to make home for your child watch the birds. They mould their nest with their breast. It is the bosom that makes the home, and not the bill nor the claw.

Childhood is a period of privilege. The rain that makes the spring buds blossom makes the dead timber rot. The dew that freshens the summer flower turns to nipping hoar-frost on the autumn leaf.—Dr. R. W. Smith.

It would surprise many to see the terrible homes from which ragged-school children come. High rents, scarcity of work, and love of drink often produce a state of things in which common decency is scarcely possible.—John Kirk.

The hope of India, however, lies in her children. In Calcutta we have now thirty-seven schools for boys, and sixteen for girls, the attendance of the former numbering between 2000 and 3000, and the latter about 800.—Miss Fletcher, London Missionary Society.

When Dr. Chalmers opened his Sunday-schools in Glasgow, he very soon found that a strong feeling was rising against them. It was feared by many, and openly asserted by some, that they were antagonistic to family religion, and might even be its death. —Sunday School.

Unless a mother is a Christian lady, a God-fearing, God-serving, heavenly-minded, unworldly, praying woman, her unhappy daughter is extremely likely to grow up to womanhood in utter ignorance of what the religion of Jesus Christ really is, and what a Christian lady really is.—Dr. Alex. Whyte.

Be careful when you find your child in a fault. Your view of his conduct may be right enough, because you see much further; but the narrow compass within which a child's thoughts move, the dim and partial apprehension he has of consequences should be remembered, or grievous injustice will be done.

I once saw a boy busily engaged over what appeared to be work; it really was an imposition. He had been ordered to write out two chapters of the Bible. I doubt if any method can be employed which will be more certain than this to make a boy hate the sight of the Bible.—Walter Besant.

Of all the painful things connected with my employment nothing is equal to the grief of seeing a boy come to school innocent and promising, and tracing the corruption of his character from the influence of the temptations around him, in the very place which ought to have strengthened and improved it.—Dr. Arnold.

The bandaging of the feet of the Chinese girls begins when they are about six years old. The poor little creatures cry with pain, but it is continued till they are grown up, and then their feet are sometimes less than three inches long. They cannot walk well; as for romping, it is out of the question.—Dr. Schofield.

The lesson which is best conned and longest remembered is the teacher himself. He is an unforgettable object lesson. The scholars may skim over the reading, mangle the recitation, have indistinct views on the catechism, but, for good or evil, they will carry away the teacher's mood, temper, and disposition.—Rev. S. R. Crockett.

If in every great city there are vast numbers of boys and girls, who seem beyond the reach of the gracious influences which would make them good men and women, yet the immense majority are within reach of those influences, and even those who seemed lost from their birth have in hundreds of instances been saved.—Dr. R. W. Dale.

A lad I knew seemed to be going wrong. I asked him to come to my house and have a talk. I asked what was the matter. He was a fine plucky lad, not at all the boy to cry, but he stood straight before me and looked me fair in the face, and the tears ran down his cheeks as he said, "You do not know my temptations, sir. You wouldn't be good if you had to work in our factory."—Rev. L. H. Gwynne.

Go to your class expecting that you will learn as much as, nay, far more than, you will teach. Your hearts will be moved and quickened by the electric current which sympathy creates. You will receive a new grasp of idea, a power of comprehension, and a readiness of expressing your thoughts, which form the true pleasure of all intercourse, even the most familiar which human life permits.—Bishop of Peterborough.

Many children grow up like plants under bell-glasses. They are surrounded only by artificial and prepared influences. They are house-bred, room-bred, nurse-bred—everything but self-bred. The object of training is to teach the child to take care of himself; but many parents use their children only as a kind of spool on which to reel off their own experience; and they are bound and corded until they perish by inanity, or break all bonds and cords and rush to ruin by reaction.

The Evangelical Alliance.

CONFERENCE AT DUBLIN.

There has been an Irish branch of the Alliance for many years; indeed, it is nearly as old as the parent society itself. But never until last week has there been a general conference of the Alliance in Ireland's chief city. It was certainly a happy inspiration that fixed on Dublin as the seat of this year's annual gathering. The meetings, it may be said in a word, have been a complete and unqualified success. No one who attended them in a sympathetic spirit will ever forget the gracious influences that pervaded the assemblies or the weighty brotherly utterances of the speakers. With scarcely an exception, the addresses were worthy of the occasion; though not all of them, perhaps, were marked by outstanding brilliance of thought or expression. The due proportions of doctrine and practice were well observed in a comprehensive programme, the chief feature of which was the exposition and defence of the sacred Scriptures as a divine and sufficient revelation from God to man.

Altogether, the secretaries must be thanked and congratulated. For this occasion the Alliance Conference was amalgamated with the customary Christian Convention which at this time of the year serves to perpetuate the memories of Messrs. Moody and Sankey's first visit to Ireland. The united gathering was in its very inception a good illustration of the principles of the Alliance—principles that have a special bearing on the welfare of the sister isle at this critical period in her history. Mr. Arnold, the general secretary in London, with Rev. D. Mullan and Mr. R. Cotter, as the local secretaries, worked hard and harmoniously to secure a full representative attendance, and their efforts have been rewarded. After-meetings were held in the Christian Union Buildings. Irish hospitality is proverbial for its warmth and grace, and the delegates from England and elsewhere must carry away with them many happy memories of the Christian kindness extended to them. Many and fervent were the united prayers offered for a rich blessing on Ireland in all her interests, as well as on the world-wide work of the Alliance, and it would be treason to God and to man to doubt that abundant answers will be vouchsafed.

The presence and speech of the foreign friends, Professor Thoumaian from Armenia, Mr. and Mrs. Meek from Zululand, and Mrs. Abraham from Persia, lent a peculiar zest to the proceedings, and gave that finishing touch of catholicity which was so fitting in a conference of a society which, so to speak, has the whole world for its parish.

THE RECEPTION MEETING

on Monday evening was a most interesting occasion. A social hour was followed by a public meeting, presided over by the large-hearted Lord Plunket, Archbishop of Dublin, and the interchange of Christian greetings was a pleasing prelude to the more solid business of the subsequent days. The chairman well sustained his reputation as a Christian man in high office in the Church who is singularly free from the ecclesiastical trammels and prejudices of his position. His address was even an advance on former utterances at Dublin Conventions, for he took for granted the real equal status of all Evangelical Christian bodies, and did not deem it necessary to apologise for or even to explain his presence in an assembly supra-episcopal in its constitution and character. His example is one that may well be followed by all who occupy like positions in the councils of his communion.

His address had for its keynote what he called the threefold watchword of the Alliance—Evangelical liberty, Evangelical unity, and Evangelical truth. Sounding no uncertain note as to the meaning and with of the gladsome word "Evangelical" in its relation to Gospel truth, his Grace dwelt effectively on the outstanding principles and aims of the Alliance; taking occasion to refer to some of the many services it has rendered to the cause of religious freedom, purity of doctrine, and brotherly love. On these grounds as well as on the lower ground of common Christian courtesy he tendered to "the Alliance a hundred thousand welcomes" on its visit to Erin's Isle.

As representing other leading Christian Churches in Ireland, Rev. Samuel Prenter (Presbyterian), Dr. Evans (Methodist), and Rev. James Ervine (Congregational) spoke warm words of greeting that prolonged the note of welcome uttered by the Archbishop. The first to reciprocate these brotherly words was General Noble, on behalf of the Council of the Alliance. Then the climax of interest was reached when Professor Thoumaian uttered his heartfelt gratitude to the Alliance and its helpers in securing his release from chains and from durance vile. Quaintly remarking that he had really been sent to the Conference by the Sultan of Turkey, he passed on the fraternal salutations of the suffering Eastern Churches, particularly that "Church in prison," with a membership of some two thousand, which is at the present moment witnessing for the Gospel of Jesus Christ in the various dungeons of the province of Galatia. In conclusion he read a letter written by these imprisoned Christians to the Christian Churches of the West, which said among other things:—

> It would be a great help and comfort for us to be remembered in your public and private prayers, to be always presented by you to the Throne of Grace, to be helped and encouraged by your Christian love and sympathy. We pray always for the progress of the whole Catholic Church. You also pray for us that our faith be more and more strengthened and purified by our sufferings. Leave aside, therefore, for a moment your particular views and preferences, your ecclesiastical and denominational differences, and give hand to hand to work in Christian fellowship, to prepare and to hasten the glorious day of the coming of our Lord and Saviour. This is our last message to you from the bottom of our prisons. Remember our chains for the cause of Christ; pray for us, think of us, work for us.

> The Christian Church of the prison of Galatia.
> Galatia, July 5, 1893.

A brief address of response from our Zulu sister, Mrs. Meek, interpreted by her husband, concluded this part of the evening's engagements. The rest of the time was taken up by a lucid and very interesting statement by Mr. A. J. Arnold of the aims and methods of the Evangelical Alliance; they are well known to the readers of these pages, and need not be recapitulated here.

On Tuesday forenoon, with General Noble in the chair, the usual routine of these Conferences was transacted. It consists of the delivery of an "annual address" and the enforcement of the "practical resolutions" of the Alliance. The former duty was ably and well discharged by the venerated Principal Culross, of Bristol, whose weighty and timely words on the Holy Spirit's function as a revealer and teacher of saving truth were given in our issue of last week. Then the practical resolutions, read by Mr. Arnold, were commended and enforced, with fiery earnestness, by Rev. E. N. Thwaites, of Salisbury. He tersely summed up this Magna Charta of the Alliance in the one word LOVE. He portrayed in vivid colours the beauties and delights of true Christian unity, and urged with significant emphasis that this spirit of mutual love should be manifested without dissimulation and without humbug, not on special occasions only, but day by day. This unity is not to be confounded with any organic uniformity, which is neither feasible nor desirable. The genial rector of Salisbury created some diversion by an imperfect appreciation of Irish geography, which made him substitute the Liffey for the Shannon as the noblest Irish river; but he deftly turned the tables on his critics, a little later on, when he exhorted them as Christians to avoid an overweening indulgence in matters political, which, on his side of the Channel at any rate, was productive of unseemly divisions and strifes.

UNDENOMINATIONALISM NOT INDEFINITENESS.

Next on the programme was an address on this subject by that doughty champion of Protestant truth, Archdeacon Taylor, of Liverpool. Many were curious to see how this somewhat oracular text would be expounded to general satisfaction, but the Archdeacon soon vindicated the title of his prelection. He had been moved to refer to the subject, he said, by some strictures of "Undenominationalism" by certain high dignitaries in his own church. Undenominationalism had been described as something indefinite, vague, and nebulous; denounced as "the greatest imposture of the age, the youngest pretender to religious supremacy; the offspring of an unhallowed alliance between bad logic and worse theology; the greatest hindrance to Christianity that exists with the exception of the Church of Rome." It was always denounced as "teaching without dogmatic statement." He denied that. He understood by undenominational Christianity that fundamental Christianity which remained after all denominational distinctions were omitted. Did anything remain? A great deal. The great facts of Christianity were acknowledged by all the churches joined to the Alliance. In the best known creeds there was certainly no mention of Presbyterians, Wesleyans, or Episcopalians, and no mention of Church government. The creeds rested on the New Testament; in the New Testament he found a great deal of teaching that was very distinct and very clear, and very dogmatic, but he could not discover denominationalism in it. There was distinct dogmatic statement in the teaching of our Lord and his apostles, but there was nothing about modes of worship, about liturgy, or about hymnals. It was only said, "Let all things be done decently and in order." He only found in the New Testament, the grand fundamental truths of the Gospel and of God's revelation to man, and an absence of the denominationalism of which so much is made in these days. Was it fair, right, or Christian to denounce in that way undenominationalism as "the smooth-faced minion of a designing secularism." He respectfully denied the charge, and called for proof. They would have to wait a long time before they got it.

They were not pleading for uniformity; he did not think it practicable nor desirable; they did not plead for unity, for they were one—one with Christ; but they were pleading for union and communion, not for incorporation, but for co-operation, as well as Christian union, love, fellowship, and charity. Under the undenominationalism of the Alliance they could promote freedom of thought and could deprecate intolerance. He asked them to stand together as one man—not under shibboleths, but under the grand standard of the Cross and the glorious banner of the Evangelical Alliance, and let them never be removed from their present position by sneers and taunts.

THE CONDITION OF THE MASSES.

On Tuesday afternoon, with a goodly attendance, the Conference addressed itself to a consideration of "The social and spiritual condition of the masses and the remedy." Dr. Nicholas, of Dublin, who was to have opened the subject, being somewhat late, he was anticipated by Canon Harley, of Cork, who, with true Irish fervour, called for strong and courageous action on the part of all Christians in fighting infidelity and the great social and other evils of the time. He scouted the idea of pusillanimous acquiescence in any lowering of the standards of doctrine and life that God reveals. A practical, Samaritan sympathy with the lowly, the sinning, and the suffering will do more to commend Christianity to them than any amount of argument.

Dr. Nicholas, in opening his set address, recalled the incident of the feeding of the five thousand by our Lord after He had seen and compassionated the multitude. A great mass of people is always a very pathetic and heart-moving sight. We must not turn away our gaze from our fellow-men. Too often our interests as Christians become suburban, and there in our ease we forget the sins and sorrows of the city, and those who are crowded into its streets and courts and alleys. The masses in modern cities are vastly greater than in our Lord's time, and their social conditions are far worse. People now are moving from the country into the towns and cities, and one result is overcrowding. We have been told of fourteen persons working and sleeping in one room in London, and as to Dublin it is asserted that fifty thousand families live in one room and a-half. How can they lead moral, pure, Christian lives? Some will say that grace will enable a man to do right despite his surroundings. That is true; but take the average man and woman, and you find they cannot get away from their environments. We must not listen to the theorising of doctrinaires on this point. Think of the terrible insanitation that follows; think of the temptation to resort to the aid of alcoholic stimulants. And it is in the very neighbourhoods where these vitiated and weakened people live that we plant public houses in disgraceful numbers. Think, too, of the loss of virtue amid such surroundings, and the immorality. There is one small district in Dublin, not far from the present place of meeting, where there are 127 houses of ill fame and 600 prostitutes; yet in this district there are one Wesleyan, two Presbyterian, and two Episcopal churches situated.

As to the remedies, Dr. Nicholas said that there must be personal contact with the masses. If the people will not come to the churches, the churches must go to them. In many churches alas! the stranger is not always welcome. On his recent holiday he had been to several churches, and in some of them he could not but feel that he was not welcome. One case he knew of where several strangers were turned out of a pew, while the man and his wife who owned the pew marched in and sat there in solitary splendour. If we do not make the poor more welcome to our churches, and if we do not go to the masses and invite them to come with us, we shall never accomplish much for their salvation and elevation. Again, there must be an active interest in all matters affecting the wellbeing of the people. As an illustration of this the speaker told how Rev. Charles Garrett and other social reformers, Protestant, Roman Catholic, Tory and Radical, all combined for the one purpose, recently purified their local administration, and secured the abolition of a thousand public-houses and 800 evil houses. What might happen if we could but cleanse our municipal corporations? "Ah," exclaimed Dr. Nicholas, "if we could purify our Dublin Corporation. Some of you do not believe this can be done. Well, perhaps it may, bad as it is." The last point touched on was the need for a revival of family religion. Let us cease our church differences; let us as churches leave one another alone and let us unite to fight the devil and all his works.

An open conference followed. Alderman Cory, of Cardiff, thought "the classes," so called, ought not to be overlooked; they need the regenerating power of the Gospel as much as "the masses." Speaking of the evils of the drink traffic, he said that in Wales they thanked God for Sunday closing; it was undoubtedly a great boon. If ministers and laymen alike would lay aside their superfluous dignity and go out into the highways and byeways preaching the Gospel in the open air as our Great Master did, much might be accomplished. Rev. Thomas Lyle strongly commended colportage, which carries pure and elevating literature to the doors and homes of the people.

On Tuesday evening there was a very crowded attendance—a gratifying index of the public interest that has been awakened in the cause of true and undefiled religion in a land and in a city where the errors and the superstitions of Romanism have so strong a hold. Viscount Bangor presided, and the first to address the assembly was Dr. MacEwan, of Clapham. His vigorous, eloquent, and altogether admirable exposition of "Life in Christ" will be found in another part of this issue. After him on the printed programme came the announcement of an evangelistic address by Rev. Charles Spurgeon, of Greenwich. A heavy cold, however, prevented the fulfilment of his conditional engagement, to the manifest disappointment of many, who were anxious to see and hear one who not only bears a much-honoured name, but who has inherited not a few of the qualities that gave his father such a high place in the esteem of the Church universal.

While there was good cause for this disappointment, it cannot honestly be said that in the event the meeting suffered seriously. The arranging of two set Gospel addresses in one evening is an expedient of very doubtful wisdom, especially when these come close on the back of a solid deliverance on some profound doctrinal theme. So much consecutive listening, to put it plainly, is a weariness even to sanctified flesh, and the last speaker is bound to be heavily handicapped in his endeavour to retain the attention or interest of those hearers whom he is specially anxious to influence. Rev. E. M. Thwaites, in Mr. Spurgeon's absence, was left as the sole exhorter of the evening, and right splendidly he acquitted himself. Taking as the two antithetical keynotes of his address, the phrases "Ready to perish" (Isa. xxvii. 13), and "Ready to save" (Isa. xxxviii. 20), he made a most impressive appeal to the unsaved. The Spirit of God was undoubtedly moving in the hearts of many in the audience, judging from the free response made to an invitation by the preacher in the after-meeting for a manifestation of soul concern. The glad news of redemption, to be discerned and received by penitent faith, proved itself once again to be the power of God unto salvation to all lowly and believing souls. It was a right good finish to the first full day of the conference.

Wednesday forenoon found a fair company gathered again in the Christian Union Buildings, with Archdeacon Galbraith in the chair. Canon Bell, of Cheltenham, was the first appointed speaker, with a well-worn, but never threadbare, theme—"The Bible adapted to the necessities of fallen man." The reader can judge for himself of the excellent and solid qualities of the Canon's paper, which we have reproduced on another page. It was heard with great interest by the Conference, and so high was the estimate formed by some, at least, of those present that a formal proposal was made to have the address separately printed for free circulation throughout Ireland. That proposal, after due consideration, was cordially accepted by the Alliance officials. Such of our readers, therefore, as feel that it would be of service to the cause o Christianity in Ireland or elsewhere to scatter copies of the address can get them at a cheap rate on application to the London offices of the Alliance, 7, Adam-street, Strand, or to Rev. David Mullan, secretary of the Irish branch, Christian Union Buildings, Lower Abbey-street, Dublin.

THE EXPERIMENTAL METHOD.

An address of quite equal worth, and marked by even greater freshness of thought and utterance, was that which followed, by Dr. R. McCheyne Edgar, of Dublin, on "Christianity and the Experimental Method."

In a scientific age like ours (he said) something will be gained if we can show that Christianity is amenable to what we call "The Experimental Method." This method consists of three stages. First, we look about for all the facts we can find regarding the subject in hand; second, we cast about for some happy hypothesis that will interpret the fact; third, we proceed by experience or experiment to verify the hypothesis. Our Lord Jesus Christ anticipated Lord Bacon in the commendation of the experimental method, when he said: "If any man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine whether it be of God or whether I speak of myself." Our Lord does not say, "If any man will discuss God's will he will know the doctrine." The difficulty in connection with that is that we are such beings that we can argue ourselves into anything. The Pharisees argued themselves into the idea that it was their duty to murder the Son of God. If we take God's method and set about to do God's will, and allow ourselves to be guided by experience, we shall reach the Divine doctrine and know whether it is from God or not. If we follow Christ's advice, instead of discussing the Divine doctrine, we can be morally certain that it is from God. In our religious discussions we do not use such an unpopular word as "hypothesis." We put in the word "doctrine." Look, therefore, at the facts; then at the Christian doctrines that have been offered to explain the facts; then consider what verification of those doctrines we may reach in and through experience.

A fact is something that appeals to more than the five senses; it may escape the senses altogether. For instance, remorse is a fact that cannot be smelt, or felt, or touched, or tasted, yet it is a palpable fact. There is a great series of facts that speak to us of order and law, and another that speaks of disorder and lawlessness. There is a great series of facts that cluster round the name of Jesus. We speak about the ancient world and mean B.C., and about the modern world and call it A.D. We find as a matter of historic fact that Jesus Christ came into this world of disorder and misrule and became the turning point of humanity. Notice next the doctrine based upon these facts. What Christian doctrine do we attach to the fact of "order"? Creation. The Christian doctrine is that all things were made by Christ. We say that the doctrine of Creation is more reasonable than any of its rivals. Mind was before matter. Nature's order is a manufactured article, and the only manufacturer with originality and power is Jesus Christ, the Son of God. The doctrines attached to the facts about "disorder" are best explained by the doctrine by which we all believe in the fall of man. Mr. Darwin, who had an eagle eye, has, strange to say, helped us about this matter of the origin of evil, for he has recorded that in the embryonic stage evil passion may be discerned. When you look into the subject, the most scientific account of the "disorder," the lawlessness that exists, it is just the old doctrine of the origin of sin and the fall of man.

What doctrine do we suggest to explain the facts about Jesus Christ and all that He did in this world of ours? We must come to the conclusion that He was not the product of previous ages, as some say. There was nothing in the whole world that lived to account for Jesus Christ. Socrates, it is insinuated, was just about as good a man as Christ. That can be put to the test in a moment. One of the traditions is that Socrates went with some of his pupils to interview one of the celebrated courtesans of Greece, and it is related that he spoke to her about making herself attractive and driving her trade. How different is that from the interview recorded in the Gospel of John, of our Lord with the woman caught in adultery. The two men occupy an entirely different relation to sinful humanity. Then take the doctrine of the Holy Ghost. Coming after Christ, we find the most marvellous set of witnesses—plain men and women going about the world asserting that this crucified Jesus had risen again from the dead. They had no selfish object in circulating the story, and they suffered imprisonment and martyrdom for it; and day by day it grew stronger and stronger until it was proved that the crucified Saviour was more than a match for Cæsar.

Can any decent thinker give us a better interpretation of the facts than these Christian verities? Regarding the verification of the fall of man, when we committed our first sin, did we not find a fallen nature behind it? How may we verify the stupendous doctrine of Creation? There was no one there to witness it, and so there are speculations about spontaneous generation that are just the ravings of man's imagination. But we have a verification of that doctrine in our own experience. We know that we began to be. We do not believe in pre-existence. There was a time when we were not, and there was a moment when we began to be; and if we are Christians we find another moment when the chaos that existed within us gave place to cosmos and to order. Paul explains that by saying, "If any man be in Christ he is a new creation"!

A GARDEN PARTY

on Wednesday afternoon at the beautifully situated country house of Lord Plunket, Old Connaught, near Bray, formed a very agreeable relief to the more serious business of the conference. A very large company accepted the invitation issued by the Peer-Primate and his daughter. They were conveyed by train from Dublin to Bray, and the incursion of such a goodly band of visitors helped materially to replenish the scanty exchequers of the jarvies who ply for hire with their side-backed jaunting cars at this popular seaside resort. Old Connaught is an unpretentious mansion architecturally considered, but it is set down in a spot highly favoured of nature. The brilliant autumnal tints of the foliage in the fine old park gave a rich colouring to the landscape, and perfect weather completed the enjoyment of the outing. The Archbishop and his daughter cordially received the guests, and ample provision had been made for the supply of material cravings.

An important part of the proceedings was the photographing of an immense group of visitors, with the hosts, the chief officials of the Alliance, and the foreign visitors in the centre. The photographic artist was Mr. W. F. Lawrence, of Upper Sackville-street, Dublin, and many will be glad, as a memento of the Conference, to possess copies of the excellently executed picture, which can be had from the artist at 5s. each. There was no formal speechifying, but near the close of the afternoon, Dr. MacEwan and General Noble, as spokesmen of the Alliance Council, heartily thanked the Archbishop for his hospitality as well as for his services so frequently and freely rendered to the cause of Christian union and Christian truth at home and abroad. The Primate, in responding, said he had seen some interesting receptions at Old Connaught, but none that were to him so memorable and so full of rich import as this gathering of the friends of the Alliance. The company, greatly pleased with their reception, returned to town in time for the evening meeting.

This was again a great concourse. In a few presidential remarks, Lord Radstock pointed his hearers away from the outward surroundings and human machinery of the Conference, important and necessary as these were, to God Himself, the great source of fresh power and light on all true service.

REASONS FOR FAITH

was the subject of a telling address from Archdeacon Taylor. It was simple, almost elementary, in character, but well fitted to meet the difficulties of those who may not have been able to find a sure resting place for intellect, aspiration, heart, and conscience in the teachings to which from youth they have been accustomed.

In the first place, he would suggest to them some reasons in God. Why should they believe in the existence of such a great beneficent Being? Because it was the most natural and satisfactory account of the phenomena that they saw around them. It was much more easy to believe in the existence of an infinite, intelligent author than not, because they were involved in insuperable difficulties upon any other supposition. Bacon said he would rather believe all the fables of the Talmud and the Koran than that this universal frame was made without a God; he said that God never wrought a miracle to prove his existence, because his own works sufficiently prove it. Archdeacon Taylor proceeded to give reasons for belief in the Bible, and in its inspiration. First, there are the tokens of divinity impressed upon the book itself. Just as Paul appealed to the works of God in proof of the eternal power of the Godhead, so he appealed to the unmistakable tokens of divinity impressed upon the Sacred Books—veracity, holiness, justice, goodness, authority, sublimity. Then they had the marvellous unity impressed upon its pages, taken in connection with its varied human authorship; unity of plan, of purpose, of aim, and of progressive revelation of the mind of God—unity historical, doctrinal, and prophetical. Again, they had the marvellous adaptation of the Gospel of Christ to the moral and spiritual needs of men, Continuing, he gave reasons for the belief that Christ was the Son of God. They had abundant evidence necessary to satisfy them as to the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus. In conclusion, he referred to a striking passage from John Stuart Mill, in which that sceptical philosopher spoke of Christ as God incarnate, and one whose historical character could not be gainsaid.

Gospel addresses followed from Rev. W. E. Burroughs, of Kingstown, and Rev. J. F. T. Hallowes, of Birmingham. Their presentation of the Gospel was most clear, attractive, and convincing, and a large after-meeting testified to the power of the testimony given.

The attendance on the forenoon of Thursday, the closing day, showed no abatement of interest. The constitution of the Alliance and its general proceeding are all in the direction of giving prominence to those things that unite rather than divide, and controversial questions are therefore avoided as far as possible. The two first addresses of this forenoon had more of the controversial element in them than any others at the Conference; one was on Romish neglect or mistreatment of the Scriptures; the other had reference to current critical theories on the Old Testament. But, presumably, all present were of one mind on these points. No Romish divines were there to attempt a rebuttal of the Dean of Achonry's strong impeachment of Papal prohibitions of Bible study by the common people; no higher critics, German or English, appeared to throw doubt on any of Mr. Urquhart's interesting remarks on the accumulating confirmations of Pentateuchal verity that come from recent explorations in Egypt and other parts of the East. The Dean is one of the most eloquent and fearless of Irishmen, and he had not only ample licence from his audience, but full approval, as he cited from history some of the methods by which Rome has ever sought to extinguish the lamp of truth, and to keep its votaries in the bondage of ignorance. He was equally effective in his relation of the marvellous ways by which God has kept alive the Sacred Oracles, and raised up at critical periods men who gave the Bible to the world in its vulgar tongues, and set it out on a fresh and larger lease of life and blessing. The Dean contended that the cause of Ireland's woes is neither agrarian nor political, but religious, and every Protestant, at any rate, will admit this is largely true. They will also join with him in longing and praying for the time when the poorest peasant in the land will be able to possess and study the Scriptures that make wise unto salvation, without let or hindrance from priest or Pope.

Rev. John Urquhart's address embraced some very interesting statements, archæological and philological and chronological, to the effect that recent "finds" in Egyptian and Babylonish exploration are proving the verity of the early writings of the Old Testament, and disproving the theories of the rationalistic critics that they are of a much later date than popularly believed. We have only to wait, he said, and everything that is now thought by some to go to the pulling down of God's Word will go for the building of it up.

A practical and freshly-expressed address on "Crucifixion with Christ in daily life," by Rev. J. F. T. Hallowes, brought the morning sitting to a close.

FOREIGN MISSIONS

held the field on Thursday afternoon. First of all there was a comprehensive survey by Dr. Murray Mitchell of the main characteristics of the principal Pagan systems of religious thought—Mohammedanism, Buddhism, Hinduism, Confucianism, etc., and some very encouraging facts as to the modern decay of all these systems before the advancing tide of Christianity. The Gospel is making far more rapid progress to-day throughout the world than at any former period of its history.

Then as illustrations of the spread and influence of the Christian faith, we had addresses from the Armenian, South African, and Persian delegates. M. Thoumaian told how the Turkish Government is of set purpose straining every nerve to stamp out Christianity in its dominions by persecuting, imprisoning, and even killing its confessors; and how, notwithstanding, the Christian faith is alive and making progress. He alluded but slightly to his own case, but entreated that greater interest should be shown, and more earnest efforts made to obtain the release from chains and from suffering the two thousand Armenian believers who constitute the modern "Church in prison." Petitions should be sent in shoals to our Foreign Office asking the intervention of the British Government on behalf of these persecuted fellow Christians.

Mrs. Meek, with great apparent native eloquence, pleaded the cause of Zululand, especially her own people, among whom she and her husband labour. They greatly need enlarged church accommodation so as to provide for all who come to the Gospel services. Mrs. Meek's words were, of course, freely translated by her husband, and according to his interpretation they were words not only of great earnestness but of poetic and figurative beauty.

The last to speak for far-off lands was the picturesquely attired and animated Persian lady Mrs. Abraham. She gained the ear and the interest of her hearers by her naïve and artless speech, marked of course by somewhat broken and peculiar idiom, but on the whole easily to be understood. She claims to belong to the remnant of the lost ten tribes, and makes that a plea for the solicitude of British Christians. Considerable amusement was created by her invitation to the Alliance to hold an early Conference in Persia. She seemed to see no valid reason against such a step, and promised that she would devote some time to showing the visitors the spiritual needs of her land. Surely the best way to know the state of any country was to travel in it. Her church, which she preferred to call the Syrian Evangelical Church, and not the Nestorian Church, was greatly oppressed by the enemies of the faith, and many workers are wanted to carry the Gospel into the dark places of the Persian, as well as the Turkish Empire.

Mr. A. J. Arnold supplemented the pleas of the respective visitors, urging friends in Ireland and elsewhere to pave the way for forthcoming visits to different parts of the country. Mr. and Mrs. Meek are continuing in and around Dublin for some days to address meetings specially arranged for them. Mrs. Abraham remains for some little time also in Ireland for a like purpose, and it is arranged that Professor Thoumaian should visit Dublin in January. Particulars as to all these interesting engagements may be had from Rev. D. Mullan, Dublin.

Before the meeting closed, Dr. Murray Mitchell added a few sentences, partly corroborative of Mrs. Abraham's claim to be descended from the lost Israelitish tribes. The point may not be one of great importance intrinsically, but it certainly adds to our interest in this struggling Christian community to know that they may be among the natural kinsfolk of our Lord, and that if so, they have not shared in the guilt and the penalty that have attached to the Judean branch of the Abrahamic family.

THE CLOSING MEETING of the Conference proper on Thursday evening was full of deep interest. Mr. M. H. Hodder presided, and two weighty well-reasoned addresses were given on "Loyalty to Christ" by Principal Waller, of Highbury, and Rev. W. Roberts, of Notting-hill. The former passed in thoughtful review the claims of Christ as "very God and very man," and the latter in most practical and stimulating words exalted the Saviour as the heart, the head, and the hope of the Church and as the Redeemer, and ultimately triumphant King of the world.

The final utterance of the evening was by Lord Radstock, who gave an evangelistic address full of pathos and of encouragement to those who, like the Hebrews of old, are groaning by reason of their bondage. He told such in comforting words that the Lord had heard and heeded their cry, and had come down in the person of his Son—the Lamb of God—to deliver and save them. Let them "take every man a lamb," and being sprinkled with the blood of atonement, let them live on the lamb slain, thus having Christ not only for their redemption, but their daily life.

So much interest was created by the course of the conference meetings that it was decided to hold a meeting for thanksgiving and individual consecration on Friday morning. This gathering was presided over by Lord Radstock, and proved a time of rich experimental blessing. The friends of the Alliance will long remember the Dublin gatherings of 1893.

African Missions Visited.—12.

BY D. A. HUNTER.

We outspanned over Sunday at Dwars River, which is quite a rendezvous for natives. Travelling down country for work, or returning home, they rest there, and the women from the surrounding kraals sell them food and Kaffir beer. They gather in knots on the bank of the river, near to the Drift; so on Sunday forenoon we went down, and Mr. Sherneld spoke to them in Zulu, reading also from the Zulu Bible and singing Zulu hymns. Our Basuto boy translated into Sesuto, so that all present might understand. Some listened very attentively, and one said:—"These are good words which you speak, but how can we learn, for we have no missionary at our kraal?"

On Monday, while sitting at breakfast in the waggon, we saw five waggons coming down the hill towards us, and we were glad to find that they belonged to the German missionaries, returning from their conference. They outspanned near at hand, so we soon foregathered with them, and had an interesting talk. The headquarters of their mission is in Berlin, and it is Lutheran. They have already commenced work in Mashonaland, and near the north-end of Lake Nyassa, and have many stations in the northern Transvaal, some of which have been established for many years. I paid a very interesting visit to Ha Shewasse, situated near the eastern extremity of the Zoutpansberg Range. Mr. Beuster, the missionary, is quite a pioneer. When he entered the country, some twenty years ago, with his waggon, he had to make a road for himself. The river is a bad one to cross, as I learned to my cost when my horse got nearly out of his depth, and I very wet.

The station is beautifully situated on the slope of a hill, with grand mountain peaks forming a background on the north and west side. Tall gum trees surround the house, and one finds growing in the garden oranges, lemons, bananas, coffee, sugar-cane, bamboo, etc. The little church adjoins the missionary's house, and behind there is a row of neat cottages, whitewashed, and quite an advance on the ordinary native hut. Unfortunately, Ha Shewasse is not free from fever, and Mr. Beuster has quite a lot to do healing patients during the unhealthy season. Although nominally in the Transvaal, the district is virtually ruled by a powerful chief—Shewasse by name—who snaps his fingers at the Dutchmen, and pays them tribute or not at his pleasure. He is frequently at war with neighbouring chiefs, who hold a similar position to his own towards the Transvaal Government, and these chiefs are constantly having their following augmented by natives, who run away from the Dutchmen and their ill-treatment and heavy taxation, to the milder sway of a native potentate.

As soon as I had crossed the Lovonbu River, beyond which Transvaal authority is practically a dead letter, I found most of the men armed either with gun or spear, and Mr. Beuster told me he frequently had surgical cases to attend to, after some tribal fight or fray. Shewasse, although no Christian himself, tolerates, and to some extent encourages, the mission. During Mr. Beuster's absence some time ago, he was quite careful of Mrs. Beuster's welfare, and sent regularly to see that she lacked nothing. The chief's numerous wives, as soon as he is in sight, have to go on all fours, and crawl along until they receive a sign that they may stand, or until he has passed out of sight.

Mission work is slow among such people, wholly given up to their beer feasts, heathen dances, and immorality, but we know that we are on the winning side, and that a praying church at home, and a faithful and patient ministry here in the forefront, must prevail, through God's Spirit. Will you pray for the German missionaries and their work in Africa?

AT THE BREWSTER SESSIONS the magistrates have not always been influenced by the police. Not a few licences strongly supported by them were unanimously refused, and some that they opposed were granted.

MISS LEIGH'S PARIS HOMES.

Miss Ada Leigh's homes "are a centre of Christian influence in the gay city of Paris." The absolutely necessary whitewashing having been done, the lady in charge of 77, Avenue Wagram, writes:—

"The old Home is looking beautifully fresh. We are very full. I have never known so many at this time of the year. A few days ago a young girl came to us shattered in nerve and health, having passed through much trouble and disappointment. Her sad story has been confirmed by letters from two ladies who have known her, begging us to care for her. Of course we have done so, and hope she will soon be in a fit condition to help herself.

"Another sad case was that of an elderly woman who had been engaged as 'useful maid.' She was taken ill and left in the hospital in Florence. She found her way to Paris penniless, and almost without clothes. She was directed to Pasteur Monod, who sent her on to us. We clothed her and fed her, and when she was strong enough to bear the journey, the British Church Friendly Society sent her home to her friends.

"A young woman, recently returned from Paris, called at our London office, 22A, Queen's-road, Bayswater, where she had been staying previous to her taking a situation as superior nurse. She was full of heartfelt gratitude for the kindness and loving care shown her since her return to England. She said, with a tear in her eye, 'If you had not cared for me, I should have gone to the 'bad.'" We led her to Jesus the great 'care-healer,' and showed her where to carry her burden. It was quite touching to hear her speak of the Paris Homes. 'I am a Roman Catholic, and I have stayed in Roman Catholic Homes; but they are not like Miss Leigh's Homes. I do love the ladies there, they are so kind and good; you feel as if you were in a true religious home. I thank God I ever knew them.' Such are some of the facts and testimonies which come to us every day.

"We have to record the loss of £300 per annum through the expiry of the legacy which the late M. Galignani left to our orphanage for ten years. With a daily average of forty-five children to feed, clothe, and educate, a total of 322 have been fitted to fight life's battle, and have proved themselves worthy of the loving care which has watched over them by filling important positions, both in England and the United States, with an integrity of purpose in man's sight which has honoured God.

"We plead most earnestly for these 'little ones,' who are the most helpless of our English community in Paris, and who cannot plead for themselves."

Scottish Postal Employes.

For seven years a quiet but interesting work has been going on amongst the postal and telegraph employés of several of the principal towns in Scotland, in connection with the Postal and Telegraph Christian Association. On Thursday, September 28, through the kind invitation of Mr. Arthur, the president of the Glasgow Branch, and the other local workers, the first Scottish Conference was held, and earnest members from various centres met for mutual encouragement and help. It is hoped that a wider interest will henceforth be awakened in this good cause, and more prayer aroused on its behalf.

There are nine branches of the Association in Scotland, some worked by outside Christian friends, and others by the members. One of the most interesting points of the work is the active part taken by the employés themselves; in Edinburgh, their efforts for the eternal welfare of their confrères is unceasing, and in Glasgow, the fact that the rent of the P.T.C.A. Hall is half paid by the members proves that they are not behind others in self-denying effort. Many souls have been won for God through the association; nor does its sphere of usefulness end here: the deputation work of the Mission Bands greatly forwards the Church efforts in the various cities. There is, however, much need for outside lady workers in several places, and, in Edinburgh and other towns, of a Rest or Reading Room for the men.

The Conference meetings were presided over by Mr. Alexander Sloan and Mr. J. W. Arthur, and addressed by the Rev. J. J. Luce (Gloucester), Colonel Oldham (Edinburgh), Mr. J. G. Govan (Faith Mission), and Miss Edmonstone, Hon. Sec., P.T.C.A., Senior Branch. The tone of the meetings was excellent, and their results, without doubt, far-telling.

Anyone interested to help the work is asked to communicate with Miss B. A. Shaw, Norwood, Dowanhill Gardens, Glasgow.

THE GOSPEL IN MEXICO.

Mr. Eglon Harris continues to give interesting and encouraging accounts of work in Mexico.

Writing from Apartado 28, Orizaba, on Aug. 14, he says:—"Our labours among the children and young people give us encouraging views of what may be done. I should like to open a room both at Nogales and at Barrio-nuevo where we might have Gospel meetings in the evenings and children's meetings in the day. This of course will depend on the funds the Lord may entrust us with. The former place is four miles to the west of us, and the latter two miles to the east; both entirely untouched by the Gospel. On inquiry as to the cause of the absence from the school of two boys, I found that their younger brother had died, and the priest had told the parents that the reason was that they allowed their sons to go to the heretics' school—that to have to do with us was to have to do with the devil himself. What wonder is it that some of the poor children are under threats of severe punishment for coming to us when the priests are listened to by their parents! Last week it cost me 2.40dols. to replace panes of glass broken one night in the windows of the 'Local' by some of our ill-wishers."

On Sept. 4, Mr. Harris wrote:—"From what I can gather I think the duty on the printing press will not be very high, perhaps 20dols., but the freight, either by land or by sea, will be more than I was first informed. I think that £100 will only just cover the whole expense. Maybe, by the time we are sufficiently informed to be ready to order it, the Lord will send in the £50 still needed. The Lord is still giving us hearers all round, and with deep pleasure we are watching the growth of the Word in some hearts. As a rule we can get a better and more orderly congregation on a week night than on Lord's days, for on Sundays the theatres, bull-fights, drink shops, &c., are the great attractions to the outsiders. On Sunday week last I baptized a Scotch lady who has been staying here for a holiday. She has returned to her home on the coast, desiring to serve Christ by gathering the children together on the Lord's day to hear his Word. I hope to be able to visit that coast in the cooler season, for a Gospel tour. We are looking for guidance as to a native helper. He is with us now, but most of his time is occupied in his earthly occupation. He is willing to be our helper, depending on the Lord for the support of himself and family."

MR. SPURGEON ON TEMPERANCE.

Mr. Thomas Spurgeon presided on Wednesday week at the annual meeting of the Metropolitan Tabernacle Total Abstinence Society. The eleventh annual report stated that the year had been a very prosperous one, 45 meetings having been held, and 228 pledges taken, making a total during the society's existence of 759 meetings held, and 22,809 pledges taken.

The chairman, who was loudly cheered on rising, said he considered speaking on temperance questions to be only second in importance to preaching the Gospel. Joseph Cook had said that intoxicating drink was the devil's fish-hook, it being very easy to go on to the hook, but very difficult to get off. There were four modes of dealing with this curse—the legal, the medical, the moral, and the spiritual. In reference to the first, he supposed that it was to a great extent impossible to make men sober by Act of Parliament, but it was possible to keep the drink from them. He rejoiced to know that in New Zealand interest in this matter was increasing by leaps and bounds. Having expressed his disbelief in medical nostrums for the cure of drunkenness, Mr. Spurgeon said that moral influence was not to be despised, but they must rise higher. Drunkenness was at the bottom a sin, and, if they wanted to win men to holiness and sobriety, they must point them to the sinner's Saviour.

The Hon. and Rev. Canon Leigh urged his hearers not to be cast down by discouragements or difficulties. Every great reform had been of slow growth. It was only on his deathbed that William Wilberforce heard of the success in Parliament of the Bill for setting free the slaves, and the great Lord Shaftesbury had carried on his philanthropic work with scant sympathy from his compeers. It was only by constant agitation that they could hope to accomplish their purpose, and he therefore urged them to go on working, depending on strength from on high. They did not put temperance in the place of the Gospel; but they were trying to clear away what was a great obstacle in the way of the Gospel of peace. Among other speakers were the Revs. W. Stott, H. O. Mackey, and J. W. Harrald.

THE WORK AT HOXTON HALL.

Mr. William Noble and the friends connected with Hoxton Hall have been holding special harvest thanksgiving meetings. The occasion was rendered specially interesting on account of the crisis through which the work of the Mission is passing, owing to the death of the President, Mr. William Isaac Palmer, of Reading. It must have cheered the hearts of the band of devoted workers to see the hall filled.

On Saturday evening, September 23rd, Mr. John T. Rae presided, and Messrs. J. Louis Fenn, W. S. Campbell, John Jones, and other friends gave speeches, songs, and recitations. The service on Sunday evening was of a most impressive character, and the hearty, homely Gospel addresses given by Messrs. Robert Burn, J. F. Shorey, and J. Fyfe Stewart had a manifest effect in brightening the faces of the hearers. Naturally enough all the speakers drew lessons from the display of fruit and vegetables around them on the platform. The occasion was one of pathetic interest on account of Mr. William Noble's indisposition. A few days previously he was seized with illness during the meeting, and up to Saturday it was impossible to remove him from the scene of his labours, where a temporary bedroom had been arranged at the rear of the platform.

Mr. Noble returned last June to the post he held in days gone by, and all through the summer months has been cheered, together with his devoted coadjutors by manifest tokens of blessing. The meetings greatly cheered him while on the road to convalescence. Monday night brought the climax of enthusiasm, and the proceedings opened with a great reunion tea. Mr. J. Fyfe Stewart presided over the public meeting, at which the leaders of the various agencies connected with the hall gave encouraging reports. Although very weak, Mr. Noble was able to give a few words of thanks to the workers, and to express his gratitude that the undertaking in which Mr. William Palmer had been deeply interested was finding new friends to associate with many old friends, and gave promise of a rich future. Mr. Woodford Fawcett gave a cheery Gospel address.

THE GLASGOW CONVENTION.

The twelfth annual convention for the deepening of spiritual life was held last week in Glasgow, from Tuesday to Saturday, in the large hall of the Queen's Rooms, which is capable of seating 1100. Four meetings held daily, at 7 and 11 a.m., and at 3 and 7.30 p.m., were all well attended. Many came from long distances to enjoy the heart-stirring addresses which were given by the following speakers:—Revs. J. J. Luce (Gloucester), G. Wilson (Edinburgh), J. Young (Greenock), J. E. Houston (Cambuslang), J. G. Govan, John Smith (Edinburgh), and Dr. Harry Guinness and Messrs. Spencer Walton, Warren, and W. B. Sloan, the last-named being of the China Inland Mission. The following subjects were dealt with in the addresses:—First, "Sin in the Christian and in the Church," under four divisions: against God the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit; against the brotherhood; against the world; and in view of the coming of Christ. Second. "Growth in Grace," under two divisions: not by trusting to our own energy or waiting for gradual improvement; but through repentance, turning from secret idols, acceptance by faith, and waiting for Christ. Third. "Christ living in the Christian," under four divisions: the life of faith—"not I, but Christ"; a life not for self, but for others; life in the power of the Spirit; and the Bride of the Lamb made ready.

On Friday the theme was "The Christian at Home and Abroad," and this was very ably handled under three heads: first, the Christian's and the Church's failure to overtake, or enter, the field of missionary work; second, God's call to the labourer, and its tokens; and third, the missionary's difficulties, temptations, and strength.

On Saturday, missionaries and ministers from various parts of the world told the story of work done among the Jews, the godless at home, and the heathen abroad, whilst new openings and calls were spoken to with point and power.

A meeting was also held each evening in John-street U.P. Church to accommodate the Christians in the east-end of the city, and it was well attended. Mr. Robert Wilson presided in the Queen's Rooms, and Mr. J. W. Arthur in John-street U.P. Church. The arrangements, which were admirable throughout, were under the charge of a large and vigorous committee from different parts of Scotland. J. B. S.

The Chicago Campaign.

ALL DAY IN A TENT.

All day yesterday, from nine o'clock in the morning till eleven at night, Mr. Schiverea's tent on the corner of North and Milwaukee avenues was crowded with working people singing Gospel hymns and hearing vigorous, common-sense talking by the leading evangelists of the day.

It was a singular spectacle for a week-day. The vaulted ceiling was replaced by swaying folds of tent cloth; the clustered pillars were exchanged for leaning tent poles; there were canvas-bottomed benches in place of cushioned pews; a cabinet organ was substituted for the stately instrument of the church; instead of a velvet carpet there were shavings strewed on the ground, and in place of coloured windows the sides of the tent were all open, so that the daylight streamed in and the songs of choir and people echoed out on the busy streets.

It was no dress occasion for the audience. They came in their every-day clothes—hard-working men, out-of-work men, old men, and young boys, strangers in the city, neighbours of the tent, women with crowing babes in their arms and little children clinging about them, and young girls in gay bonnets; while here and there were the students of Mr. Moody's Bible Institute. The day was warm, but the audience was patient and attentive, though the tent was so crowded that many were obliged to stand outside. Some even mounted lumber piles, and looked over the heads of the audience.

Fifteen hundred people attended the morning services. At nine o'clock Mr. Schiverea conducted a praise service with song, testimony, and prayer, closing with numerous requests for prayers. At ten o'clock the Torrey quartet sung, and after a solo by D. B. Towner, R. A. Torrey gave a practical talk on Christian service and growth. After an intermission the next hour was begun by a hymn by the Oberlin quartet, and then Mr. Moody took the platform. His familiar figure and well-known method of directly dealing with his hearers need no description.

An hour's intermission gave time for dinner, and neighbourly friends entertained those who had come from a distance. At one o'clock a consecration meeting was held, and then the assembly was addressed by "Abe" Mulkey, the Texas evangelist.

During the next hour a children's meeting was held by Major Whittle. Mr. Jacobs' solo was followed by a sweet duet by two little golden-haired girls. Then Mr. Jacobs stood a little six-year-old baby on a chair, and she sang a solo, to the delight of the audience. After a trio by girls, and considerable congregational singing, Major Whittle gave an illustrated talk. What the Major said was so forcible and clear that it reached the older people quite as effectually as it did the children.

The four o'clock service centred in the address of Rev. John McNeill, of London. Mr. McNeill is a stout Scotch preacher, with pointed brown beard; long, drooping moustache; warm, genial smile, clear blue eyes, vehement manner, rich voice, and richer brogue.

After a quartet by the Torrey singers, Mr. McNeill spoke. He began with some pleasantry at the expense of his own nationality, and then announced as his theme the story of the man with the withered hand, taken from the third chapter of Mark.

Another splendid audience spent the evening with Mr. Schiverea. The evangelist spoke on Peter's attempt to walk on the water, his faithlessness, failure, and rescue. The text was: "Lord, save me!"—the earnest cry of an anxious soul. The preacher emphasised the fact that Peter cried in time of danger. Many a man is led within the Saviour's reach by force of circumstances. Again, Peter cried when he was just beginning to sink, instead of waiting, as most men do, till he had sunk altogether. It was a cry of utter helplessness. The sooner a man realises his own helplessness the sooner will he lay hold of God's almighty help. Moreover, Peter's cry was earnest, and not only earnest, but personal: "Lord, save me!" Best of all it was a cry that brought instantaneous deliverance.

Considerably after ten o'clock the lights were put out. Neighbouring saloon-keepers say that the Moody mission is ruining their business.

YOUNG MEN IN DUBLIN.

Under the auspices of the Y.M.C.A., Mr. Wm. R. Lane is this week holding a Gospel Mission in Dublin, chiefly with the view of reaching young men. Of these there is a large number engaged in business houses and in offices, and their ranks are being continually reinforced by fresh arrivals from the towns and villages of the provinces. The association, under the active secretaryship of Mr. Boyd, has lately been putting forth earnest and sustained efforts to bring the youth of the city within its saving and uplifting influence. Within the past twelve months, we believe, its membership has been doubled. It is fully hoped that this short special campaign by Mr. Lane will, under God's blessing, be instrumental in still further widening the circle of its operations.

The Mission was commenced on Friday evening by a social reception, when a goodly company of bright-looking and enthusiastic members and associates were assembled to welcome the evangelist. After tea, Mr. Wm. Fry, that warm friend of all good works, took the chair, and in a few happy sentences introduced his friend, Mr. Lane, and urged the workers to rally around him. Mr. Lane gave some timely counsels to his young brethren as to the need of heart preparation and of dependence on the Spirit's work for real lasting result. On Sunday afternoon Mr. Lane sounded out the Gospel invitation to a large congregation of the general public, and on Sunday evening began the Mission proper at a gathering for young men only. The Mission closes on Sabbath next.

The observant visitor to the Christian Union Buildings in Lower Abbey-street, where the Y.M.C.A. rooms are located, cannot fail to be struck with the meagre accommodation at the disposal of the young men. In a city of the size and importance of Dublin the Association ought to be much more "in evidence" as to its habitat, and ought to have far ampler resources in the way of buildings and subsidiary appliances, such as class-rooms, gymnasium, etc. We can but hope that the rising tide of interest in the work will reach the hearts and pockets of the wealthy Christian men of the city and of Ireland, so that adequate and attractive premises may be secured in some central leading thoroughfare to which the flower of the city's youth may be drawn, and where they may be won for Christ and his service.

DAY OF PRAYER FOR ISRAEL.

On Friday, September 29, there was an all-day gathering at Mildmay to plead with God for the Salvation of Israel. Four meetings were held, the first, presided over by Colonel Morton, at 9 a.m. The subject for this meeting was "Humiliation and Confession, with Thanksgiving"; and those who were present will not soon forget it, for truly much brokenness of spirit and contrition of heart prevailed among them.

The second gathering took place at 11 o'clock, Mr. W. K. Campbell being in the chair. The subject was "Prayer for all Missionaries and Missions to the Jews."

In the afternoon, at 3, Rev. J. Wilkinson presided, and gave an exposition of Isaiah xlix. On this occasion the subject was, "Prayer, that Scriptural interest in Israel may be awakened among all true Christians." Neither at this nor at any of the other meetings were there so many of the Lord's remembrancers present as the promoters of the gathering expected.

At the closing meeting, in the evening, Mr. S. H. Wilkinson was in the chair. The subject was, "Prayer, for a great awakening of the Holy Spirit among the Jews throughout the world, etc." Much fervour, freedom, and boldness characterised the petitions which ascended to God.

One who attended writes: "We are assured of this—that the coming twelve months will be a time of great blessing in the Jewish mission field."

ROUEN.—A friend writes:—"During a recent visit to France I inspected the premises, 38, Rue Grand Pont, Rouen, used as a sailors' institute, under the supervision of Mr. J. S. Madden, a Wesleyan evangelist. Many English-speaking sailors, including Germans and Norwegians, frequent these rooms, and, but for them, would have no safe place of resort in the large city."

THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC IN INDIA.

This frightful evil continues to spread under the fostering care of a so-called Christian Government, most anxious to collect public funds from any and every source that will yield profit; and as the abkari department is a very prosperous one, it is in great favour.

The Central Province is the smallest and the most backward, and yet even there the revenue from liquor (as well as in opium) is advancing by leaps and bounds, as these figures will show:—Liquor revenue in 1879, 16,09,504 rupees; in 1880, 16,85,542; in 1881,18,67,295; in 1887, 26,82,658; in 1891, 26,62,291; and in 1892, 27,74,189, or an increase of about £115,000 in the course of thirteen years. Please bear in mind that about 90 per cent. of this liquor revenue is derived from native-made liquor consumed by the natives, most of them poor people. And the increase is going on more or less rapidly throughout the whole land.

The Anglo-Indian Temperance Association, of which Mr. Caine, M.P., is the moving spirit, has, no doubt, done much to influence both the Government and the people, but the friends of India in India feel that the time has now come to institute a forward movement in a scheme for the total abolition of the traffic, and a manifesto to this intent has been issued in several languages. It is a good sign that we have now in Parliament a good number of generous friends of India.

Let us hope that the Opium Commission may result in some practical purpose, and that the stain of collecting revenue at the cost of death and degradation to millions of the people of China may be soon wiped out from the records of our Indian Government.—Yours to work for the Master, Mussoorie, September 5. Thomas Evans.

SOLDIERS' CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

The second conference of the Soldiers' Christian Association was held, August 28, in the regimental prayer-room, Subathu, Punjaub. Rev. J. Nelson, Presbyterian chaplain, 1st Gordon Highlanders, writes:—

For months past the members of our Association have been praying for a revival of religion among us, and we have not been disappointed. In response to our invitation, Mr. Herbert R. Francis, of the Anglo-Indian Evangelisation Society, who has for the past six months been in charge of the English congregation at Dehra Doon, held a series of special evangelistic services from August 21 to 28. As our prayer-room was too small for the meetings, our commanding officer, Colonel Gildea, who is always willing to help good work in his regiment, allowed the use of the 'garrison church' every evening. The addresses were listened to with deep interest by over 150 soldiers, besides ladies and the civilians of the station, and some were led to decision for Christ. On Sunday morning Mr. Francis preached to about 500 men, besides officers and their wives.

The all-day conference, with which the mission closed, was devoted to Scripture teaching, the addresses dealing with "Justification by Faith," "Sanctification by the Spirit," and "Glorified with Christ." At the close of the day a united Communion service was held, at which Mr. Francis gave an address. The mission will ever remain memorable in the history of Subathu, and to all who were privileged to be present.

THE DUTCH Y.M.C.A. IN LONDON.—The Dutch Y.M.C.A. held on September 27 its first public meeting in the rooms of the City Y.M.C.A., Cornhill. This work has for its object the promotion of Christian life among the Dutch in London. The meeting was presided over by Mr. W. v. O. Bruyn, jun., who introduced his father, Mr. W. van Oosterwyk Bruyn, sen., the George Williams of Holland, who gave an interesting account of the origin and progress of Y.M.C.A. work in the Netherlands. The first association was founded in Amsterdam some 42 years ago. It had to contend against almost insuperable difficulties. Encouraged by men like Da Costa, Heldring, and Groen van Prinsteren, and warmly supported by the fathers of some of the young men now members of the London Association, the work was continued with great perseverance. At present there are in Holland some 750 Associations, with about 17,000 members. At the close of the gathering several stayed behind for further inquiries. Mr. Plugge is the secretary pro. tem.

Letters to the Editor.

"CLAIMING" BLESSINGS.

Dear Sir,—Would you or one of your friends give us a little definite teaching as to the duty (so much pressed in the present day) of "claiming" from God what we need? I feel it is only is as a suppliant, in the name of Jesus, that I can pray for my soul's wants, and some of my friends tell me I require more faith to "claim" what I pray for.

I should feel very grateful for teaching on the subject, both for myself and others I know to whom it is rather a stumbling-block, especially to young Christians. We have so many precious promises that believing prayer will be answered, and I can thank God for definite answers to definite petitions; but I confess the word "claim" is rather repugnant to me. We read, "Ask, and it shall be given; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened."

Do not think I am writing in any spirit of controversy. I am but a babe in Christ, though not young in years, and I do want to learn more and more about the indwelling Christ.—Yours faithfully,

M. A.

ROME AND THE JEWS.

Dear Sir,—While the Romish Church sends her legions of priests into all parts of the world, and to all conditions of men, she has no mission to the Jews—she has no word of regret for wrongs inflicted for hundreds of years. From the very beginning, Rome set herself against Israel. In defiance to God, the Pope calls himself "Holy Father," and Rome is styled "the Holy City," in opposition to Jerusalem, the holy place chosen by God Himself. Rome has paganised the religion of the Messiah, and has polluted herself by bathing her hands in the blood of the children of Israel. She has tortured, sent into exile, and deprived of earthly possessions, tens of thousands of Israel's sons and daughters. Surely the blood of these thousands will be required at her hand, when Jerusalem will rise from her ruins! The Pope shall be crushed for ever, when the King of Israel shall be exalted! Rome, the harlot on the seven hills, will not be destroyed until Jerusalem be rebuilt and Israel be gathered to their Eternal King.

How could the Jew recognise in the Church of Rome and her teachings the religion of Moses and the Prophets? How could he see in the murderers of Israel the disciples of the Messiah promised to the fathers? Rome knows too well the bitterness she has excited in the breast of the poor Jew, and is too cowardly to approach him. Bloody persecutions are entirely unknown in Protestant countries, and the Jew has learnt to distinguish between the idolatrous Christianity of Rome, and that of the Gospel of love brought to them in Protestant countries. Thus, while Rome has only few converts, whom she has obtained by force or fraud, Protestantism has made thousands of converts from Judaism by love.

Surely it is a great privilege which God has given to us, to seek to graft into their own olive tree these poor cut-away branches, and bring them to the feet of our Lord Jesus.—Yours faithfully, 119, Leman-street, E. D. Oppenheim.

THE OPIUM COMMISSION.

Dear Sir,—I beg to call your attention to an error in your report of Sir Thos. Wade's evidence before the Opium Commission. He did not say that the Chinese Government was free to deal with opium in any way they thought fit, but directly the opposite, as reported in The Times of Sept. 16, thus:—

"Lord Brassey: We have had brought before us repeatedly the important official statement made by Sir James Fergusson in the House of Commons, but that statement has not been accepted by all the witnesses before us, and some of them have contended that, that statement notwithstanding, the Chinese Government are not free to deal as they may think fit with the opium trade between India and China. Can you tell us how the matter stands?—Sir Thos. Wade: That refers to negotiations since my day. I am not prepared to vouch for that statement at the moment. I do not venture to affirm that there is anything on record to the effect that the Chinese might, if they chose, raise the duty or take this step or that. With the relations that we now have, no step of this sort certainly would be undertaken without preliminary negotiations."

I may also add, that, at the request of Mr. Arthur Pease, Sir Thomas Wade read a portion of the 7th clause of the "Additional Article" to the Chefoo Treaty "Regulating the Traffic in Opium" as follows, and he acknowledged that China is still bound by it:—

"The arrangement respecting opium contained in the present Additional Article shall remain binding for four years, after the expiration of which period either Government may at any time give twelve months' notice of its desire to terminate it; and such notice being given, it shall terminate accordingly. In the event of the termination of the present Additional Article, the arrangement with regard to opium now in force under the regulations attached to the Treaty of Tien-tsin shall revive."

The Chinese, therefore, can only free themselves from the present treaty by reviving the more onerous Tien-tsin Treaty under which they groaned for so many years. The anti-opiumists are so often accused unjustly of exaggeration and misstatement, that this most glaring case of official misstatement should be well known, so that it may have its proper weight with the public, as it no doubt will have with the Commission.

All who are interested in this question should read the verbatim report as soon as it is published, and they will find how greatly the weight of the anti-opium evidence preponderates; whereas the contrary might be supposed from the garbled reports in some of the daily papers; but even a verbatim report cannot fully give the great contrast between the pro and anti-opium evidence, which was so manifest to those who heard it. I had the pleasure of hearing nearly all the evidence against, and all in favour of opium, and I was very much struck (as were others also) with the earnestness of the anti-opium witnesses, and the way they stood cross-examination without any hesitation, or attempt to conceal anything which might appear to weaken their cause; and this in marked contrast with the levity of some of the chief witnesses on the other side.

Instead of being discouraged, as I find many are, we have cause for deep thankfulness, and should be encouraged to still more earnest prayer. I fully believe that the extent and character of the evidence already given are in direct answer to prayer, and also that the near or distant settlement of this question depends on whether the Church is awakened to her responsibility. Surely, whatever our opinions may be on this matter, all Christians can unite in the prayer that the whole truth may be made plain, and God's will be done.—Yours truly, Croydon, Sept. 28. Arthur C. Sterry.

ASSISTED EMIGRATION.

Sir,—Mr. Cracknell's letter on "Emigration," in your issue of September 21, is most timely, as it suggests a practical remedy for the present terrible state of affairs in this over-crowded country. I, for one, am only too willing to emigrate, and there are thousands like me, but how are suitable people to get out to the colonies unless helped to do so? Mr. Cracknell, who has been the means of getting situations for many in the colonies, where they are now successful, proposes to be a link of communication between those giving and those receiving help. His plan is that the help received should be directly and gratefully acknowledged by communication to those that give help. How gladly some of us would do this, and report ourselves when we arrive, and return by instalments the money advanced to assist us!

The splendid success of the emigration work of Dr. Barnardo, who has sent out to Canada 6000 children from over-crowded London, and of which 92 per cent. are doing well, is a proof that assisted emigration for the starving, homeless men and women of our land would be crowned with a like success. If you will use your influence in this direction you will confer a great blessing on thousands of workless, but not worthless, men and women who are in great distress. I am sure people would gladly repay any money advanced.—Your very truly, October 2, 1893. Clement Osborne.

"EIGHT PER CENT. WATER."

Dear Sir,—As one who is a constant reader of your valuable paper, I would ask you kindly to forgive my trespassing upon your valuable space. "We cannot but speak the things we have seen and heard."

The Daily Telegraph of a few days ago published an account of a case where the milk supplied by a Hertfordshire dairyman to a certain London milk company would not stand the test of the analyst, the result pointing to the presence of eight per cent. water in the milk, and a prosecution was commenced for adulteration. In the course of the evidence it was shown that the analyst had been to the place where the cows were kept, and the milk was milked into pails from them and yielded the same result—eight (8) per cent. of water. The verdict was, therefore, given for the defendant, the analyst further stating that it was owing to the poorness of the pasture of the cattle, through the present drought, that the milk yielded this result.

Here is a lesson for those who have the feeding of those who are babes in the faith, with the sincere milk of the Word, without which they cannot grow. Take care (1) that holy hands may be lifted up in prayer for the showers of the grace of the Holy Spirit upon the pastures where your soul feeds; and (2) take care that you feed in no other than the green pastures where He leadeth you.

Thanking you in anticipation of your kindness,

Believe me, dear sir, yours faithfully,

Dunsby Rectory, Bourne. Wordsworth Jones.

PLEA FOR THE BIRDS—BAKED ALIVE.

Dear Sir,—Will you allow me a little space in your paper to plead the cause of the birds? At this season, when your lady readers are thinking of winter headgear, may I ask them to remember the cost at which bird ornaments—aigrettes, wings, and stuffed birds—are procured. The aigrettes are taken from birds killed during the breeding season, the young ones being left to starve. Wings, which can be had so cheaply, are often wrenched off during life, and the poor birds are left to die a lingering death. Swallows and other stuffed birds, which are prepared by the French, are baked alive to preserve the freshness of the feathers! If a woman has a heart at all, surely such considerations as these will prevent her wearing these ornaments with any possible pleasure.

We are told of birds killed for legitimate purposes, that "not one of them is forgotten before God"; but how much more must the millions slaughtered barbarously for a caprice of fashion excite his compassion, for "his mercies are over a l his works." If any of your readers wish for further information on this subject, they can have it by enclosing a stamped wrapper to Mrs. Phillips, 11, Moorland-road, Croydon. L. L. A.

POST CARDS.

BLACKTHORN CHAPEL, BOW COMMON.

The Lord is with us; young and old are being blessed. Hundreds of the poor bless God for loving sympathy in times of need. 750 in our Sunday-school and 800 drift children represent an important work amongst the rising generation. Finances try us.—T. J. Hazzard, 27, Cottage Grove, Bow, E.

OUR SOLDIER LADS.

In consequence of the recent strike in South Wales the barracks of the depôt centre at Brecon have been so crowded that a double row of tents has been utilised to accommodate the men. Each Sunday afternoon the barracks and hospital are visited, and tracts distributed to hundreds of eager recipients. Illustrated tracts and Gospel papers urgently needed by secretary, Y.M.C.A., Castle-street, Brecon.

OPEN-AIR WORK IN CHELSEA.

The Chelsea Baptist Chapel Evangelistic Association will shortly conclude the present season's open-air work. They desire to thank God for a year of great blessing. More meetings have been held than in any previous year. The willingness of the people to listen has been most marked, and the power and presence of God's Holy Spirit has been felt over and over again. Definite blessing is believed to have resulted in one or two cases, while many others have been visibly impressed. C. J. P.

IN THE ISLE OF ARRAN.

Open-air services for children were held on King's Cross Point, Arran, N.B., on Sunday afternoons during the months of June, July, August, and September. On September 10 the subject of foreign missions was brought before those present. Each week there have been freewill offerings given for the Glasgow Children's Fresh Air Fortnight Treat, £16 9s. 10d. being given during the season. The meetings were most encouraging to the speakers, for, wet or fine, many came to hear the Word of God.

THE TENT MISSION IN BRIGHTON.

For the last four months a tent mission has been held by the Evangelistic Mission. This was closed last week. On Wednesday a band of willing workers provided tea; about 250 sat down, and Mr. F. E. Marsh, of Sunderland, gave a practical address to some 350 assembled. Tears were in the eyes of many at the thought of closing the work. On Friday a good number assembled for prayer, praise, and thanksgiving. Numbers have testified by word and letter of restoration, conversion, and building up.

BIBLES FOR SWEDISH RECRUITS.

It will no doubt interest English friends to know that, in addition to the work for temperance in Jönkoping, Victoria House and the Epileptic and Cripples' Homes at Wilhelmsro, another way of spreading God's kingdom has been tried here. In every railway station a Bible has been placed, as well as in many hotels abroad, where the landlord allowed it. At present I am trying to interest our officers to help in distributing Bibles to all second-year recruits. It has been done already to two divisions of the second year—in all 900. What a blessing if they could get every year such a gift all over the country! What might one not expect!

E. P. de Ramsay.

SCOTTISH NOTES.

We hear with regret that the income of the Glasgow United Evangelistic Association for the past half-year has decreased greatly, owing chiefly to the death of several warm and hearty supporters.

A fruitful work of grace is at present going on in the little village of Nitshill, some three miles from Paisley. The meetings, which are held nightly, are crowded, and many remain to be dealt with. Rev. W. Omand, of the Free Church there, has thrown himself into the work with great zeal, and has already reaped a rich harvest.

"Lifeboat Saturday" was observed last week for the first time in Glasgow. The streets through which the impressive procession passed were densely crowded, and a large sum of money was collected. It is well that this humane work has been brought so prominently before the citizens of a town whose prosperity so largely depends on the shipping interest.

At the annual public meeting of the Grangemouth Scottish Coast Mission, held in Grangemouth on Sunday week, Mr. Gillespie, local missionary, gave an interesting report of work done during the past year, and showed that the Seamen's Bethel was answering the purpose for which it was built. 2050 sailors, together with townspeople, had attended the Sunday evening meetings, and 850 sailors, besides others, had been present at week night meetings.

At the meeting held in Glasgow last week, in the interests of the "Welfare of Youth" scheme of the Free Church, Rev. J. J. Mackay, of Trinity Church, made the startling statement that of the 6000 young people who yearly left the Sabbath schools belonging to the Free Church, only 600 joined the membership of the church, so far as he could make out from the returns he held in his hand. Surely their returns must be very faulty, or there is something far wrong in the present system of training the young.

IRISH NOTES.

Over ninety persons professed conversion at Mr. Waugh's recent mission in Belfast.

Dr. Knox, the Protestant Primate of all Ireland, has just entered on his eighty-sixth year, and is still hale and hearty.

At the recent Intermediate Examinations the Belfast Methodist College took the first place of all Protestant boys' schools in Ireland, as it had also done the previous year.

The Belfast Local Preachers' Association, which held its annual meeting on Tuesday evening week, has over fifty members, and is doing an excellent open-air and evangelistic work.

The ladies of the committee of the Belfast Branch of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, have decided to hold a number of drawing-room meetings as a means of increasing the income of the society.

Some Dublin friends have almost completed their arrangements for securing a house at the popular watering-place of Howth, as a home for members and associates of the Y.M.C.A. in Ireland, and also as a suitable centre for evangelistic work.

Under the auspices of the local branch of the Evangelical Alliance, a thanksgiving meeting was held in the hall of the Y.M.C.A., Belfast, on Monday week. Mr. R. L. Hamilton, J.P., presided, and an interesting address was delivered by the Dean of Connor, Dr. Seaver.

A meeting to bid farewell to Messrs. J. C. Bass and G. Gracie, who are going out to Ceylon as Christian workers under the auspices of the Ceylon and Indian General Mission, was held in the Y.M.C.A. Hall, Belfast, on Thursday evening last, Rev. S. Kershaw presiding. Mr. R. H. S. Richardson, of Lambeg, delivered an address, and Mr. Bass gave his reasons for resigning all home claims and going to the mission field.

East London Tabernacle.

The parting service of Pastor Archibald G. Brown, who is leaving for Mentone with his invalid wife, was held on Sunday evening last, the Tabernacle being packed to its utmost capacity. Before the time for the service had arrived, every available seat was occupied, as also was the standing-room, and numbers were unable to obtain entrance.

The pastor spoke from Isaiah xliii. 10, "Ye are my witnesses, saith the Lord." During his discourse he stated that, although his future movements were, of necessity, uncertain, yet he anticipated being with them for a short time at the close of the year.

It is hoped that all who are interested in his Mission and Orphan Home work will relieve him of anxiety in this direction during his season of absence.

THE Y.M.C.A.

The Abertillery (Mon.) Y.M.C.A. has inaugurated its winter session by an enthusiastic meeting.

Mr. Lane's Y.M.C.A. mission in North London appears to have produced cheering results.

Interesting meetings for men are being held every Thursday evening at the Y.M.C.A., 17, Camden-road, N.W.

Mr. John Cory gave a tea to a large number of young men at Barry, near Cardiff, in connection with the local Y.M.C.A., on the 26th ult.

The open-air Sunday evening services, held by the Y.M.C.A. during the summer near Gloucester Gate, Regent's Park, are now closed for the season; but the workers are rejoicing in tokens of blessing.

Mr. C. Dauncey, the newly-appointed president of the Y.M.C.A. at Pontypool, greatly encouraged the workers at a recent meeting by the promise of £100 towards securing suitable premises in which to carry on their work.

Lord Fortescue presided at the inaugural meeting of the session in connection with the South Molton Y.M.C.A. The hon. sec. of this branch, Mr. J. H. Sanders, has been led to offer himself for medical missionary work.

The building of the Southport Y.M.C.A. has just been redecorated throughout in a thorough and elegant manner, the drawing-room and reading-room have been provided with new furniture, and arrangements made for an active winter campaign.

Dr. Harry Guinness gave a medical lecture on Wednesday last in the large Exeter Hall, to a crowded gathering of men. His remarks resolved themselves at the close into an earnest Gospel appeal, in response to which a very large number stayed to an after-meeting, Mr. W. H. Seagram presiding.

At the Congress of Y.M.C.A.'s of the world, to be held at Chicago on October 6th, the greetings of the English associations will be conveyed to the gathering by Lord Kinnaird, those of the French associations by Mons. Jules Siegfried, of Paris, those of the German associations by Count Andreas Bernstorff, of Berlin.

Following the annual conference of the Western District Union of Y.M.C.A.'s at Bath last week, a great mass meeting of men was held in the Guildhall. Mr. George Williams occupied the chair. Rev. Henry Dening, of Bristol, spoke upon gambling, Mr. W. Hind Smith upon intemperance, and Mr. E. J. Kennedy upon impurity.

Mr. George Holmes, missionary secretary, is visiting the home associations just now, with the object of calling forth the sympathies of the members with their fellow young men in Egypt, Palestine, and other lands. Very successful meetings have been held in several northern towns, where Mr. Holmes has delivered lectures illustrative of his recent tour in the East.

The association at Finsbury Park has made an encouraging start with the winter work. At its opening reception several new members were welcomed, and the three hon. secretaries were formally recognised, viz., Mr. Frank How (Finance), Mr. F. E. Yeoman (House), and Mr. R. Darroll (Devotional). The two former have been fulfilling their duties for several months past with great benefit to the association. The latter (Mr. Darroll) has just come from the Peckham Y.M.C.A. to take up work in this northern suburb. The public meeting usually held at the beginning of the session will take place on Monday, October 9, at Wortley Hall, when Archdeacon Sinclair will deliver an address.

The Bombay Y.M.C.A. Monthly Letter for September gives an interesting account of the work already accomplished in the presidency by Mr. Robert McCann, missionary secretary, sent thither by the English National Council. Two new associations have been formed, and the work in a number of places has been revived and strengthened; corresponding members have been appointed at various important stations, who will do all they can to welcome and help young men; building enterprises have been assisted, and the general organisational work of the district has been greatly benefited. Mr. McCann has travelled many thousands of miles, stopping at every important station to seek out opportunities for Y.M.C.A. work.

ARMENIAN PERSECUTIONS.—A correspondent of The Daily News says that the two brothers of Professor Thoumaian at Marsovan have been thrown into prison. They are alleged to have received "seditious" correspondence from London. It is believed that the Porte has determined to close the Protestant Anatolia College, and a polite intimation has been made to the United States Minister at Constantinople that the return of Dr. Herrick is not desired by the Sultan. The Government at Washington has plainly informed the Porte that under no circumstances will American missionaries be prohibited from returning to Asia Minor from Europe.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOUR NOTES.

A C.E. society has been formed in connection with the East Hill Church, Wandsworth.

The Archdeacon Lane Society, Leicester, which began the year with a membership of twenty, now reports a roll of 124.

The last Sunday in September was observed in the Presbyterian and in some other churches of New York as Rallying Day—the day on which the members of the society rallied in the appointed places for a fresh start.

Rev. W. R. Sunman, Connexional Secretary of the Methodist Free Churches, has just sent out the circular ordered by the Annual Assembly to be addressed to every superintendent-minister concerning the work of the Y.P.S.C.E.

Rev. J. McClune Uffen, of Dorchester, stated the other day that the Christian Endeavour Society would prove a dominant religious force in the Church of the future, providing effectively as it does for the spiritual culture of the members, and suggesting suitable outlets for Christian life and energy.

The Evangelical Union Y.P.S.C.E. of Linlithgow held their social meeting in the Council Chamber on Tuesday week. The chairman, Mr. T. S. Veitch, said that for the five months the society had been in existence God had blessed them wonderfully, and that they ought to be encouraged for the future. The pastor, Rev. J. Cameron, gave a few interesting details about the society, and urged associate members to decide for Christ and the Church, and exhorted active members to work for Christ and the Church.

MEDICAL MISSIONS.

The Quarterly issued by the Edinburgh Medical Missionary Society pleads ably the cause of medical misions in all lands. The new number gives accounts of work in Damascus, Nazareth, Madagascar, and in various parts of India and China, while a series of papers is being given on the history of the mission in Travancore.

Amongst the many interesting points in the number, we observe a pleasantly-penned note from Dr. Grace Mackinnon, telling of her work at Patna, where she arrived in March, 1891. In the first nine months of her residence there, 4,005 attendances were recorded from 1,760 patients, besides 325 visits paid to patients in their own homes. Speaking of the modest beginning of an hospital, Miss Dr. Mackinnon writes:—

"In the middle of January we rented a little mud house on the bazaar quite close to us, as we wished to have a patient near us for operation. This is our first modest attempt at an hospital. Since then we have had a succession of in-patients; but, having only accommodation for one at a time, and as some have been tedious, we have only been able to take eleven in all. These patients have mostly been drawn from our city dispensary, and we think it is the result of this that our city dispensary has grown so much of late. Certainly, it is since our first in-patient went home well that it has so much increased.

"Having this little house has enabled us to take in several cases which it would have been difficult, if not impossible, to treat in their own homes. It is the day of small things, but we are far from despising our hospital with its one bed. On the contrary, we take a great pleasure in it, and have got to know a few women really well by its means. Our house-to-house work has also increased. This, owing to the long distances in Patna, the dreadful state of the roads, and a bad horse and gâri, we find the most trying part of our work. I need scarcely say how much we long for proper accommodation in which to work, and we hope soon to be able to tell of a suitable site having been secured."

IRISH CHURCH MISSIONS.—A friend writes in a private letter:—"There is no doubt that there is an advance all along the line in this work in Ireland. The I.C.M. men alone preach openly in at least 200 different fairs and markets all over the country. Five years ago there was scarcely anything done or attempted in this way. There is all round great encouragement."

SILVER STAR SOCIETY.—On Thursday last, Earl Compton presided over a special meeting in the Baptist Chapel, Manor Park, E., to inaugurate a medical mission in the neighbourhood. Deputations were present from several institutions and places of worship. The secretary, Mr. Walter S. Robbins, set forth the work done by the Society in its efforts to assist other bodies. Evangelists have been sent to all parts of London, and children's services, lantern lectures, and temperance meetings have been supplied. For the medical mission, the services of a doctor have been secured free of charge, the only difficulty being for medicine, which would require £40 to £50.

The Book World.

S. W. Partridge & Co. send Left with a Trust, by Nellie Hellis (9d.), and Hazelbrake Hollow, by F. Scarlett Potter (1s.). Simple stories of home life, well written, interesting, and full of good purpose. They will make excellent prize books.

Bright Thoughts for Weary Hours, by Clara Bray, is a course of brief readings for every day in the month, specially addressed to the sick and sorrowful, and those who minister to their needs and comfort. (Hodder Bros., 80, Fleet-street.)

Rex Singleton: The Pathway of Life, by Mrs. Lysaght. (Wells Gardner, Darton & Co. 2s.) Thoroughly a boys' book, full of the adventures (and it must be confessed, the pranks) of an Irish boy. It is admirably conceived, and will delight many young readers.

Little Count Paul. A story of Troublesome Times. By Mrs. E. M. Field. (Wells Gardner, Darton & Co. 2s. 6d.) A well-written story of the French Revolution, full of incident and peril, and following throughout the dangers and doings of a brave little fellow, who will win the sympathy and admiration of all.

Rest and Reaping continues its useful course. The October issue opens with an article by the editor, Miss Charlotte Mason, on "The Open Book," Rev. x. There are several other expository and some very practical articles; and, as usual, choice poetical selections find a place. (1d. monthly. Morgan & Scott.)

Cassell's Gazetteer of Great Britain and Ireland is a new serial. The first part, of forty-eight pages, promises to give concrete form to the terms of the title page, that the completed work will be "a complete topographical dictionary of the United Kingdom." There are many useful illustrations and maps. (7d. each part.)

Songs in the Night: Poems on Various Subjects. By Rev. W. Blake Atkinson. (Jarrold & Sons.) Here is verse on various subjects, the outcome of leisure moments in an active life. Many of the poems have been composed in seasons of trial, and these are as stimulating as some of the lighter items are animated and cheering.

Three delightfully coloured and illustrated books for the tiny folk are Happy Times (1s.) and Sunny Days (1s.), both collections of short and interesting stories with capital pictures; while Animals: Wild and Tame, has fourteen large coloured plates, illustrating animal life. All of these will charm the youngsters. (S. W. Partridge & Co.)

The Rest of God. By Rev. John Brownlie. (1s. Nisbet.) Another volume of poetry by the Free Church minister of Portpatrick. The pages unfold a vision of future glory such as faith in God has inspired in many a soul: but it requires a born poet to describe it, and to celebrate, in such verse as fills this little book, the praise of Him who giveth his people eternal rest.

Chums. The first yearly volume contains serial stories by G. A. Henty, Max Pemberton, Barry Pain, D. H. Parry, A. J. Daniels, and E. E. Green; over a hundred short stories by the best writers for boys, interviews with famous cricketers and athletes, and scores of interesting, general, technical, and natural history articles. The volume is profusely illustrated. (7s. 6d. Cassell & Co.)

Step by Step Through the Bible: A Scripture History for Little Children. By Edith Ralph. Part II. (2s. 6d. Nisbet.) This illustrated volume carries on the Old Testament story from the time of the Judges to Israel's return from the Babylonish captivity. The style is clear and simple, and the author has had the benefit of Dr. Cunningham Geikie's advice throughout.

The Biblical Illustrator series, edited by Rev. J. S. Exell, M.A., has received two more substantial additions: Hebrews, Vol. II.; and The Acts, Vol. I. The former deals with chap. ix. to the end of the Epistle; and the latter the first eight chapters of the "Treatise." Each volume contains about 700 full pages, of sermons and outlines, illustrations and expositions, gathered from a wide range of literature. Busy preachers and teachers cannot but find the "Illustrator" of great value. (7s. 6d. Nisbet & Co.)

The Children's Pew. By Rev. J. Reid Howatt. (Nisbet. 6s.) Many who love little ones must now have learned to look for this author's annual volume of sermonettes and talks with the children. Nor will they be disappointed this season, for here it is once more, as brief and bright, simple and sensible as ever. Happily many preachers are now in the habit of giving the children a ten minutes' talk each Lord's Day. Would that all who so wisely seek to interest the young folk would follow models such as these provided by Mr. Howatt.

The Sunday-school Teacher's Bible Manual, with illustrations and coloured maps, in course of issue by Messrs. Cassell, in sixpenny monthly parts, will prove of real utility to a large class of Bible students. In matters relating to discovery and research, it is emphatically "up to date," for in part 7, just published, under the word "John" there is a reference to Mrs. Lewis's discovery last winter of a Syriac MS. of the Gospels in the Sinai Peninsula, and mention of the discussion on the apocryphal Gospel of Peter down to midsummer! The entire work is to be completed in about twelve parts.

The annual volumes of the Boy's Own Paper and the Girl's Own Paper are among the most attractive books of their kind. Coloured and wood engravings brighten the large and varied body of reading matter; and as the seasons come and go the Annuals increase in popularity. There are many stories, serial and brief, and sketches and articles in profusion. If the "Girl's Own" addresses itself to the young, it is not without charms for females of riper years; and many an "old boy" is interested and instructed by a perusal of the "Boy's Own." The volumes are admirably suited for presentation at the Christmas season. (8s. each. Religious Tract Society.)

Nineteen Beautiful Years, by Frances E. Willard, has been re-issued in an attractive form by the White Ribbon Publishing Co., Memorial Hall, Farringdon-street. It is the story of Mary E. Willard, and is justly styled, in a prefatory note by the poet Whittier, "a very sweet and tender record of the exceptionally beautiful life of a young woman, whose rare natural gifts and graces were sanctified by a deep but cheerful and healthful religious experience." There is a hearty introduction by Lady Henry Somerset, and we trust that with the impetus of these commendations it will secure many fresh readers, and continue to inspire to beauty of life and nobility of purpose.

More About Names. By Leopold Wagner. (7s. 6d. T. Fisher Unwin.) This is a sequel to the author's "Names: and Their Meaning." The subject has many attractions for observant students of the history of civilisation and the science of language. This volume contains chapters on the nicknames of American states and people, things theatrical, titles of honour, articles of attire, education, trees and plants, pet names of American cities, the army, and many other subjects. Though the treatment is not so full and precise as to satisfy the demands of those who have made a special study of nomenclature or comparative philology, the pages will greatly interest and instruct general readers.

Princeton Sermons. Chiefly by the Professors in Princeton Theological Seminary. 5s. (Oliphant, Anderson, & Ferrier.) These sixteen discourses, addressed to Divinity students, represent a year's preaching in a seminary chapel. The volume contains two sermons by each of the following:—Drs. W. H. Green, W. M. Paxton, B. B. Warfield, J. H. Davis, F. L. Patton, J. O. Murray, C. W. Hodge, and C. A. Aiken—the last two having since finished their course on earth. The teaching is sound, and a noble purpose runs through the whole, from Dr. Green's exposition of John xvii. 24, "Christ's Desire for His People," to Dr. Davis's treatment of Isaiah vi. 5-7, "The Vision of the King in His Holiness."

The People's Bible, Vol. XXI., by Joseph Parker, D.D. (Hodder & Stoughton. 8s.) The Gospel of John has now been reached in this unique and valuable work. The present volume is complete in itself as an original and deep-sighted exposition of this profound narrative of the Son of God. We are reminded of the closing words of the evangelist. It would scarcely be extravagant to suppose that the world itself could not contain the books that might be written on the Fourth Gospel as it stands. These chapters of Dr. Parker's are as fresh as if no one had ever written on the Gospel by John. And they suggest thoughts and ask questions sufficient to afford material for a hundred other volumes. It is a very entertaining book. The wind blows from every point of the compass in turn. Thought and imagination, reverence and raciness, seriousness and satire, humour and pathos, characterise the treatment of his varied subject. There is a study of Judas Iscariot, in which the traitor is not indeed justified or pronounced saved, but every alleviating consideration is suggested, and all through the reader is made to turn the scrutiny in upon himself. And the "study of character" arrives at this conclusion: "Not the crafty Judas, but the loving John, will help us best in all our work." This volume abounds with aphorisms severely simple yet profoundly true. "The great must always be a mystery to the little; the arch must always be a mystery to the column; God must always be a mystery to his creatures. If we could comprehend all, we should be all. Only the whole can comprehend the whole; only God can understand God." Preachers and teachers will find here a treasury of rich thought and spiritual stimulus.

Justification by Faith is helpfully expounded in a booklet by C. F. Kingsbury. (2d. Kettering: Northamptonshire Printing & Publishing Co.)

Two little books of sterling merit for young believers are: Counsel and Cheer and Helps and Hindrances, both by John Ritchie. (3d. Kilmarnock: "The Young Watchman" Office.)

Miss Rose Benn has written a striking and helpful booklet, Backsliding: What is it? Where is it? Why is it? and Restoration. (1d. each, 5s. per hundred. George Reynolds, 23, Stepney Green, E.)

The Narrative of the Early Life and Conversion of Rev. James Adler is a deeply interesting booklet, edited by Mrs. Wilkinson. (2d. Mildmay Mission to the Jews Book Store, Central Hall, Philpot-street, E.)

Among recent publications from Drummond's Tract Depôt, Stirling, are Gospel Leaves, by Cheyne Brady. (6d. packets of 100); and two series of Bells of Blessing tracts, by William Luff. (Packets of 50, 6d.) These are all illustrated, and well suited for widespread distribution.

BOOKS RECEIVED.

From T. Fisher Unwin:—The Australian Commonwealth (Story of the Nations series), by Greville Tregarthen, 5s.

From Hodder & Stoughton:—A Mackay Ruthquist; or, Singing the Gospel among Hindus and Gonds. By the author of "A. M. Mackay, Pioneer Missionary to Uganda." 6s.

From J. Nisbet & Co.:—Well Begun, notes for those who have to make their way in the world, by Joseph Parker, D.D., 5s.

Personalia.

The Archbishop of Armagh celebrated last week his eighty-fifth birthday.

Rev. Evan H. Hopkins has resumed his duties at St. Luke's, Redcliffe Square, South Kensington.

Rev. E. P. Hammond hopes, after visiting Chicago and the World's Fair, to hold meetings in St. Louis this month.

Dr. Griffith John.—A letter from Hankow, dated August 7, states: "Dr. Griffith John was very ill last week, but is now better."

Dr. Amory Bradford sailed on Wednesday week for New York. His closing services in London were of a remarkable character, and especially in the farewell meeting held in the City Temple.

Mr. Thomas Newberry, of Weston-super-Mare, is about to visit Blackburn, to lecture on the Temple of Solomon, and the Millennial Temple, illustrated by a model. The meetings will be held on the evenings of October 9 and 10, in the large hall of the Exchange.

Miss Eleanor Stredder has received from the Chinese Ambassador a memorandum stating that he is instructed to thank her, on behalf of the Minister he represents, for her accurate description of the effects of opium in China, contained in "Aluteh: A Story of the Chinese Hills." (Stoneman.)

Rev. George Grenfell, who in the exigencies of the position had to place, temporarily, his experience and abilities at the service of the Congo Free State, and who has for some time acted as Frontier Plenipotentiary, has, at length, to his own great joy, been enabled to return to his loved work as a simple missionary.

Mr. A. S. Lamb, late of the North Africa Mission at Akbou, Algeria, having returned to England to labour as an evangelist, desires to thank the friends who have so kindly sent him copies of The Christian, and requests that these be now discontinued. His present address is care of Mr. Sinclair, Scotstounhill, Glasgow.

Rev. James Neil, M.A., whose delineations of Palestine life have for some years been widely known and highly appreciated, opens, on Monday next, a course of demonstrations, extending over five days, in the Bickersteth Memorial Hall, Hampstead. Two lectures will be given daily, and a grand diorama of paintings will add beauty and reality to them.

Pastor Archibald G. Brown concluded a recent sermon at the East London Tabernacle by telling how the previous week he had just been to see another of his daughters start for the China mission field. On his return home, feeling weary and tired, he found waiting at his residence in the Bow-road an old lady, utterly unknown to him. Without any ceremony she opened her little handbag, and produced five cheques for £100 each, which she handed to Mr. Brown, with the remark that "The Lord told me I must give you this money."

Rev. Dr. Bullinger's connection with Brunswick Chapel, Upper Berkeley-street, W., is about to terminate. In a circular letter to the congregation, he says:—"When I was appointed in April, 1891, I understood that the lease had then only two or three years to run; but we have indulged the hope that when it expired some arrangement might be made which would prevent the breaking up of the congregation which has been gathered together. On inquiry, however, we now learn, for the first time, that even before my connection with Brunswick Chapel, arrangements had already been completed for handing it over to the Church Army on the expiration of the lease at Christmas next. Neither my predecessor, nor the trustees, knew anything of such arrangements at the time of my appointment. I am not claiming that we ought to have been so informed, but none the less heavy is the news which comes as a serious blow to myself, and, I have reason to believe, as a grief to many."

Notes and Comments.

NEXT week we purpose giving portrait and sketch of Mr. John Currie, American Evangelist.

The prolongation of the "coal war" in England is disastrous in every respect. All parties to the strife are suffering heavily, most of all the innocent families of the miners. It seems difficult for an outsider to apportion the responsibility. Some of the coalowners blame the railway companies, whose increased rates have cut down their profits. The miners blame the colliery proprietors, who, they allege, have contracted at ruinously low prices with large consumers, and are now seeking to recoup themselves by a sweeping reduction of the men's wages. The truth is probably to be discovered somewhere between these and other conflicting statements. The ultimate cause may be found in the severe competition that characterises all our modern industries.

Meantime the women and children of the miners are left without the means to purchase daily bread, and vast numbers of them are brought to the very verge of starvation. If humane friends had not stepped in with timely help there must ere this time have been a holocaust of victims. The Daily Chronicle and The Sun have done admirable service by the reports of their special commissioners, and by a distribution of the funds contributed by their readers. We trust many of our readers will lend a ready hand in this Samaritan work of feeding the hungry women and children.

These constantly recurring conflicts between large employers and the toiling masses seem to strengthen the demand for instituting an independent and compulsory court of arbitration which shall take all the complicated circumstances into account, and judge justly between the contending parties. It is a blot on our common civilisation, not to speak of our professed Christianity, that we cannot devise a righteous and speedy method of settling such disputes, without the horrors and suffering that attend a prolonged strike or lock-out.

It is very remarkable that the women, who with their children suffer so severely, are, in many cases, more enthusiastic than the men in their determination to suffer rather than yield. Surely there must be some deep sense of wrong which leads to this. Is it an illustration of the old adage, written in the nature of things, that a trodden worm will turn? The law of supply and demand is not an infallible answer to the cry of the oppressed. The Apostle James appealed to a higher law when he declared that the hire of the labourers was kept back by fraud; and the cries of the labourers have entered into the ears of the Lord of hosts. The beneficent law of Moses continually interfered with the actings of human selfishness, which are nowadays denominated "laws."

We have given elsewhere a digest of Rev. Hubert Brooke's speech at the Baptist Missionary Conference during the meetings at Reading. The signs of approval with which it was received proved how its practical and suggestive points were appreciated. We have long advocated in these columns the importance of bringing missionaries and churches into closer contact. This was one of the important suggestions of Mr. Brooke's address. We trust the authorities of all the missionary societies will take up the suggestion. The gifts from church members will be largely increased when they are taught to recognise that some individual missionaries are dependent upon their gifts. It is not enough that no barrier should be put in the way of a church desiring to do this; but facilities ought to be provided, and churches ought to be challenged to undertake the support of individual missionaries. This is the way in which congregations, as Mr. Brooke called them—churches, as our Nonconformist friend would describe them—could discharge their responsibility.

The principle underlying Mr. Brooke's practical suggestion that 120 persons should give one penny per day each, is that which underlies Mr. Wainwright's Prayer Union scheme. And it will be seen from the report of the quarterly meeting in connection with that organisation on page 25 of this issue, that the church of which Mr. Wainwright is pastor can now answer the question, "Who is your representative missionary?" Mr. Hale, who is going out to work in Agra, will be supported entirely by the daily gifts of the members of the Missionary Prayer Union. The fact most deserving emphasis is this: it is not by the few large gifts of a few wealthy persons, but by the large number of small daily gifts, that this is being accomplished. Young people, whose gifts to the missionary cause did not amount to more than about one shilling a year, which was put into the annual collection, are now, by giving a halfpenny per day, annual contributors of at least 15s. Cannot this example be followed by other churches? The debt which now hampers the work of all missionary societies can be met by such a scheme as this.

Rev. E. W. Cantrell made some wise suggestions at the Baptist Union on the subject of the "Claims of Rural Churches." Especially was it to the point when he said that it should be possible, instead of grouping several churches of the same denomination in different villages under one pastor, to group several churches of different denominations in the same village under one pastor. It was far more important to make men Christians than to attach them to any particular denomination of Christians. The spirit and the life were more than creeds and ordinances. . . . At Benson, in Oxfordshire, we believe we are right in saying, this highest plan of all has been successfully carried out, Nonconformists of almost all kinds being united in church fellowship, and some Episcopalians linked with them. Instead of several small competing places hardly able to live, the united fellowship is numerous and effective.

Mr. Tom Mann, lecturing on Sunday night, on "The Religious Hypocrisy of the Churches," is reported to have said that "They taught 'self'; and 'self' was the cancer which was eating out the very vitals of the Empire. He recognised in the churches the means of the regeneration of the present social system, but the welfare of the community must be taught where the welfare of self was now the cardinal principle."

Doubtless Mr. Mann was right in saying that self is the cancer that is eating out the vitals of the Empire—he might have substituted a far more extensive word for empire. But is his remedy large enough? The Fall consisted in transferring the worship of God to self. The remedy, therefore, must be not to make the welfare of the community our cardinal principle, but the glory of God, from whom, at the instigation of the devil, man revolted. The Saviour, the Redeemer, said, before his incarnation, "Lo! I come to do thy will, O God." And when he was about to die, He declared, "I have glorified Thee on earth; I have finished the work which Thou gavest Me to do."

One of the popular errors of the day is that to seek the welfare of the community is to worship God—that to fulfil the second table of the Law is to obey the first. This is a reversal of the order which Jesus adopted and taught. He sought the glory of Him who sent Him, and thus proved that He was true, and no unrighteousness in Him. Doing the will of God, He went about doing good, for God was with Him. Fulfilling the first table of the Law, He fulfilled the second.

"The Spiritual Needs of To-day" was the subject of Principal Cave's primary Merchants' Lecture last week. Maintaining that to the thinking mind one of two conclusions is inevitable — Christianity or Pessimism — he showed how terrible is life when without hope, how awful death without immortality, how gloomy eternity without Christ. His message was a good one:—

"Man's extremity is God's opportunity. The night is almost through, we shall soon hail the advent of the morning star. The fruit of centuries is ripe and ready to fall at the feet of Christ." While men and women are hungering, the Secularist offers a stone, the Socialist a house, and the Ritualist a dress. But the time is late; it will soon be the hour of the Son of Man. How great the need, then, that every Christian should see to it that he has a real Gospel message, should show that his Christ was a Rest for the weary, the Hope of the sad, and the Light of the dreary.

In proportion as Christians realise that the Saviour is the great Satisfier, so will they be sympathetic in regard to human need, and enthusiastic in the service of God.

An advance proof of the Sentinel for November contains one of the most serious charges against certain officials in India that could be brought against any body of public men. It reports that Mr. Madden, superintendent of the Seamen's Rest, Bombay, went to Calcutta to try and discover a gang of traffickers in maidenhood; when hunted down they affirmed that they paid the police for the privilege of carrying on their business; that they were on intimate terms with superior European police officers; and that certain persons high in authority were among their customers. "Some of these statements Mr. Madden corroborated by observation." Five persons who agreed to sell a child ten or eleven years of age to Mr. Madden for fifty rupees, were charged with the offence, and three of them were committed to the Criminal Sessions at Calcutta.

After trial, Mr. "Justice" Pigot has released them on the ground that "the commission of one immoral act is not contemplated under this section," viz. 372 of the Indian Penal Code, which says that "Whoever sells, lets to hire, or otherwise disposes of any minor under the age of sixteen with intent, etc., or for any unlawful or immoral purpose, etc." If such a case as this does not come under these words then the words are meaningless. But this legal authority will find himself mistaken. The English public will not permit the sale of little girls for one immoral act any more than for a hundred. "Justice" Pigot may prepare to have his judgment revised, and all the "great Sahibs" who ruin little girls and pervert justice may prepare for exposure.

The Departmental Committee which was appointed in April to examine witnesses on the subject of legalisation of vice in India has just issued its report, and the evidence on which the report is based. Its findings abundantly justify all that was said by Mr. Dyer, Mr. M. Gregory, and the American ladies, of the abominable and illegal practices which have been going on for years. On not one point have the opponents of legalised vice failed to make good their case. Lord Roberts made a very sorry appearance as a witness; for, after his confident declarations to a representative of The Christian Commonwealth that the system was abolished, he confesses on point after point that he did not know what was going on. The infamous Circular Memorandum of June 17, 1886, which was issued in his name and in that of Major-General Chapman, he says he has no knowledge of; but Major-General (now Lieutenant-General) Chapman says that it was issued "after it had been fully approved by His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief."

We came the other day upon a few sentences in a book, now out of print, which bear very closely upon the theories which are now disturbing so many in the Churches:—

> The true and only foundation of confidence in Christ is the record which is given in the Scriptures of his life and character, of his relations to God and his relations to humanity, and the motive to confidence, and to a personal appropriating faith, is the desire of the soul for just such a Saviour and such a salvation—its deep and everlasting wants, which only such a Saviour can relieve. It is certainly true that the faith inspired by the general revelation is infinitely vivified by the personal. But still, the general revelation is the foundation; and it is only by suspending the whole weight of the soul's cares, desires, and hopes on that revelation, and in proportion as we do so, that we can reach anything special or personal.

Now, some tell us that we believe in Christ because we know He is in us; but how are we to persuade and win to faith in Christ those in whom He is not? Experience immeasurably aids faith, but cannot precede it. Faith comes from the Word of God, and experience is the confirmation of the Word, and thus the confirmation of faith.

President Andrews, Brown University, America, is of opinion that our Saviour's teaching in Matt. xxv. 27 is full of interest from an economic point of view. He thinks that we have a right to infer, from Christ's way of framing this parable of the talents, that He approves, as morally just, the habit of receiving interest on loaned funds. From this President Andrews launches into a defence of great fortunes. Now almost anyone would say that our Lord meant neither directly nor indirectly to give any deliverance on economic questions, but merely to employ the things of everyday as illustrations of heavenly things. Does Paul recommend the converts to struggle in the Isthmian games because he uses the games as an illustration of the earnestness with which they ought to contend for heavenly things?

When we also get a defence of wealth, it is time to ask, what was the positive teaching of our Lord with regard to riches and rich men? He makes the salvation of a rich man a very hard thing, harder than that of a poor man, not impossible but hard. Once the rich man is in the Kingdom, he must obey the laws of the Kingdom, and they will soon deal rightly with his treasures, and will not let him live and die a millionaire. To those who are in the Kingdom, or who would be in it, Jesus says: "Lay not up for yourselves treasures on earth." John Woolman, one of the truest disciples of Jesus who ever lived, abandoned all prospects of making more money than his modest needs required, because he "believed truth required him to live more free from outward cumbers; the Lord graciously heard his prayers, and gave him a heart resigned to his holy will." In Woolman's case diminution of means became increase of pure influence, the influence which has no taint of earthliness in it, and which becomes stronger with lapse of time.

The Thinker speaks in high terms of a dissertation by Dr. Julius Ley, of Marburg, "On the Significance of the Expression, 'The Servant of God,' in Isaiah xl. to liii.," which is incorporated with his "Historical Explanation of the Second Part of Isaiah, according to the Results of the Cuneiform Inscriptions." Dr. Ley thinks that the "Servant of God" can be no other than the Messiah. After criticising the several theories which have been elaborated for the purpose of removing Christ from the passage, and showing their improbability and insufficiency, he affirms on the positive side of the old, but long unfashionable, view, that the Messianic interpretation is probable.

> It has in its favour the evidence of Israelitish history, which shows that it was God's invariable practice to raise up one hero or prophet in times of need. Again, scarcely any exegete has denied that these prophecies produce on the mind of the unprejudiced reader the impression of a single personality.

Professor Prestwich writes, in The Nineteenth Century, an article on "The Position of Geology," which may well quiet the fears of such as are alarmed by the wild statements often made with regard to the antiquity of man and the antiquity of the earth. He sets forth the conflict there is between the Uniformitarians and the Physicists; the former believe that the vast changes on the earth's surface, effected during long geological periods, "are to be measured by the rate at which similar but minor changes are effected in the present day, and that the agencies now modifying the surface have been alike in every respect, in all time." The Physicists believe the great movements, considered by geologists to have continued up to the threshold of our own times, impossible.

Whereas the Uniformitarians count some three hundred millions as the term of years since our earth became habitable, the Physicists assign from fifteen to twenty millions. Professor Prestwich thinks the shorter period the more probable. Although the Physicists affirm and prove that uniformity of action in all time on the earth's condition is impossible, the Uniformitarian hypothesis, "put with the claim of an infallible faith," has become dominant. Some of them, dealing liberally with time, have supposed that man has been one or even two millions of years on the earth: and many other such hypotheses prevail in geology which have been over and over again shown to be groundless. Freedom of inquiry demands some giving up of pretensions and theories on either side.

A Suggestion.

By a Catholic Protestant.

FOR A DECLARATION OF FAITH AND PRACTICE BY THE EVANGELICAL EPISCOPAL CHURCH OF ENGLAND.

The question, "What is the Church?" is answered promptly, distinctly, peremptorily, by Ritualistic Sacerdotalism. But those who adhere to Evangelical truth in the Church of England have no such recognised standards. The Bible is their authority for Evangelical doctrine, but they are in difficulty when asked for some such authoritative and recognised definition and defence of their Church as is boasted of by the sacerdotal party.

But surely such a defence is possible, exists in individual minds, and only needs concurrent agreement and utterance. Let there be a conference of thoughtful and godly Evangelical men to draw up a declaration of doctrine and of church polity, based on Scriptural principles, and supported by the usages of the early Church, the principles of the Reformation, the teaching of godly writers in the Church of England, the true meaning of the Articles, and the spirit of the Liturgy.

Let it be clearly shown that the Church is not sacerdotal nor sectarian, while recognising its own church order, at the same time teaching the privileges and duties of the laity, all believers constituting the Body of Christ.

Let such a declaration be published, signed by at least some of the Bishops and other dignitaries; and also by the large number of Churchmen who would not shrink from a united testimony that the Church of England in its fundamental principles, the intention of its founders, its articles, and worship, is Evangelical, Protestant, and Catholic.

At present some of its members are being perverted by the positive claims of High Churchism, in the absence of any similarly authoritative claim on the other side. Thus many are either becoming sacerdotalists, and on their way to Rome; or are forced to leave the Church they love. Is it not possible to preserve the Church by maintaining its true character, and bringing it into loving fraternity with all who love the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity?

CENTRAL SOUDAN MISSION.—Mr. Hermann G. Harris, B.A., the director of this Mission, who is at present in England, hopes to return to Tripoli next month with a view to reaching the Soudan to prosecute the work of preaching the Gospel among its sixty millions of unevangelised heathen. Six new volunteers have come forward to join the Mission and hope to go out with Mr. Harris in a few weeks' time. Up to the present, however, they have not received the funds necessary for their outfits and passages. Mr. Harris estimates that from £50 to £60 a year will support a missionary on the borders of the Sahara.

The Rescued Nun.

The Roman Catholics of Bournemouth held a meeting on Wednesday evening of last week for the double object of "rectifying the statements made by Miss Ellen Golding," the Rescued Nun, and of defending convent life from the charges which are made against it. The meeting differed from that at which Miss Golding's charges were made, in that no opportunity was given for reply. No resolution was submitted, so no amendment could be proposed. The National Anthem was announced as soon as the speakers on the platform had stated their case; and though Rev. George Wainwright addressed the Chairman, and sought an opportunity to speak, he was either not heard or not heeded: The fact that the Mayor of Bournemouth presided, and that he was supported by a considerable number of titled ladies and gentlemen, may have led the unwary and the uninstructed to believe that the promoters of the meeting had achieved their double purpose.

Against the charges of Miss Golding, official documents had been printed, and were supplied to all the audience, containing an apparently conclusive refutation of the specific charge of poisoning, which Miss Golding alleged to have been of frequent occurrence. On one side or the other there must be deliberate and intentional falsehood; is it with Miss Golding? or, is it with those by whom these solemn denials are made? To one of these alternatives we are shut up. Which must we accept? If we should suppose Miss Golding to have lied, and to have made these fearful charges without having any foundation for them, then the following questions arise: (1) Where did she acquire such proficiency in the art of lying? She entered the convent when a girl in her teens, hoping that there she would discover the way of holiness; and if after twenty-five years of convent life she comes out to invent stories of immorality and murder against those with whom she lived, that itself is a very doubtful testimony to the influence of the convent system. And (2), what advantage had she to gain by her falsehoods? If she boldly alleges that which she knows can be denied and disproved, and exposes herself to an action at law which may result in very severe punishment, what is her motive? Can it be mere spite against her former co-religionists? or the slight popularity which her public meetings give her? or any financial gain which her lecturing secures? None of these, nor all of them combined, are sufficient to explain her falsehoods, if such they be. It is not impossible that twenty-five years of convent life might impart the art of lying; but it is difficult to see why she should thus practise it.

On the other hand, suppose the falsehood lies with those on whose authority these denials are made. The supposition is not an impossible one, for the investigation has been made by Roman Catholics for Roman Catholic purposes. No one who has considered the subject can doubt that the results of such an investigation have to be received with some hesitation. For (1) there is every motive for falsehood. Suppose Miss Golding's charges are true, what could be looked for from those against whom she makes them but spontaneous and persistent denial? And (2), in the book written expressly for nuns by Saint Alphonsus Liguori, there is an injunction which makes it difficult to believe statements made by nuns, or by their superior, in defence of their order. "Be careful," says this Saint, "not to make known to externs the internal concerns of the convent, and particularly what might tend to the discredit of the superior or the sisters." And (3), there have been cases in the past where the inmates of convents have denied charges made against them, although the charges were true. Here is one instance given by Ambrosio de Traversari, a Camaldolese monk, and ultimately (in 1440) made General of his order. He wrote an account of his visits to the monasteries in Tuscany, with a view to their reformation. Serious charges had been alleged against a nunnery—De Querceto—and, with the Abbot of Volterra as a companion, he visited the nunnery. He says, "I called together all the women, and in the presence of the Abbot I addressed them. When I found that openly, and with hardened countenance, they denied the truth, I dismissed all but the youngest. But I found that from her also I could not elicit the truth, neither by threats nor by hope held out of leniency and forgiveness. The Abbess was then called in alone, and she, thinking that the younger nun had betrayed them, was obliged to confess her own shame and that of the monastery." This is only one of many instances, and is useful as showing that serious charges were met with vigorous denial, and the truth was confessed only when falsehood was deemed of no further use. If convents have been defended by such falsehoods in the past, who can be satisfied with mere denials now?

The alternative is before us, on which side is the falsehood? If with Miss Golding, let an action be entered against her, and let her be punished as she deserves. The cause of truth cannot be advanced by falsehood. But we must have better authority than the mere statements of those she has accused before we condemn her.

But it is needful to remind ourselves that the case against convents does not stand or fall with Miss Golding. Witnesses to the evils of the convent system are legion, and are to be found in every century since Paganism corrupted the Church. Out of the mouth of Roman Catholics themselves the convent system has been abundantly condemned.

An attempt was made on Wednesday night to prove that the convent is not a "prison-house." A Romish priest from Boscombe ridiculed the idea, and affirmed that it was difficult to get into a convent and very easy to get out, and that no restraint, either physical or moral, was put upon the nuns. Such language differs very widely from that of Liguori in the book referred to above. One section is headed thus:—"What ought a person to do who finds that she has become a nun against her inclination?" The priest who spoke on Wednesday night would be expected to say to such a nun, "Leave the convent as soon as you please. The door is open. No force, either moral or physical, will be used to detain you. Exit is easy." Liguori does not answer so. His answer is intended not for a public platform in a Protestant country, but for the nuns themselves; does this explain the difference? "Grant what you say is true," says Liguori, "now that you are professed in a convent, and that it is impossible for you to leave it, tell me what do you wish to do? If you have entered religion [i.e. become a nun] against your inclination, you must now remain with cheerfulness. If you abandon yourself to melancholy, you must lead a life of misery, and will expose yourself to great danger of suffering a hell here and another hereafter. You must, then, make a virtue of necessity."

Put these two statements in contrast:—The priest says, "It is difficult to get in, but easy to get out." The Saint says to one who is in against her inclination, "you must make a virtue of necessity, for it is impossible for you to leave." There is again falsehood somewhere. Is it with the speaker on Wednesday evening? or with St. Alphonsus Liguori? If with the former, what value can be placed upon any other statements made from the same platform? If with the latter, why should lying be resorted to for the education of the nuns?

A further quotation from Liguori, dealing with the same subject, may show what he means by suffering a hell here. We suggest that the following quotation be read carefully and repeatedly, for no one can see by once reading what awful meaning lies beneath the words, "I have been accustomed to say," Liguori tells the nuns, "that 'a religious' in her convent enjoys a foretaste of paradise, or suffers an anticipation of hell. To endure the pains of hell is to be separated from God, to be forced against the inclinations of nature to do the will of others (!); to be distrusted, despised, reproved, and chastised, by those with whom we live; to be shut up in a place of confinement, from which it is impossible to escape; in a word, it is to be in continual torture without a moment's peace." (Our italics.)

To read this description of hell on earth makes one shudder, but it is awful to reflect that it is what every unwilling nun is suffering here, with the terrible prospect of another, and, possibly, a worse hell hereafter. The murders alleged by Miss Golding are not so horrible as this. Any person or any system that would deliberately subject human beings to such a living death is ungodly and inhuman.

Roman Catholics must not complain if their assertions, made on platforms in this not as yet altogether unprotestantised country, are tested by an appeal to their own writers. History cannot be unwritten, and by its testimony through a thousand years the convent system stands condemned as a crime against humanity and God.

THE JEWS.

"Ye that are the Lord's remembrancers keep not silence, and give Him no rest, till He establish and till He make Jerusalem a praise in the earth."—Isaiah lxii. 6-7.

"The weary foot, and wandering breast."
"The scattered" ones, "the peeled,"
They roam this earth full sore opprest,
Their bleeding wounds unhealed.
Yet Israel, Lord, is dear to Thee,
And Israel shall be dear to me.

Jerusalem, the city fair,
A queen in olden days,
Still wears a piteous, pensive air,
And is not yet "a praise."
But, lo! her land is dear to Thee,
And so it shall be dear to me.

O, Lord, subdue the unbelief,
Remove the blinding veil,
And bid the waiting time be brief,
Ere all Messiah hail.
Their gathering in is dear to Thee,
And therefore it is dear to me.

On Olivet thy blessed feet,
Again shall surely stand,
And every wandering tribe shall meet,
Rejoicing in their land.
Yea, Israel's weal is dear to Thee,
And therefore it is dear to me.

O, Judah's Lion, rise in strength,
And bid them cease to roam,
Convert, restore, and build at length,
The old ancestral home.
Thy chosen ones so dear to Thee
Their true Messiah yet shall see.

The Clifton Conference.

Amongst the many conferences of these days the annual gathering at the Victoria Rooms, Clifton, preserves a certain uniqueness of character. The late Rev. S. Walker ever sought to make it a rallying point for those who seek to "hold fast the form of sound words," and this special feature his successor, Rev. James Ormiston, has been careful to maintain. Thus the testimony borne at Clifton has usually turned upon the fundamentals of our faith. Nor has it been less so this year. In his letter of invitation Mr. Ormiston emphasised the necessity for clear exposition of the truth concerning the Gospel, in view of "the corruptions of Rome and the cold philosophy of a miscalled Rationalism, which have perverted multitudes." To raise a voice against these evils of the day was specified as the purpose of the Conference, and the addresses have been marked by clear and definite teaching on the great themes proposed for consideration. The Conference was held on Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday in last week, and was largely attended throughout. It may be noted that loving and sorrowful reference was made more than once during the meetings to the loss the Church has suffered in the death of Sir Arthur Blackwood.

THE GOSPEL OF THE GRACE OF GOD.

On Tuesday morning Rev. James Ormiston, wh presided, said: Before we proceed to worship, I wish to say how much I shall need your kind indulgence throughout the proceedings. I believe that, in answer to your fervent prayers, a measure of recovery has been vouchsafed to me. I am sorry that several whom we expected are unable to attend; but I have many loving brethren around me who have very kindly offered me all the help in their power. I did feel a longing to be able to take part in the Conference at the outset, with the one desire that God may be glorified, and my longing has been graciously met.

After prayer by Rev. Talbot Greaves, and the reading of part of Luke x. by Colonel Saville, Mr. Ormiston announced that "The Glorious Gospel of the Blessed God" was the subject of the Conference, while "Grace" was the key-note for the day.

Rev. Nevile Sherbrooke, Vicar of Clifton, opened the topic—"The Gospel of the Grace of God." The very number of the Conference, he said, the thirty-first, was solemnising, and introduced an element of sadness into their first meeting; for they could not fail to remember the beloved brethren who had inaugurated it and many who had since departed. I am sure, he said, that as life goes on our ideas of the grace of God, which saves and preserves, lead us to cry—

> Let that grace, Lord, like a fetter
> Bind my wandering heart to Thee.

He referred to four aspects of grace presented in Rom. v.: Divine grace, welcoming grace, abounding grace, and reigning grace. He enlarged upon these, referring especially to the wonderful position of believers; the grace wherein they stand suggests the marvellous fulness of the grace of God. He had met a brother recently who had passed through great financial trials, but to see his face as he told of them, and to hear him tell what the Lord had done for him, made one involuntarily think of "grace abounding." "I remember," he said, "years ago when I was brought to Christ, saying to myself, It is all very beautiful now, but how about the future? And the thought of 'reigning grace' was a great comfort to my soul."

Rev. H. Dening was the next speaker. Regarding the Grace of God as a fruitful tree, he said it would be possible for all to gather some fruit from it to take home with them. He directed attention to its past results—the millions who had been saved by it; its present blessings—never had it been so widely proclaimed by godly men and women who have gone forth to the uttermost parts of the earth; and its future victories—they looked forward to greater things than had yet been seen. He desired specially to impress upon all hearts the attractive power of the cross. When Ulysses returned from the Trojan war he was so altered that the people did not know him. But there was one who knew him, his old nurse, who remembered a scar that he bore. "By that scar, I know that thou art Ulysses!" was her exclamation. And so, by the scars, the wounded hands and feet and side, we can cry, "We know Thee, who Thou art, Thou art Jesus."

Rev. J. J. B. Coles said that the subject ought to be very fresh and real to their hearts. They had to believe that Christ died for them, and they, too, had to die in Him, and then to "wait for Him from heaven." A little while ago he heard a servant of God preaching from the text, "This is a faithful saying," and his remark afterwards was "I trust hearts were touched." Yes, but sometimes people will listen to the Gospel from one point of view; they will believe the faithful saying, but forget that there is another, "If we die with Him we shall also live with Him." The grace of the Gospel is attractive, but sometimes its other teaching does not attract the natural mind. Grace having appeared, teaches us to live soberly and righteously, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, but this self-restraint and denial is by no means welcome to the carnal heart. Hence the grace of God must begin by changing the heart, renewing the will, creating new desires and new aims; then and then only does the grace of God find a glad and willing response in those who by faith have been brought into the kingdom of grace.

The afternoon Bible reading conducted by Col. Molesworth was devoted to further consideration of the teaching of the Word concerning the Gospel of the grace of God.

The evening meeting assumed very largely an evangelistic character; and rightly so, for many young people and others, engaged in business during the day, were present, and probably not a few of these stood in need of the clear and faithful words so wisely spoken by Revs. D. H. Sparling, A. A. Isaacs, R. J. Noyes, and W. Fuller Gooch. The latter presented very happily a sevenfold view of the Gospel as revealed by the Lord Jesus Christ in his incarnation, his perfect obedience, his atonement, his resurrection, his ascension, his intercession, and his coming again.

THE GOSPEL OF SALVATION.

This aspect of the glorious Gospel was specially considered on the second day of the Conference. Rev. G. A. P. Arbuthnot, the first speaker, starting from Eph. i. 13, called earnest attention to the charter on which our salvation is based—the Word of truth. Illustrating the uncertainty of those who build on any other foundation, he told of one who had long been a constant hearer of his own (although a prominent official in a ritualistic association), and who frequently found fault with his (the speaker's) preaching, declaring it might be according to Scripture, but was contrary to the Book of Common Prayer. Again and again Mr. Arbuthnot warned his critic that he was on an insecure foundation. At length a hasty message reached the rectory from this gentleman. Hurrying to see him, the rector found him dying. "I am," said the sick man, "a doctor, and I know I have but a few days to live; and just as you told me I find my Ritualism crumbling under my feet; I have no hope and nothing to stand upon." Happily the Gospel was so presented to him that ere passing away he entered into peace. The speaker proceeded to deal with the threefold aspect of salvation—past, present, and future. Past in the purpose of God from all eternity, and in the completed work of Christ; present in being wrought out by God in our lives; and future, as yet to be revealed at the adoption, to wit, the redemption of the body, for which we wait.

Rev. J. W. Dance, of Old Hill, Staffs., dealt with the Gospel as glorious in its conception, in its operation, and in its prospects, i.e., in the marvellous purpose of God, and the perfect work of the Lord Jesus Christ, and in the inheritance of them that believe at the return of our great God and Saviour.

Pastor W. Fuller-Gooch based a brief address on Isa. xliii. 1-7. The Word of God, he said, may profitably be studied either telescopically or microscopically. It is often of the greatest value to take large views, and see how a particular truth, or phase of truth, runs through the Bible. But on the other hand, Scripture must be minutely examined in order to see the marvellous perfections thereof. Now the passage just read is one which will abundantly repay the closest consideration. Here we have a marvellous sevenfold view of God's dealings with the sinner, or, in other words, of the Gospel of salvation. Mark how individual and personal it is throughout. We have individual redemption, "I have redeemed thee"; individual calling, "I have called thee by name"; individual bringing in, "I will bring thy seed," and "I will gather thee"; individual love, "I have loved thee"; an individual purpose, "I have created him for my glory"; an individual appointment, "I have formed him" i.e. for a particular place in the body; and individual energising or empowering, "I have made thee," for the idea in these words is that of imparting energy, strength, power to carry out a certain work for which the believer is designed by God.

Rev. J. Dryden Smylie, of Dublin, brought the matter to a serious and practical conclusion by urging home the question "What have I done with this glorious Gospel of which I have heard?" An exposition of Zech. iii. 1-5 followed, in which the speaker regarded Joshua, the high priest, as representing the servants of God, and enlarged on the opposition of the enemy, the accuser of the brethren, and the impossibility of the believer finding any standing or acceptance save through "the blood of Jesus Christ which cleanseth from all sin." The filthy garments having been exchanged for the white robes of the spotless righteousness of Christ, the fair mitre of holiness to the Lord is set on him, and he is designated as wholly given over to the Lord and to his purpose and will.

A BIBLE READING.

The afternoon Bible-reading was devoted to a close and careful study of two phases of the general subject—"The Gospel of our Salvation" and "The Gospel of the Kingdom." Dealing with the first, Colonel Molesworth, who presided, traced in Scripture a threefold aspect of salvation—first, from the penalty of sin; second, from the power of sin; and, third, from the presence of sin. The first must be regarded as past, being accomplished by the work of the Lord Jesus Christ, and taking place in each believer at the moment of conversion; the second is present as it is now going on in those who have been redeemed — such "are being saved"; the third is only completed in the future when the Lord Jesus Christ shall present us to the Father holy and without blame. These three thoughts the chairman linked with the revelation of Jesus crucified, Jesus risen, and Jesus returning. Rev. J. J. B. Coles enlarged on the point that while the Gospel was promised in Old Testament times, there was something which was not promised, something which remained a mystery, that being the calling of the Church, the mystical body of Christ. Several speakers followed touching on various aspects of the "Gospel of Salvation." The second subject was then spoken to by Rev. J. J. B. Coles and Rev. G. A. P. Arbuthnot, whodistinguished the Gospel of Grace from the Gospel of the Kingdom.

THE KINGDOM WITHIN.

In the evening, after prayer and Scripture reading by Rev. Nevile Sherbrooke, the consideration of the Gospel of Salvation was resumed by Rev. T. H. Sparshott, who developed further the teaching of the Word of God as to the way of salvation.

Rev. Talbot Greaves reminded his hearers that while the Conference had before it three themes, the Gospel of Grace, the Gospel of Salvation, and the Gospel of the Kingdom, there are not three Gospels but one, these three being simply different aspects of one Gospel. He wished to speak on the last of the three—the Gospel of the Kingdom. We can never, he said, dwell too much on the Gospel of the Incarnation and Atonement of our Lord. We begin there, but do not end there. How seldom do we consider the Gospel of the Kingdom, and yet our Lord was continually dwelling upon it, while we are told in Luke viii. that He went through the towns and villages preaching the glad tidings of the kingdom. We hear much in these days about the Church, but very little about the kingdom. What is the distinction between the Church and the kingdom? The Church is an organisation, the kingdom is not an organisation, but the reign of certain Divine principles in the human heart. It is "not meat and drink, but righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost." Observe, it is not the kingdom which constitutes the King, but the King who constitutes the kingdom. "The kingdom of God is within you," says Jesus; it is unseen but none the less real. Moreover it expands and spreads. It has come, but in another sense is always coming; and hence we pray, "Thy kingdom come." It changes the hearts of its subjects and creates holiness within. It has no local or national character; it has subjects anywhere and everywhere, but none of these come into it in any natural or formal or hereditary way. They must be born again, else they cannot enter the kingdom of God. This kingdom is the possession of those who have certain spiritual qualities—the poor in spirit, the persecuted for righteousness' sake, the simple and childlike in faith—only such belong to the kingdom of God.

Having enlarged considerably on this phase of the Kingdom, the speaker passed on to the prophetic aspect:—The Kingdom which is his now is only to be manifested at the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ. Then shall we see Jesus crowned with glory and honour. Around there is much to distress and alarm us; but we look above and beyond, and see that the Great King is over all, and is coming ere long, and in this we rest and are reassured. My brethren, I believe that while we know not the day nor the hour, were we more watchful and attent we might even now hear the first rumblings of his chariot wheels. This being so, it surely ought to be ours to tell out the good tidings of the coming Kingdom, and make known to all people that He is coming whose right it is to reign.

A GLORIOUS SALVATION.

Mr. James Wright, in the course of an exposition of Scripture teaching concerning "the Gospel of your salvation," said: Salvation may be regarded in various aspects; first as salvation from the guilt of sin, through Christ dying for the sinner. Ponder this magnificent truth, that the weakest believer in Christ has this glorious salvation from sin and its penalty. "He that hath the Son hath life, and he that hath not the Son hath not life," may without violence to the sense be read, "He that hath the Son hath salvation, and he that hath not the Son hath not salvation." The Gospel, the good news, brings me tidings of Him "who loved me and gave Himself for me"—for it is no monopoly of Paul to say that. Then one may say the marvellous love of God is focussed by faith on the individual soul, however weak and feeble. Remember a whole Christ gave Himself for me, the guilty sinner; just, so far as I am concerned, as if there were not another sinner to be saved through that perfect sacrifice. Mark, He is called Jesus. Why? Because He shall save his people from their sins. Hearing these glad tidings and realising my sinfulness, I come trembling before Him, I look unto Him and find myself saved. The instant I trust Him, I find the guilt gone, and I have no longer any conscience of sin. Jesus is mine. He gave Himself for me, and He gives Himself to me.

But further, I have a heart, and that heart God has framed to enjoy fellowship. But that fellowship with God has been marred and destroyed by sin, and the heart craves after Him. Now the Holy Ghost meets that need by revealing Christ under another name; not only Jesus, God for me; but Emmanuel, "God with me." This meets the need of my poor heart, for in Him I find rest. His sympathy is a pillow on which I can rest this weary soul of mine, as John leant on Jesus' bosom. So in the Lord Jesus the poor sinner finds a Friend, a sympathiser, the rest for his weary heart.

But further still, when saved from guilt, and when resting in Christ, we often wonder why Christ is so little omnipotent in us? Why is it? Because we have got a will, and that will has not been brought into subjection to Him who was born a King as well as Jesus-Saviour; who is not only my sympathising Priest, but also Emmanuel, my King, demanding that every thought and imagination should be brought into captivity to Him. When we are taught to say, as in Psa. cx., "Rule Thou in the midst of thine enemies," then in my heart and will He becomes supreme Lord and Head over all to his Church. Then He becomes my true Joseph, of whom it was said that "without him no man shall move hand or foot."

Thus, then, the sinner reaches tranquillity and peace; not only peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ, but the peace of God, the very serenity of God Himself, ruling in the heart, through the reception of the simple testimony of the Word concerning Him. Thus I find myself in Him, standing in the relationship of a son to his father, and enjoying the blessed consciousness of the joy of salvation, not according to some stereotyped experience, or at some particularly favoured season, but simply and solely by resting on the naked Word of God: 'Let God be true and every man a liar." Taking this and resting upon it, the peace of God possesses my heart and rules my being.

Further and beyond all this, there is a glorious future aspect, which at present we cannot even understand. "O Jehovah Elohim, how excellent in all the earth is thy name!" It is so now, but men see it not; then shall it be manifested before men and angels. And in that wondrous future we are associated with Christ, for "we shall reign with Him." Let that glorious hope help to lift us out of powerlessness and worldliness. Let us be occupied with the powers of the world to come, and so escape the snares of this present age. Thus shall we live to the praise of Him who loved us and gave Himself for us, and show forth the virtues of Him who hath called us out of darkness into his marvellous light.

THIS GOSPEL OF THE KINGDOM.

Rev. F. Ellis (Moravian), the first speaker on Thursday morning, dealt with the subject, while by no means ignoring or overlooking prophecy, mainly in the sense indicated by the Lord Jesus when He said, "The kingdom of God is within you," He took as his line of thought the King, the kingdom, and the subjects of the King. The King is the Lord Jesus Christ whom we rejoice to know as King. Three words running through the Gospels throw marvellous light on Christ as King. These are, "I am," "I can," and "I must." Following these phrases, the speaker showed how wonderfully Jesus revealed Himself as King in his "I ams"; how gloriously He showed Himself to be possessed of Kingly power in connection with the phrase, "I can;" and how significantly He disclosed Himself as under the impulse of his Kingly office in the "I musts" of the Gospels.

As to the subjects, they are those who have been redeemed, who have been called out of darkness into light, who have surrendered to Christ. Such say I am the subject of the King; I can do his commands by his mighty power; I must do his will, because He has taught me to love.

General Sir R. Phayre, K.C.B., followed with an address in which he dealt with the false views of the Gospel current in the present day. The new Gospel of works is no new thing. It is as old as the days of Adam; for the very plan which the enemy adopted to deceive our first parents and cast doubt on the word of the living God is the plan he is now carrying out. The modern notions of advanced thought may all be found foreshadowed in the earliest days when sin entered and death by sin. But no sooner had man fallen than God Himself came down preaching the Gospel of the Kingdom and revealing his gracious purpose of deliverance and restoration. As to the Kingdom, it is internal, for it is a state of grace; but it is also external, and will be manifested at his appearing, when we shall be with Him in glory.

Rev. Dr. Millar Nicolson followed with a few words on Christian loyalty to our King. En passant, he cited an instance of how strangely certain high critics first misquote Scripture, and then triumphantly enlarge on the apparent difficulty—a difficulty caused by the inaccuracy of the quotation, and not really existing in the inspired Word.

Col. Molesworth, in a few closing sentences, sought to bring the whole theme of the Conference to a practical issue in urging the question whether all present had accepted the King, whether Christ was indeed ruling in every heart and life. The Lord God has anointed Him King, but do we recognise his kingship? True, the crowning day is coming, the kingdom is not yet in manifestation; but soon it will be, and he who has suffered with Him, and served Him loyally in the time of rejection, shall be manifested with Him in glory.

The proceedings of the Conference were then closed with prayer. In the evening a special service and united communion was held in the Memorial Church, Victoria-square, the preacher being Rev. D. H. Sparling, of Biddulph Moor, Congleton.

METROPOLITAN DRINKING FOUNTAIN ASSOCIATION.—The unusually long and hot summer has greatly taxed the resources of this excellent society, and leaves it considerably in debt. For some time past they have been obliged to refuse applications for fountains and troughs in districts where they are sadly needed. The Association has now under its care 697 fountains for human beings, and 751 troughs for animals in the Metropolitan District alone. Mr. Joseph Fry is treasurer and chairman of committee, and the offices are at 70, Victoria-street, S.W.

THE WELCOME HOME.—At the last meeting of the Christian Lifeboat Crew an interesting letter was read from Rev. A. Muller, Ellichpur, India, telling of faithful rescue work from heathenism, and of dangers from serpents and fever, but also of God's gracious help and deliverance, adding, "We here in India find, not only for the heathen but for ourselves, too, that the devil, the old serpent, is to be more feared than any earthly serpent." Good reports were given by members representing various branches, and the text for the month, "All joy and peace in believing," given by Miss Child, formed the keynote of the meeting.

LIVERPOOL SHELTERING HOME.

Dear Sir,—We have returned from Canada again, having placed out our forty-second party of young folk into good homes and situations. It is to be expected that many will seek the outlet that the Sheltering Home affords for fatherless and needy children this winter. It offers them the chance of going to a land where the industrious can be sure of constant employment and the good prospect of making homes for themselves in time to come.

Canada has had a prosperous harvest, and fortunately does not seem involved in the financial troubles of her neighbours in the United States. Farmers are willing to give board, winter schooling, and wages, according to the age and capabilities, to boys over twelve years of age; in return they are gradually initiated into farmers' duties. This groundwork of a farm life during their growing years lays the foundation of a strong, healthy, vigorous manhood. At the age of eighteen they can take up land of their own. Others prefer to take up a special trade; while the great railway system also offers opening to some.

For the girls there is an unlimited and ever-increasing demand, and very few are found who wish to return to the struggling anxious life in the old country. All respectably-conducted, industrious girls can do better in Canada. We have received visits at the Canadian Home this summer from many well-dressed, contented young women who could not be induced to leave their first situations by any offered increase in wages. Although the Sheltering Home has always been too poor to offer prizes to those who earn good characters, it could perhaps break the record, with one who has remained in her first situation 22 years. We have seen very many respectably married and well provided for.

Those under 10 years of age who become thoroughly adopted into the families grow up like native Canadians, and often, as they grow older, secure a good education, and become possessed with the national pluck and determination to rise and succeed in life.

Any person interested in fatherless or destitute boys or girls can bring them to be seen and advised by me at the Sheltering Home any day between 11 and 4. All who approve of this means of helping the poor to an independent livelihood are asked to contribute generously, so that the institution may be utilised as fully as possible during the hard winter anticipated in Liverpool.—Yours faithfully, Louisa Birt.

"OUT AND OUT" CONFERENCE.
